

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

 Muirhead v.
 Forth and

 Mutual Insurance Association.

Marine insurance—Mutual insurance—Conditions in policy—Company—“Articles of Association” imported into policy—Invalid addition to articles printed on policy.—A mutual insurance company incorporated under the Companies Acts was authorised by its articles of association to make alterations in its articles of association, by special resolution passed in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Acts. The company resolved to alter one of the articles of association by adding to it “that it shall be a condition of insurance that the assured shall keep one-fifth (of the ship) uninsured.” The provisions of the Companies Acts were not complied with, but the articles as altered were registered in terms of the Companies Acts, and were printed on the back of each policy as rules of the insurance. The policy bore in gremio that the “articles of association shall be deemed and considered part of this policy.”

In a question between a policy-holder and the company, held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the articles of association referred to in the policy must be held to be the registered articles, and that the altered article was a valid condition of the insurance.

Marine insurance—Policy—Declared value.—A shipowner insured a steamer with a mutual insurance company. The policy provided that the vessel, “for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and the company in this policy,” should be valued at £3750.

In a question between the assured and the company as to whether the assured had violated a condition of the policy, which required him to keep one-fifth of the value of the steamer uninsured, held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the value of the vessel must be taken to be the value declared in the policy.

The pursuer appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor of the Inner House affirming an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary assoilzieing the defenders from the conclusions of the summons in an action brought to recover the sum of £1000 upon a policy of insurance. There is no question about the loss of the vessel insured, but the question arose whether, according to the terms and conditions of the policy, the assured was entitled to recover. Reliance was placed by the defenders upon an article which it was said contained a condition which was broken by the assured, and which, therefore, disentitled him to recover, the condition being that the assured should keep one-fifth of the value of the vessel uninsured.

No. 1. It appeared that before the action was brought a discussion had taken place with regard to an insurance with another company, the Sunderland Insurance Company. This policy was a policy for £1000 upon a vessel valued at £3750. In the Sunderland policy as at first effected the vessel was also valued at £3750 and there was an insurance of £3000. The attention of the assured was called to the fact that this constituted an over-insurance, inasmuch as the two insurances together exceeded the limit up to which it was alleged the assured was entitled to insure as between the present respondents and himself. On the face of the correspondence there is shewn no contest by the appellant that there had been this over-insurance; and when the action was brought, the point really argued by the present appellant was, not that there had not been this excess, but that, according to the true construction of the article on which reliance was placed by the company, all that he was bound to do was to abstain from insuring with them for more than four-fifths of the value of the vessel, and that it was quite immaterial what insurances he might have with other companies. That, and that alone, so far as I understand it, was the contest between the parties at the time when the action was brought.

Muirhead v.
Forth and North Sea
Steamboat Mutual Insur-
tion.

Now, dealing with that matter first, it appears to me to be scarcely capable of argument that the contention of the appellant could be sustained. The article provides that "the sum insured on any one steamer shall not exceed £1000, or such other sum as the directors may think prudent, but in no case to exceed four-fifths of the value of such steamer including trawl gear; and it shall be a condition of this insurance that the assured shall keep one-fifth uninsured." It seems to me to be impossible to put any other construction upon those words than this, that he shall be his own insurer to the extent of one-fifth, so as to secure due attention and care on his part, and that it had not reference only to the transaction between himself and this company. That disposes of the question which was really in dispute when this action was launched.

But it was discovered in the course of the proceedings that, as was alleged, there had been certain irregularities in the manner in which this article had become one of the articles of association of the company, and it was contended, therefore, that it was in no way binding upon the assured, and that his policy was to be regarded as free altogether from this condition. An amendment of the pleadings was allowed to raise that point.

The policy no doubt provides that payment shall be made to the company in respect of this insurance according to the articles of association of the company, and that the conditions contained in the said articles of association shall be deemed and considered part of this policy. The argument on the part of the appellant is that the term "the articles of association" in the policy means those articles of association which have been validly brought into existence according to the provisions under which the company was constituted and which regulate its proceedings, that is to say, under the original articles of association; and that no added article which has not been validly added according to the provisions of the original articles can be an article of association, and that, therefore, not being an article of association, it is not one of the conditions incorporated in this policy. That is the argument on the part of the appellant.

The foundation of fact for that argument is that the 66th article of association provides that "the company may from time to time, by special resolution passed in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, or any subsisting statutory modification thereof, alter and make new provisions in lieu of or in addition to any of the regulations of the association contained in these articles." The Companies Act requires certain meetings to be held at a certain interval; and it is said that, although the company purported to alter its original articles of association by making the article upon which reliance is placed by the respondents, the statutory conditions were not complied with, and that it therefore never really did become an article of association of this company. Now, it is not in dispute that, so far as the matter of fact is concerned, that is established. The requirements of the Companies Act were not complied with, and this new article of association was not made in accordance with those requirements, and therefore was not in that sense a valid article. The original article 67, which was altered by the new one, enabled the company to insure only to one-half of the value of the vessel; but it contained, on the other hand, no condition such as I have read, that the assured should keep one-fifth uninsured. The contention, therefore, on behalf of the appellant is this,—“Article 67 is the only article which can apply to my insurance; the insurance was within the powers and provisions of that article, and that article does not contain a condition which is obnoxious to my claim, and therefore my case stands.”

If by the words “articles of association” in the policy of insurance are to be understood articles of association which have been in accordance with the regulations of the company validly constituted, I think the appellant makes out his case. But I am unable to come to the conclusion that this is the true construction of the policy. If it were, it certainly would lead to some very strange results. It cannot be doubted that, although articles might not have been validly made according to the constitution of the company, yet nevertheless a person dealing with that company, on the faith that these were amongst the articles, would be entitled as against the company to treat them as binding. That is a well-established doctrine, wherever an article which has not, by reason of some defect in procedure, been validly constituted is one which it was competent for the company to make. The assured, therefore, might have insisted upon binding the assurer to the provisions of an article which de facto had existed and had been registered, whatever defects there might be in it de jure; and, on the other hand, it is contended that, if there is any stipulation favourable to the company in any of those articles which, though de facto amongst the registered articles, have not become articles, if I may say so, de jure, the assured may refuse to be bound by those provisions, and fall back upon the position that the articles which are inserted in the policy are those articles only which have been lawfully and properly made. Now that certainly would be a result in which one would be indisposed to acquiesce, unless one were compelled by the ordinary rules of construction so to construe this policy. I think one is not so compelled. The policy may well be, and ought as a business document to be, construed in this way—that by “the articles of association of the company,” both parties must have intended those articles, which had in fact been registered, and were the registered articles of the company, whatever defects there might have been in the procedure according to the regulations by which the company was bound. I am of opinion, therefore, that this article, upon which the contest turns, was an “article of association of the company” within the meaning of the policy.

But then it is said (and this, I think, is something of an afterthought) that the condition was not broken, inasmuch as the vessel was insured altogether for only £4000, and she was really worth £5000; and, therefore, she was only insured for four-fifths of her value, and one-fifth was at the risk of the assured. I am not at all sure that that, as matter of proof, is open to the appellant ; but it is unnecessary to consider that, because it is clear that, as between the parties to this action, the value of the vessel must be taken as £3750 ; and if she was insured for more than four-fifths of £3750, it appears to me that this condition was broken.

But another point was raised, for the first time, I believe, in this House. It was said that the vessel was insured with the Sunderland Company under a policy similar in its terms to this, and that inasmuch as upon the true construction of this policy and the Sunderland policy no more could have been recovered by the assured than four-fifths of £3750, therefore the condition was not broken, because the assured had kept the vessel uninsured to the extent of one-fifth. I do not think that that point is open to the appellant. No proof was led ; and having regard to the manner in which the questions have been raised, and to the correspondence which passed between the parties, I am of opinion that it is not open to the appellant now to take such a point. But I may add that, even if it were, it does not seem to me necessary to dwell upon it, for the appellant really could not make good any such claim. By agreement before this loss took place, the valuation in the Sunderland policy was raised to £5000. Supposing, therefore, that the appellant were to have recovered £1000 upon this policy, and to have sued the Sunderland Company for £3000, I am quite unable to see what answer the Sunderland Company would have had upon their policy to that claim for £3000 ; and, inasmuch as the appellant could lawfully have recovered £4000, I am equally at a loss to see how it could be said that he had kept, as between himself and the respondent company, one-fifth uninsured.

For these reasons I move your Lordships that the interlocutors appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I also am of opinion that according to the right construction of this contract the articles of association referred to in the policy must be taken to be those articles which had been duly registered, and under which the company was trading at the date of the contract. I am not prepared to hold that in a question with a person in the position of this appellant these articles were in any sense invalid ; because there was no defect of power on the part of the company to make those regulations which are contained in article 67 for the guidance of the directors in conducting the business of the company. On account of an irregularity in the passing of the resolution, the article might be open to exception at the instance of members of the company in a question with their directors ; but in a question between the company and those who bona fide traded with it through its directors, these articles were valid in this sense, that the directors could bind the company, and the company could take no exception to a contract made by them on the ground that there had been an irregularity in the manner in which the resolutions were passed.

Now, it is idle to suggest that when the directors are contracting, any distinction is to be drawn between the validity of a stipulation which is not to the advantage of the company and the validity of a stipulation which is obviously for its advantage. All that can be suggested is that the members of the company are much less likely to challenge it in the one case than in the other ; but the question as between validity and invalidity arising from an irregularity is, to my mind, purely a domestic matter ; it is a matter which concerns the company and its directors, and not one which concerns the company dealing with bona fide third parties outside. No. 1.

Nov. 17, 1893.
Muirhead v.

In this case the declaration of the policy is that a certain provision in these articles of association shall, so far as regards this insurance, be as binding upon the assured as upon the person or persons effecting the insurance. The persons who effected it had power to pass it ; it was binding upon them to its full extent even when effect was given to those stipulations which were irregularly entered in the articles of association. There was no defect of power on the part of the appellant ; and why two parties, the one having authority from the company and the other transacting for his own hand and on his own behoof, should not be able to make a contract effectually binding in terms upon both of them, I am unable to understand. Forth and North Sea Steamboat Mutual Insurance Association.

With regard to the last point, which it was sought to raise here for the first time, I am of opinion that it would be peccati exempli to allow an appellant who has conducted his case in both Courts below upon the footing that the legal effect of a particular document was admitted, to traverse in this House the construction which has been put upon the document all along, even though he does not produce it at the bar ; for the Sunderland policy, upon which so much has been said, is not in process.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur. I think the appellant has no case.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. The circumstances in which the question has arisen are these : In the first place, the alteration on the articles of association which is said to be ineffectual, and which, if challenged timeously by a member of this company, might have been held to be ineffectual because of the failure to observe the requirement of the Companies Act with regard to notice, was registered upwards of five years before this policy was entered into. In addition to that, on the back of the policy the detail of the altered article is given, and the attention of the insurer is drawn to it by a printed note on the front of the policy, "See the other side." It is clear that the company for a period of five years have carried on their business in conformity with the provisions of the altered article by making their policies conform to it. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion with your Lordships that in construing the policy the meaning of the words "according to the articles of association of the company," is the articles of association as those articles have been registered and acted upon by the company, and I think that this consideration is very much strengthened by what has been observed by my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson), that the provision in the policy goes on to say, "and shall, so far as regards this insurance, be as binding upon the assured as upon the said person or persons effecting this insurance."

LORD BOWEN.—I have nothing to add to what has already fallen from those of your Lordships who have spoken.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

v. Bogie.WILLIAM BOGIE AND OTHERS (Methven's Executors) (Defenders),

*Revenue—Double duties—Legatees identified by reference to will of another testator—Power of disposal—Stamp-Duties, &c., Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 76), sec. 4.—Stamp-Duties Act, 1860 (23 Vict. cap. 15), sec. 4.—*By section 4 of the Stamp-Duties Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 76), it is enacted that "every gift by any will . . . of any person which . . . shall be payable . . . out of any personal or moveable estate or effects which such person hath had or shall have had power to dispose of . . . shall be deemed a legacy. . . ."

By section 4 of the Stamp-Duties Act, 1860 (23 Vict. cap. 15), it is enacted that the stamp-duties payable by law upon inventories are to be levied and paid "in respect of all the personal or moveable estate and effects which any person hereafter dying shall have disposed of by will under any authority enabling such person to dispose of the same as he or she shall think fit. . . ."

A bequeathed one-third of the residue of her estate to B, and failing him to his executors and representatives. B predeceased A, leaving a will, under which he appointed executors.

In addition to the inventory and legacy-duties payable by A's executors the Crown claimed inventory and legacy-duties from B's executors on one-third of A's residue on the ground that it had been disposed of by B's will.

Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that B's executors were not liable for the duties claimed, as B had no power to dispose of, and had not disposed of, any part of A's estate.

The Lord Advocate appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question raised in the present case is whether inventory-duty and legacy-duty are to be paid in respect of a certain part of the estate of Miss Scott which passed to the executors of Mr Robert Methven.

Robert Methven died leaving a trust-disposition and settlement. By his trust-disposition and settlement the defenders were his trustees and executors, and became entitled to his heritable and moveable estate. Miss Scott, who had made a trust-disposition in the lifetime of Robert Methven, by that disposition provided with regard to the free residue of her whole moveable estate and effects in these terms: "I leave and bequeath the same to the said Robert Methven, Robert Russell, and James Russell equally between and amongst them share and share alike for their own use and behoof, and failing all or any of them by their predeceasing me, to their several and respective executors and representatives whomsoever, whom I do hereby appoint to be my residuary legatees." Of course, there is no question that inventory-duty must be paid upon the third of the residue which is now in question passing under Miss Scott's will; and there is no question that legacy-duty must be paid in respect of the disposition to which I have just called your Lordships' attention. The question is whether a second duty is payable.

Miss Scott survived Robert Methven, and therefore the gift to him personally never took effect. At the time from which her will must be regarded as speaking Robert Methven was dead. His estate had passed under this trust-disposition to his executors and was then ascertained. It has been held¹ and it is not now in dispute, that the effect of Miss Scott's trust-disposition was not to vest in the executors of Robert Methven, the defenders, and the respondents here, a beneficial interest in the property left by Miss Scott, namely, one-third of her residue; that what they took they took as executors, and that they were bound to deal with this third of the residue in precisely the same way as they had to deal with the estate which had passed to them under Robert Methven's will.

No. 2.

Lord Advocate
v. Bogie.

Under these circumstances, it is contended on behalf of the Crown, who are the appellants at your Lordships' bar, that inventory-duty is payable in respect of the moneys which thus came to the executors of Robert Methven as part of Robert Methven's estate, and that legacy-duty is payable by the beneficiaries under Robert Methven's will, who of course will take, by virtue of this disposition of Miss Scott's, the money which so passes to the executors of Methven.

It may be that under circumstances such as I have detailed it would be neither unreasonable nor unjust that this second duty, as it is called, should become payable; but with that your Lordships have not to deal. It can only be payable if it falls within the taxing provisions which have been enacted by the Legislature with reference to inventories and legacies.

The Stamp-Duties Act of 1815 defines as the estate liable to inventory-duty or probate-duty "the personal estate and effects of any person deceased." Now the contention on behalf of the appellants is that the effect of Miss Scott's disposition coupled with Methven's was to make this third of the residue of Miss Scott's estate part of the personal estate and effects of Robert Methven. Of course it had never belonged to Robert Methven; at the time of his death it could in no sense be said to be his or any part of his estate. The contention is that the effect of Miss Scott's disposition is to add it to his personal estate, and to make it as much a part of his personal estate as if it had belonged to him in his lifetime. The only question which your Lordships have to consider is whether it has been in that sense so completely made a part of his personal estate that within the words of the Stamp-Duties Act, which I have read, it must be regarded as part of "the personal estate and effects of the deceased."

The will of Miss Scott, as I have said, must be taken as speaking from the time of her death; and the case appears to me to be precisely the same as if she in her lifetime had given the money to the executors of Methven to be used by them as executors in the same way as the other money which came to them as executors; I cannot think that there is any difference because she made this disposition by will, and in her will had made Robert Methven himself a beneficiary in case he had survived her. One must look at the state of things at the time from which the will speaks.

Now, I think that the effect of her disposition was so to vest this money in the persons who were to administer Robert Methven's estate, that they would have to administer it precisely as if it were part of Robert Methven's estate. I will go so far as to assume that, so far as it was possible for her to do so, she made it a part of his personal estate. But admitting all that, it does not follow that the legal effect of what she did was to make it for the purposes of this statute that which it really was not, a part of "the personal estate of the deceased," which prima facie means the personal estate which has been his. For many purposes it would no doubt be regarded in precisely the same way. The learned Lord Advocate said that the question was whether it was impossible for her to make it so. It seems to me, however, that the question rather is whether what she has done necessarily has the effect of making it a part of the personal estate of the deceased within the meaning of the statute. If it has, of course the duty follows ; but I cannot think that this is the result. It appears to me that the effect cannot be said to be more than this ; it is to be held by the same persons and administered in the same way and dealt with altogether as if it were part of the personal estate ; but I do not think that makes it, or could make it, part of the personal estate within the meaning of this statute. And, my Lords, it seems to me difficult to resist that conclusion when it was admitted (or perhaps I should hardly say admitted) by the Lord Advocate, that if different words having precisely the same effect had been used by Miss Scott a duty would not have been payable ; he admitted that if she had described in different words what is said to be the legal effect of her disposition as to the persons to administer, the mode of administration and the persons who were to benefit, it would have been difficult to contend that it would then have become a part of the personal estate. It seems to me that the only difference which can be suggested would have been that in the one case the duty would have been payable, and in the other it would not, although precisely the same legal result had been brought about by the use of different words.

No. 2.

Lord Advocate

I think this view of the case is strongly confirmed by the statutes to which attention has been called. So far as I am aware, the first statute which made an inventory obligatory is the 48 Geo. III. cap. 149, sec. 38, which provides in respect of any person dying after the 10th of October 1808, having personal or moveable estate or effects in Scotland, that before they are dealt with there shall be "a full and true inventory" on oath, containing a statement "of all the personal or moveable estate and effects of the deceased already recovered or known to be existing." Of course, that would have been satisfied in this case by an inventory made out shortly after Robert Methven's death and before Miss Scott's death, upon obtaining confirmation. The statute proceeds to deal with cases, which of course would frequently occur, in which, although a full statement was made of all the estate and effects of the deceased then known, it should be afterwards discovered that there was some property forming part of that estate which had not been known at the time when the inventory was made.

Then the statute proceeds in these terms,—“If at any subsequent period a discovery shall be made of any other effects belonging to the deceased, an additional inventory of the same shall be in like manner exhibited” ; and there are very considerable penalties imposed if that is not done. The statute therefore appears to contemplate that all that is required to supplement an honest statement of the property of the deceased in the first instance, is a further statement of any property subsequently discovered “belonging to the deceased.” Now, my Lords, whatever may be the case with regard to the expression “personal estate and effects of the deceased,” which can conceivably be regarded as an entity that may be added to, it seems to me impossible to contend that the words “belonging to the deceased” could have any application to a property which never belonged to him, and which was, as is suggested, added to his personal estate after his death. Those words occurring in the later part of the section appear to me to be very cogent in the interpretation of the earlier words of the section, which indicate the nature of the property that is to be included in the inventory, and strongly support the view that it would not include that which a person other than the deceased took steps to make and intended to make, so far as could be done, a part of the personal estate and effects of the deceased. No. 2.

In the subsequent Act, the Act of 1881, which provides also for the payment of further probate duty, it is enacted in section 32 that "if at any time it shall be discovered that the personal estate and effects of the deceased were at the time of the grant of probate or letters of administration of greater value than the value mentioned in the certificate," then "the person acting in the administration of such estate and effects shall within six months after the discovery deliver a further affidavit." There, again, the test is made "the personal estate and effects of the deceased at the time of the grant of probate"; and that provision would clearly be inapplicable to the case where, after the grant of probate, owing to the dispositions of the will of another person, money or property was, in the way suggested, added to the personal estate, because of course it would not come within the words "were at the time of the grant of probate of greater value than the value mentioned in the certificate."

Mar. 6, 1894.
Lord Advocate
v. Bogie.

For these reasons I think that the taxing clauses do not apply to the portion of Miss Scott's estate which came to the executors of Mr Methven; and all the illustrations which have been put, and all the questions which have been asked, really seem to me to depend upon the answer to that question. If, within the Act, it has become part of the personal estate and effects, then no doubt probate would be required to make title to it. If it has not so become part of the estate, then probate would not be required to make title. When once that question is answered all the other questions seem to be answered fully and without difficulty.

I will not detain your Lordships more than a moment upon the suggestion that if it is not within the words of the statutes I have quoted it is within the words of the Stamp-Duties Act of 1860. It seems to me impossible to say that it was any part of "personal or moveable estate and effects which" a person "shall have disposed of by will under any authority enabling such person to dispose of" as he thought fit.

The only question remaining is whether the beneficial interest can be regarded as subject to the payment of legacy-duty by the beneficiaries. That depends upon the construction of the Stamp-Duties Act of 1845, which defines as a legacy liable to duty "every gift by any will or testamentary instrument of any person which by virtue of such will or testamentary instrument is or shall be payable or shall have effect or be satisfied out of the personal or moveable estate or effects of such person or out of any personal or moveable estate or effects which such person hath had or shall have had power to dispose of." It seems to me impossible to say that any moneys which may be received, by virtue of the dispositions which have been under consideration, by the persons who are named as beneficiaries in Mr Methven's will, who in consequence of Miss Scott's disposition would take certain further benefits, are received as gifts by Mr Methven's will which, by virtue of that will, are payable out of any personal estate of his or any "personal estate" which he had "power to dispose of."

For these reasons I move your Lordships that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I am also of opinion that the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed. I do not wish to suggest that Miss Scott could not have made such a testamentary disposition in favour of the beneficiaries under the will of Robert Methven as would have entitled the Crown to claim payment of duty. She unquestionably could have directed the trustees of Methven, whom she made her executors, to pay these duties to the Crown; and that direction would have been imperative. I do not think it is necessary to speculate how far she could have accomplished the object of making the Crown entitled to these duties by indicating that her bequest was to be in the same position under these statutes as if it had in point of fact belonged to the nephew who predeceased her. I am satisfied that no such thing was either done or attempted here. Miss Scott created, according to my view, a new trust in the persons of Methven's executors, the purpose of the trust being, not that the fund which she committed to them should become part and parcel of the deceased's estate, but that it was to be administered by the trustees as a separate estate, in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as if it had originally been the property of Methven himself.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I entirely concur. The claim of the Crown is practically for the recovery of a double duty; and for the reasons stated by the Lord Chancellor I think their case has entirely failed.

LORD MORRIS concurred.

EDINBURGH UNITED BREWERIES, LIMITED, AND OTHERS (Pursuers), Appellants.—Sol.-Gen. Sir J. Rigby—Asher, Q.C.—Thomas Shaw.
JAMES A. MOLLESON AND ANOTHER (Defenders), Respondents.—
Lord-Adv. Balfour—Ure.

Sale—Resale for enhanced price—Subvendee—Reduction—Title to sue reduction of original contract.—An arrangement was made for the sale of a brewery by A to B at the price of £20,500 fixed on the basis of profits for the last two years as shewn by the books. The books were examined by an accountant employed by B, and the sale was completed. B sold the brewery to C for £28,500, which was fixed without reference to profits, and A, at B's request, conveyed the brewery to C. It was afterwards discovered that A's books contained false entries, largely increasing the apparent profits, which had been made by his clerk without his knowledge.

C in his own name and as B's assignee, and B, raised an action against A for reduction of the contract between A and B, and of the conveyance by A to C, C offering restitution in integrum.

Held, in aff. judgment of the First Division, which assolizied A, (1) that as C was not privy to the contract between A and B, he had no title to reduce it; (2) that as B had no interest in the subjects after the conveyance by A to C, he had no title to reduce the said contract.

Sale—Agreement to sell business on condition of buyer being satisfied as to profits after examination of the books.—An agreement for the sale of a brewery business at a certain price set out that the arrangement proceeded upon the basis that the profits during the two preceding years amounted to a certain sum upon an average, and that "in the event of it being ascertained that this is not the fact the arrangement shall be at an end"; and further bore, that B, the purchaser, "with the view of verifying the amount of the profits for the said two years, shall immediately, upon delivery hereof, be entitled to have the books," &c., connected with the business, examined by an accountant.

The balance-sheets and books were examined by accountants employed by the buyer, and thereafter the contract of sale was completed. No. 3.

The buyer thereafter agreed to assign his rights as purchaser to a company, and at his request the original seller conveyed the brewery to the company. Mar. 9, 1894.

The company, a year afterwards, discovered that a number of the entries in the books submitted to the accountants were false, and had been fraudulently made by the clerk in charge of the books, without the knowledge of the seller, with the result of shewing a much larger profit than was actually made.

In an action brought by the company as B's assignee, and with his concurrence, against the original seller for reduction of the sale to B, on the ground that it had now been ascertained that the amount of the profits set forth as the basis of the price were not the true profits, and that in terms of the contract the sale fell to be reduced, held that the condition as to the amount of profits lapsed on the completion of the sale.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor of the First Division of the Inner-House affirming an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. The action is of a somewhat peculiar character. The pursuers are the Edinburgh United Breweries Company and Mr Dunn; the defender is Mr Molleson. Mr Molleson, who was the trustee of a brewery belonging to Mr Nicolson, on the 11th November 1889, entered into a contract with Mr Dunn for the sale to him of the Palace Brewery and the business and stocks connected with it. The purchase was to take place as from the 15th of November 1889, at the price of £20,500. The purchase-money was to be paid by the 31st of December, at which date a conveyance was to be executed either to Mr Dunn or to any company to which he might assign his interest, it being no doubt in contemplation at that time that a company would be formed for the purpose of carrying on this and other businesses. That was a matter in which Mr Molleson had no concern or interest, except that he agreed to make the conveyance either to Mr Dunn or to such nominee of his. The 10th clause of the agreement is the one upon which the appellants place their reliance.

Before reading the terms of that clause, however, I will state to your Lordships what subsequently took place. Mr Dunn, on the 14th of December, entered into an agreement with the United Breweries Company, the pursuers, by which he agreed to sell them this brewery and several other breweries. To some of the terms of that agreement I shall have presently to call your Lordships' attention, but the price to be paid by the United Breweries Company to Mr Dunn, who it appears was really acting for the Contract Corporation, was the sum of £28,500, being £8000 more than the price which was to be paid by Mr Dunn to Mr Molleson. On the 31st of December a conveyance was executed by Mr Molleson, at the instance of Mr Dunn, by which Molleson, in implement of his contract of the 11th of November, conveyed to the United Breweries Company the Palace Brewery and all the other subjects of the contract of the 11th of November, so that a profit was made upon the transaction by Mr Dunn, or the Contract Corporation (it matters not which), of £8000. Mr Dunn at that date ceased to have any interest in the Palace Brewery or in the contract entered into with Mr Molleson.

The tenth clause of the original agreement provided that "the arrangement herein set out proceeds upon the basis that the net profits from said brewery and wine businesses amounted during each of the two years ending 31st of December 1887 and 31st December 1888 to £3750 or thereabouts upon an average." It further provided that, "in the event of its being ascertained that this is not the fact, this arrangement shall be at an end, and the second party" (that is Mr Molleson) "shall be bound to repay the said sum of £3700," which was the deposit to be paid upon the execution of the agreement. "The first party" (that is Mr Dunn), "with the view of verifying the amount of the profits for said two years, shall immediately upon delivery thereof be entitled to have the books, accounts, and vouchers connected with said businesses examined by an accountant named by him." In accordance with the provisions of that clause all the books of Mr Molleson connected with the brewery were placed before accountants selected by Mr Dunn, and were examined by them as fully as it appeared to them to be necessary to examine them. They reported that the books shewed a profit of somewhat less than the sum named,—that is to say, a profit of £3300 instead of £3750; but there was a discussion as to whether they had arrived at the profits upon the true basis. I do not think that, for the present purpose, the difference between £3300 and £3750 is material. I will take it for the purposes of my judgment that the books shewed, according to the report of the accountants, the profit stated, namely, £3750. It was discovered, something more than a year after the conveyance to the Brewery Company, that the books had in fact been improperly dealt with by a clerk in the employ of Mr Molleson—that he had altered some of the items in the books with the view of making the profits appear greater than they really were. I assume, for the purpose of the opinion which I am about to express, that, although all the books, vouchers, and accounts were in the hands of the accountants, and they could, if they had examined them, from the materials in their possession have found out the frauds which had been committed, yet the examination contemplated by the parties to the contract was such that the frauds would not in ordinary course have been discovered.

Under these circumstances the United Breweries Company and Dunn come as pursuers, claiming a reduction of the disposition entered into between Molleson and the Breweries Company and Molleson and Dunn, and insist that they are entitled to have those agreements and dispositions reduced. Their case is put by the learned counsel for the appellants in two ways. First, it is said that under the contract between Dunn and Molleson profits were made the basis of that contract; that the contract itself provided that if it were ascertained at any time that those profits had not been made the contract should be at an end; that all the rights of Dunn under the contract were passed by him to the United Breweries Company, and that therefore the United Breweries Company are entitled as a matter of contract to say that the transaction not having been carried out in accordance with that which is declared to be its basis, and the United Breweries Company and Dunn having been misled into believing that the books were what in fact they were not, the United Breweries Company can themselves maintain this action of reduction in right of the transfer to them by Dunn of his rights.

My Lords, that depends of course upon the construction of the 10th clause of the contract. I will assume that whilst the matter was in fieri, until the 31st of December, when the conveyance was executed, the United Breweries Company, under their contract with Dunn, could have taken advantage of this stipulation in Dunn's contract with Molleson and have insisted that the arrangement was at an end. But the question is, what is their position in that respect after the disposition of the 31st of December, by which the brewery was conveyed to and vested in the Breweries Company, the total purchase-money being paid by Dunn to Molleson. Now, my Lords, it appears to me that the very terms of the 10th article of the contract shew that it is only providing as a matter of contract between the parties for what is to take place between the making of this contract and the disposition in implement of it. It is true that there is no limitation in terms of the time during which this 10th clause is to operate, but it appears to me that that time is necessarily ascertained by the terms of the clause,—“In the event of its being ascertained that this is not the fact” (that is, that such profits are not made), “this arrangement shall be at an end, and the second party shall be bound to repay the said sum of £3700.” That is the sum which would be payable prior to the execution of the conveyance; it was “this arrangement,” this contract, which was to be at an end, and it was this sum which was to be repaid.

No. 3.

Mar. 9, 1894.
Edinburgh
United Breweries,
Limited, v.
Molleson.

Now, it seems to me that that shews as plainly as anything can, that the contract did not provide for the insertion in the disposition of any clause making that disposition void if the profits were ascertained to be less than was stated; but what both of the parties contemplated was, that the time given down to the 31st of December would be sufficient for ascertaining whether the alleged or suggested profits had been made, and within that time no doubt the arrangement would have come to an end in accordance with clause 10, if it had been ascertained that the alleged profit had not been made. But when this disposition was executed the contract ceased to be in fieri, and the rights of the parties fell to be ascertained from the terms of the disposition. It is not at all infrequent for an agreement to contain stipulations which find no place in the subsequent disposition, but the rights of the parties must be ascertained by the disposition executed in implement of the contract and not by the contract which contemplates that implement. When once the disposition is executed, it seems to me that, as a general rule (of course I am not saying there may not be exceptions), the rights under the contract come to an end. In this case I think that the very terms of article 10 are inconsistent with the continuance of it, or, at all events, that it is inapplicable to the period after the disposition has been executed. It appears to me, therefore, that, assuming that all the rights, including this right, under clause 10, were passed by Dunn to the United Breweries Company by his agreement with them of the 14th of December, yet after the execution of the conveyance of the 31st of December it ceased to be possible for them to rest upon this 10th clause as making that transaction void, and of course that transaction is the one which they seek to set aside. No doubt, if there had been any fraud, if there had been misrepresentation, it would have been open to Dunn, notwithstanding the execution of the conveyance, to set aside the conveyance and to put an end to the transaction altogether. That is not for a moment disputed, and, in truth, the stress which has been laid upon this 10th clause and the allegation that it contains a contractual right which was passed on to the Breweries Company and which still exists, have resulted from the difficulty in which the appellants felt themselves by reason of the circumstance that it is not Dunn who is now seeking to set aside the contract, but that it is the United Breweries Company, in truth, who are now the owners of the subject of it.

Therefore, in my opinion, the first ground upon which the appellants rested their case fails in point of fact; on the true construction of this 10th clause

United Breweries,
Limited, v.
Molleson.

there is nothing upon which they can now rest as a contractual right created by it.

But then it is said that Dunn was led to take this disposition instead of asserting any right which he might have under the 10th clause, by reason of misrepresentation on the part of Molleson—that the books which were examined by the accountants must be taken to have been represented by Molleson as proper and genuine books, and that inasmuch as they were not so, Dunn would be entitled as against Molleson to rescind or obtain reduction of the conveyance. My Lords, I will for the present purpose assume that to have been the case; but the question is, Can there now be reduction in this suit at the instance of the present pursuers under the circumstances which exist? Dunn, in point of fact, parted with the property, and the conveyance was made at his instance to other people in pursuance of a contract of sale by him to them at a profit. Would Dunn then be in a position, having parted with the property and having parted with it at a profit, to come into Court and say,—“I am entitled to claim that this contract shall be reduced”? It is said that he has that right, because although he has parted with the property, the persons who are the present owners of the property, and who took from him, are brought also into Court as co-pursuers, so that the two together, at all events, could restore the subject-matter to Molleson. Does that give them a title to sue?

Now, even if it be admitted that if where a person who has purchased through a misrepresentation has resold, those representations have been repeated by him to the persons to whom he has resold, in such a manner as that they could impeach the transaction as against him, in that case, even without an actual reduction of the resale, the transaction might be reduced as against the original seller—even admitting that, it appears to me that no such case is really made here, either upon the pleadings, or, as far as I can see, upon the facts. The learned Judge, Lord McLaren, states more than once in his judgment that it was admitted that the contract of Dunn with the company was neither impeachable nor impeached; but whether that was admitted or not it seems clear, when one looks at the pleadings, that no such case was set up. It is quite true that in the 8th condescendence it is stated that “the information obtained from the sellers by Mr Dunn, with reference to the assets and past profits of the said business, was communicated to the pursuers, the Edinburgh United Breweries, Limited.” But the 9th condescendence, up to which that leads, sets up this case, that Mr Molleson “either knew, or ought to have known, that the” balance-sheets “were false and were fraudulently concocted, in order to shew said excessive profits. Whilst in that position he handed the said false balance-sheets to the pursuers” (that is, the United Breweries Company and Dunn) “for the purpose of getting them to enter into the contract in question” (the contract in question appears from the context to mean the one of the 11th of November 1889) “on the basis of the profits thereby shewn. Mr Molleson thereby induced the pursuers, by false and fraudulent representations, to enter into the said contract.” Now, it is obvious that the case there set up is that, the transaction of the 11th of November, though nominally Dunn’s, was really not only that of Dunn, but that of Dunn and the United Breweries Company. Of that there is not only no proof, but it is completely disproved; but that is the case set up upon the pleadings, and it is nowhere alleged that Dunn entered into the contract with the United Breweries Company under such circumstances, and with such representations, that as against him they are entitled to set aside the contract and claim reduction. For aught that appears upon these pleadings Dunn may be quite prepared, as between him and them, to stand by the contract, although he may be willing to assist them in restoring the brewery to Mr Molleson, and getting back the £20,500. It is not alleged anywhere that his contract with them is impeachable; no circumstances are shewn raising any such case.

Edinburgh
United Breweries,
Limited, v.
Molleson.

And, my Lords, when we come to the evidence which was read to us by the Solicitor-General yesterday, we know very little of what the transaction was as between Dunn and the company; but I certainly do not think it can be said to have been made out in any way that this contract could have been impeached as between Dunn and the company. It is said that the representations which were made by Molleson to Dunn were passed on by him to the company. Now, I think that that mode of stating the facts involves a fallacy. It may be that representations made to one are passed on, as it is said, by him to another; but they do not become, and are not necessarily, the same representations as were made to the person who originally received them.

It is said (and on that the whole case rests) that Molleson must be taken to have represented to Dunn that the books handed to him for inspection were genuine and properly kept books; but it is impossible to say that there is any evidence of any representation made by Dunn to the company which can be treated as a representation that the books tendered by Molleson were in fact genuine. It is rational enough to hold that, as against Molleson, that is the effect of his handing over the books; but when Dunn informs those to whom he is selling, as he obviously did by shewing them the contract, that the books to be examined by the accountants are the books handed over by Molleson, and when he hands to them the result of the accountants' inspection of those books, the utmost representation which he can be taken to have made is this,—Here is the report of the accountants whom I have employed as to what is shewn by the books which Molleson handed over to those accountants as the books of the business. Beyond that, it seems to me to be impossible to say that any representation was made by Dunn to the United Breweries Company. Therefore, it appears to me that in the present case there is really no foundation laid for impeaching this contract as between Dunn and the United Breweries Company, even if (upon which I express no opinion) it would have been enough to shew that the contract was impeachable, and if it would not have been necessary, before such a proceeding as this was instituted, to have had it impeached and put an end to. I express no opinion upon that; but at all events I think that the foundation is altogether wanting unless the case can be brought up to that point.

I ought perhaps to add one other observation in connection with what I have just said, namely, that I must certainly not be taken as assenting to the view, or as expressing any opinion upon it, that if a person who has been induced by misrepresentation to buy a property has parted with that property, and if he can get back that property in any way so as to put himself in a position to restore it, he is then always in a position to claim reduction of the contract into which he was led by misrepresentation.

For these reasons, I move that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—Although I have come to the same conclusion as regards the Limited, v.

Molleson.

result with the learned Judges of the First Division, I am not in a position to give an unqualified assent to all that has been expressed in the judgment of Lord M'Laren, who delivered the opinion of the Court; and that for two reasons; in the first place, because I have not heard argument or made up my mind upon many points discussed in his judgment which it is unnecessary to advert to now; and also because upon those points on which we have heard argument, I am not prepared to concur with all that fell from Lord M'Laren.

It appears to me to be very necessary to keep in view the position of the three parties who appear upon the scene in this appeal, Mr Molleson, Mr Dunn, and the company. The contract sought to be set aside, which was implemented by a conveyance to the company, was a contract to which Mr Molleson and Mr Dunn were the only parties. There was no privity between Molleson and the company, and in conveying to them Molleson simply fulfilled the obligation, which he had undertaken to Dunn, to make a conveyance to his nominee. The deed of conveyance is the only contract between Mr Molleson and the company. By the ordinary rule of law, the moment a conveyance is accepted as in implement of the obligations of a contract, the original contract is at an end, and the conveyance constitutes the only contract between the parties.

In this appeal two grounds are urged for the rescission of the original contract by Mr Dunn and also by the company, because they sue together, and if either has shewn a good title for rescinding the contract upon restitution the appellants must prevail. Now, what is the position of Mr Dunn? He made a remunerative sale, and he has no interest in the brewery, which was the subject of these dealings; and if he made a valid contract of sale to the company to be followed by a conveyance in virtue of his contract with Mr Molleson, it humbly appears to me that his title to challenge this transaction with the respondent came to an end the moment the conveyance was completed.

I do not concur with some observations of Lord M'Laren to the effect that although the contract between him and the company might not be reducible, Dunn might by some arrangement with the Company be enabled to bring an action for rescission upon tendering restitution. It may be that if the contract had been thrown back upon his hands by the company, and was reducible at their instance in a question with him, he would have been remanded to his original position and have been entitled to any remedy which he could have pursued before he parted with the brewery; but unless the sale by him to the company was reducible by them upon legal grounds, it appears to me that Mr Dunn could not have rehabilitated himself so as to revive in his favour a remedy against the seller to him. I am assuming for the purposes of this case that Mr Molleson did make representations which would have entitled Mr Dunn, so long as he retained the brewery, to the remedy of rescission. Upon that point I, of course, desire to express no opinion, because, although the Court below has dealt with and expressed an opinion upon the point, I certainly do not feel inclined to concur upon a matter which obviously presents questions of delicacy and difficulty without having heard a full argument.

Therefore, it appears to me that Mr Dunn as a pursuer is out of the case; he had no title in his own right, and I do not see how his concurrence can in the least degree aid the title of the company.

That title is rested upon two different grounds; one of them is the supposed transmission to them of a conventional stipulation which gives them a right to rescind the contract; the other is a ground dehors the contract, which rests apparently upon the transmission by Dunn to the company, in his dealings with the company itself, of the representations made to him by Mr Molleson. As to the first, the conventional ground, I can only say that there does not appear to me to exist any right of rescission which could be conveyed to the company by Dunn. The agreement conveys from Mr Dunn to the company all his rights under the contract, and one of these rights is said to be contained in article 10 of the contract. The terms of that article have been fully explained by my noble and learned friend, the Lord Chancellor, and in my opinion they do not amount to a condition, resolute of the contract when concluded by payment of the price and disposition of the property. They apply merely to the interval of time which the parties apprehended would elapse between the making of the antecedent contract and the conveyance which was to follow in execution of it, and they expired by efflux of time.

The next ground pleaded assumes that this contract of sale by Dunn to the company was reducible at the instance of the latter, because the representations made by Mr Molleson to Mr Dunn were transmitted, and handed on by Mr Dunn to the company. In the first place, my Lords, there is no record for that. It is perfectly obvious that before the First Division at least, whether the counsel meant it or not, they must have expressed themselves in terms which led the Court to understand that Mr Dunn was holding by his £8000 under his contract with the company. Whether that impression was right or not it is not for me to say; the question is not brought before us. But I think it right to add that although the record was supplemented in argument by a verbal condescendence by the Solicitor-General, nothing that he said was calculated to suggest that any relevant case could be made by the appellants for setting aside the agreement with Mr Dunn.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I entirely concur, and think the contentions of the appellants wholly untenable.

Ship—Collision—Regulations for preventing collisions at sea under Order of Council, 11th August 1884, articles 15, 18, 19, and 21.—The steamships "Thorsa" and "Otto" were approaching each other end-on, or nearly so, in daylight in the Sound. When they were a mile apart the "Thorsa" signalled in manner provided by the 19th article of the Regulations for preventing collisions at sea of 1884,* that she was (in terms of article 15 of these Regulations

The "Otto" heard, but disregarded the signal, and kept her course. When the ships were within half a mile, the "Thorsa" repeated the signal, and again ported her helm. The "Otto" immediately thereafter starboarded her helm, bringing her head to port, and shaped a course across the bows of the "Thorsa." The "Thorsa" immediately stopped and reversed her engines, but a collision took place, and the "Otto" sank.

In cross actions by the owners of the vessels, the owners of the "Otto," while admitting that their vessel had been in fault, maintained that the "Thorsa" had also been in fault, in respect that she did not stop and reverse her engines when the risk of collision first became apparent.

Held (aff. judgment of Second Division) that no fault was attributable to the "Thorsa," in respect (1) that it was proved that at her second porting the "Thorsa" had done enough to determine the risk of collision if the "Otto" had kept her course; and (2) that she had complied with article 18, as she had stopped and reversed as soon as it became apparent that it was "necessary" so to do, i.e., when the "Otto" changed her course so as to cross the bows of the "Thorsa."

The respondents appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session. The Lord Ordinary found that both the "Otto" and the "Thorsa" were to blame for a collision by which the "Otto" was sunk. The Inner-House, reversing this judgment, held that the "Otto" alone was to blame, and that the "Thorsa" was not to blame. No attempt has been made to impeach the finding of the Court below with regard to the "Otto," and indeed any such attempt would have been useless, because it is perfectly clear that the "Otto" was very seriously to blame.

The vessels were proceeding upon, generally speaking, opposite courses, the one up and the other down. The "Otto" had left her pilot at Elsinore and was proceeding towards the Lappegrund lightship. Shortly before the time with which your Lordships have to deal a vessel called the "James Malam," which was coming in the same direction as the "Otto" and had passed her, also passed the "Thorsa." Those two vessels passed starboard to starboard. After a manœuvre by the "Thorsa" had been executed for the purpose of passing clear of the "James Malam," the view taken by the Lord Ordinary and by the Inner-House is that the two vessels, the "Thorsa" and the "Otto," were end-on, or nearly end-on. The "Thorsa" blew one blast, in order to indicate to the "Otto" that she was going to the starboard. She ported her helm in accordance with the indication which she had given by her whistle; and there seems to be no question that the sound of her whistle was heard on board the "Otto." There is some doubt as to whether the "Otto" at that time had ceased starboarding (she undoubtedly had been starboarding) and was keeping a steady course, or whether she was altering her course. It is not so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed or stop and reverse if necessary." (Article 19) "In taking any course authorised or required by these regulations a steamship under way may indicate that course to any other ship which she has in sight by the following signals on her steam whistle, viz., one short blast to mean 'I am directing my course to starboard.'" (Article 21) "In narrow channels every steamship shall, when it is safe and practicable, keep to that side of the fairway or midchannel which lies on the starboard side of each ship."

necessary to determine that question. According to the account of the master of the "Otto," she was keeping a steady course. No. 4.

The "Thorsa," observing that the "Otto" was coming towards her and was not executing the corresponding manœuvre which the master of the "Thorsa" had been led to expect she would execute, blew the whistle again, and again ported. Almost immediately afterwards the "Otto" hard-a-starboarded, coming across the "Thorsa." It is not disputed that as soon as that manœuvre was observed the master of the "Thorsa" directed that her engines should be stopped and reversed, and that his order was obeyed; and no complaint is made of the conduct of the master of the "Thorsa" in not stopping and reversing earlier than he did after the hard-a-starboarding manœuvre was observed. But it is said (and this is the only case now made against the "Thorsa") that she ought to have stopped and reversed at an earlier period; that when, at some time between the first whistle and the second, the master of the "Thorsa" saw that the "Otto" was not so manœuvring as to bring her port side to port side, it ought to have been seen then that there was a risk of collision, and that accordingly then the master of the "Thorsa" ought to have stopped and reversed.

Mar. 13, 1894.
Wilson, Sons,
& Co. v.
Currie.

The "Thorsa."

Now, it is by no means clear upon the evidence that, supposing the two vessels had kept their courses after the first whistle, and that last manœuvre, the hard-a-starboarding of the "Otto," had never taken place, the two vessels under those circumstances would not have passed each other without collision, or danger. That they would have done so is stated by the master of the "Thorsa." Sir Walter Phillimore, on behalf of the appellants, suggests that they would have passed very close to one another, that it would have been a very fine thing, and that it would have been doubtful whether they would have passed clear. But it appears to me that the case of the "Thorsa" does not rest, and ought not to be rested, solely upon the question thus put. The master of the "Thorsa" a second time gave a signal to the "Otto" that he was intending to go to the starboard. Now, it is not denied that the vessels were able to see one another. They were manœuvring with the knowledge, as far as vessels ever can have it, of what was going on in the meantime; and if the story of the "Thorsa," which has been practically accepted by the Court below, is anything like correct, namely, that the two vessels, supposing their courses had not been changed, would have passed clear, although it might have been a near thing, it is obvious that under these circumstances, if the "Otto" had taken the step she ought, instead of starboarding when she got that second signal, there would have been no collision whatsoever.

Now, under the circumstances which existed, it appears to me that the master of the "Thorsa" was justified in giving that second signal before taking any other step, and that he was justified in porting after giving that second signal to see whether the master of the "Otto" would not manœuvre in the manner in which proper navigation demanded that he should. Considering that it is by no means clear that the two vessels would not have passed each other with perfect safety if they had kept their courses, the master of the "Thorsa" was not bound to stop and reverse, but had a right to see whether the master of the "Otto" was going to manœuvre as he ought to have done. As soon as he saw that the "Otto" had starboarded, he stopped and reversed. It appears to me certain that in this case the rule which has been relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellants has not been violated by the "Thorsa,"

No. 4. and that she is consequently not to blame. I certainly do not desire to countenance the idea that a vessel is entitled to run the matter very fine and to go on until the last moment before stopping and reversing; but in the present case it seems to me that the master of the "Thorsa," knowing the facts which existed, and in the circumstances which had been observed by him, acted as reasonably as a seaman could, and did not fail in his duty in any way whatsoever.

The "Thorsa."

For these reasons I move that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—Was the master of the "Thorsa" when he ported a second time justified in assuming that the action of his helm would be sufficient to determine the risk of collision with the "Otto" without the necessity of stopping and reversing? The decision of this appeal one way or another depends, in my opinion, upon the answer to be given to that question. I have no difficulty in answering the question in the same way as the learned Judges of the Second Division have practically done. I do not think the master of the "Thorsa" was bound to assume that the "Otto," though she had disregarded his first would pay no attention to his second signal, and would not keep out of the way by going to the starboard. Upon the evidence, which on that point is all one way, I see little reason to doubt that had the "Otto," after the second signal from the "Thorsa," kept on her course, the vessels would have passed clear of each other. The collision was, in my opinion, entirely due to the unseamanlike navigation of the "Otto"; and I am therefore of opinion that the judgment appealed from ought to be affirmed.

LORD HALSBURY.—I am of the same opinion. There are two vessels practically on opposite courses, both intending to pass the lightship at about the same point; and the only blame that can be properly attributed to the "Thorsa" is that she did not stop and reverse in time to prevent the collision. That of course is a question which must always depend upon the circumstances of the particular case, and I am not helped by any canon which has been laid down beyond this, that people must behave reasonably with respect to the course they are pursuing when they come into proximity to each other, which may be the result of the course they are following. Looking at what the "Thorsa" did, it appears to me that she acted reasonably throughout. There was no reason why she should not keep on the course she was pursuing; and when she gave a signal which was not attended to, and gave a second signal, I think she might calculate that a seaman using ordinary care would attend to it. The time, of course, becomes very material. So far as I can form a judgment of the time that elapsed, when at last it was apparent to the master of the "Thorsa" that the master of the "Otto" was going to manoeuvre as he ought not to have done, the former did what he ought to have done—he stopped and reversed; but it was too late to prevent the collision, which I think was caused by the persistent conduct of the master of the "Otto" throughout.

Contract—Construction—Foreign—Arbitration—Locus solutionis.—Where a personal contract is entered into between persons residing in different countries where different systems of law prevail, the intention of the parties as expressed or implied in the contract will determine the system by which the whole or any part of the contract is to be interpreted and governed.

A mutual contract between an English and a Scots firm to be implemented in Scotland was signed in London and contained this clause:—"Should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way."

The Scots firm, after using arrestments in Scotland against the English firm to found jurisdiction, raised an action against them for breach of contract.

The defenders pleaded that the action was excluded by the clause of reference.

The First Division held (1) that the validity and effect of the contract fell to be determined by the law of Scotland, the locus solutionis; (2) that the arbitration clause could not be regarded as a separate contract, the locus solutionis of which was in England; and (3) that the reference to unnamed arbiters was by the law of Scotland invalid.

In an appeal held (in rev. the judgment) (1) that the arbitration clause fell to be construed and governed by the law of England, as its terms shewed that that was the intention of the parties; (2) that by the law of England it was valid; and (3) that there was no principle of public policy to prevent the Courts of Scotland from giving it effect.

(In the Court of Session 30th November 1893, reported in the present vol. p. 204.)

By memorandum of agreement, dated 27th January 1892, between Roderick Kemp & Company, of Talisker Distillery, Carbost, Skye (now represented by "The Talisker Distillery"), and Hamlyn & Company, merchants, London, Roderick Kemp & Company agreed to sell and Hamlyn & Company agreed to buy all grains made by Kemp & Company at a certain price, and further, to supply and erect at the distillery a patent grain drying machine, which Kemp & Company agreed to keep in proper working order, "supplying all steam and labour, &c. necessary for properly drying the grains for the said Hamlyn & Company, and will bag up in the said Hamlyn & Company's sacks and deliver the grains f.o.b. Carbost, to their order." The contract was to be in force for ten years from the date of the erection of the machine.

The agreement contained the following clause,—“Should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way.”

The memorandum of agreement was signed by the parties in London.

In March 1893 the Talisker Distillery, after having arrested ad fund. some sacks belonging to Hamlyn & Company, raised an action against them concluding for declarator that the defenders were bound to purchase all grains made by the pursuers for ten years from 27th October 1892, and for payment of £3000 for breach of contract, in respect that the defenders had failed to provide a proper drying machine, and that they now sought to repudiate the agreement to purchase the grains made by the pursuers.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—The action is excluded by the clause of reference in the said memorandum of agreement.

v. Talisker Distillery.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) repelled this plea, and allowed a proof. On 30th November 1893 the First Division (diss. Lord Kinnear, the Lord President absent) adhered to his interlocutor. The defenders appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—On the 27th of January 1892 an agreement was entered into between Roderick Kemp & Co. of the Talisker Distillery, Carbost, Isle of Skye, and Hamlyn & Co. of London, under which Hamlyn & Co. were to supply to the distillery a patent drying machine which was to be worked by the distillery company, who were to bag up and deliver to Hamlyn & Co. dried grain free on board at Carbost to their order or otherwise as required. The agreement concludes with a clause in the following terms:—"Should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way." This agreement was made between the parties in England.

Shortly after the contract was entered into Alexander Grigor Allan became the sole partner in the firm of Roderick Kemp & Co., and the present action was instituted by him in Scotland in respect of an alleged breach of the contract. The defenders pleaded that the Court of Session had "no jurisdiction," and that "the action is excluded by the clause of reference in the memorandum of agreement." These pleas were repelled by the Lord Ordinary, and his judgment was affirmed by Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren, in the Inner-House, Lord Kinnear dissenting. During the course of the litigation the pursuer died, and is now represented by the respondents.

It is not in controversy that the arbitration clause is, according to the law of England, a valid and binding contract between the parties, nor that according to the law of Scotland it is wholly invalid inasmuch as the arbiters are not named. The view taken by the majority of the Court below is thus expressed by Lord Adam: "So far as I see, nothing required to be done in England in implement of the contract. That being so, I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the construction and effect of the agreement, and of all and each of its stipulations, is to be determined by the lex loci solutionis, that is, by the law of Scotland."

It is not denied that the conclusion thus arrived at renders the arbitration clause wholly inoperative, and thus defeats the expressed intention of the parties, but this is treated as inevitably following from the rule of law that the rights of the parties must be wholly determined by the lex loci solutionis. I am not able altogether to agree with the view taken by the learned Lord that everything required to be done in implement of the contract was to be done in Scotland, inasmuch as it appears to me that the arbitration clause which I have read to your Lordships does not indicate that that part of the contract between the parties was to be implemented by performance in Scotland. That clause is as much a part of the contract as any other clause of the contract, and certainly there is nothing on the face of it to indicate, but quite the contrary, that it was in the contemplation of the parties that it should be implemented in Scotland.

The learned Judges in the Court below treat the lex loci solutionis of the main portion of the contract as conclusively determining that all the rights of the parties under the contract must be governed by the law of that place. I am unable to agree with them in this conclusion. Where a contract is entered into between parties residing in different places, where different systems of law prevail, it is a question, as it appears to me, in each case, with reference to what law the parties contracted, and according to what law it was their intention that their rights either under the whole or any part of the contract should be determined. In considering what law is to govern, no doubt the lex loci solutionis is a matter of great importance. The lex loci contractus is also of importance. In the present case the place of the contract was different from the place of its performance. It is not necessary to enter upon the inquiry, which was a good deal discussed at the bar, to which of these considerations the greatest weight is to be attributed, namely, the place where the contract was made, or the place where it is to be performed. In my view they are both matters which must be taken into consideration, but neither of them is, of itself, conclusive, and still less is it conclusive, as it appears to me, as to the particular law which was intended to govern particular parts of the contract between the parties. In this case, as in all such cases, the whole of the contract must be looked at and the rights under it must be regulated by the intention of the parties as appearing from the contract. It is perfectly competent to those who, under such circumstances as I have indicated are entering into a contract, to indicate by the terms which they employ which system of law they intend to be applied to the construction of the contract and to the determination of the rights arising out of it.

Now in the present case it appears to me that the language of the arbitration clause indicates very clearly that the parties intended that the rights under that clause should be determined according to the law of England. As I have said, the contract was made there; one of the parties was residing there. Where under such circumstances the parties agree that any dispute arising out of their contract shall be "settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way," it seems to me that they have indicated as clearly as it is possible their intention that that particular stipulation, which is a part of the contract between them, shall be interpreted according to and governed by the law, not of Scotland but of England, and I am aware of nothing which stands in the way of the intention of the parties, thus indicated by the contract they entered into, being carried into effect. As I have already pointed out, the contract with reference to arbitration would have been absolutely null and void if it were to be governed by the law of Scotland. That cannot have been the intention of the parties; it is not reasonable to attribute that intention to them if the contract may be otherwise construed; and, for the reasons which I have given, I see no difficulty whatever in construing the language used as an indication that the contract, or that term of it, was to be governed and regulated by the law of England.

But then it is said that the Scotch Court is asked to enforce a law which is against the public policy of the law of Scotland, and that although the parties may have so contracted, the Courts in Scotland cannot be bound to enforce a contract which is against the policy of their law. I should be prepared to admit that an agreement which was opposed to a fundamental principle of the law of Scotland founded on considerations of public policy could not be relied upon and insisted upon in the Courts of Scotland; and if, according to the law of Scotland, the Courts never allowed their jurisdiction to try the merits of a case to be interfered with by an arbitration clause, there would be considerable force in the contention which was urged by the respondents. But that is not the case. The Courts in Scotland recognise the right of the parties to a contract to determine that any disputes under it shall be settled, not in the ordinary course of litigation, but by an arbitration tribunal selected by the parties. If in the present case the arbitrators had been named, the Courts in Scotland would have recognised and given effect to and enforced the arbitration clause, and would by reason of it have declined to enter upon a trial of the merits of the case. That being so, I have been unable to understand upon what fundamental principle of public policy the rule can be said to rest that where an arbitrator is not named an agreement between the parties to refer a matter to arbitration ought not to be enforced.

It is not necessary to inquire into the history of the distinction which has arisen in the Courts of Scotland between arbitration clauses where arbiters are named and clauses with an unnamed arbiter. It is sufficient to say that when once it is admitted, as it must be, that the Courts of Scotland do enforce and give effect to an arbitration clause, and hold their hands from the determination of the merits by reason of the parties having agreed upon it, it seems to me to follow that if this arbitration clause is to be interpreted according to the law of England, and is therefore a valid arbitration clause, there is no reason why the Courts in Scotland should not give effect to it just as much as if it were a valid arbitration clause according to the law of Scotland.

But then it is argued that an agreement to refer disputes to arbitration deals with the remedy and not with the rights of the parties, and that consequently the forum being Scotch the parties cannot by reason of the agreement into which they have entered interfere with the ordinary course of proceedings in the Courts of Scotland. Stated generally, I should not dispute that proposition so far as it lays down that the parties cannot, in a case where the merits fall to be determined in the Scotch Courts, insist, by virtue of an agreement, that those Courts shall depart from their ordinary course of procedure. But that is not really the question which has to be determined in the present case. The question which has to be determined is whether it is a case in which the Courts of Scotland ought to entertain the merits and adjudicate upon them. If it were such a case, then no doubt the ordinary course of procedure in the Scotch Courts would have to be followed; but the preliminary question has to be determined, whether, by virtue of a valid clause of arbitration, the proper course is for the Courts in Scotland not to adjudicate upon the merits of the case, but to leave the matter to be determined by the tribunal to which the parties have agreed to refer it. Viewed in that light, I can see no difficulty; and the argument that to give effect to this arbitration clause would interfere with the course of procedure in the forum in which the action is pending seems to me entirely to fail. For these reasons I move that the judgment appealed from be reversed.

The question then arises, what course should be taken in the present case, whether the action should be stayed until the arbitration is completed, or whether the House should make an order remitting the cause to be determined pursuant to the arbitration clause. I am quite satisfied, upon that part of the case, with the suggestion which will be made by my noble and learned friend who will follow me (Lord Watson), and I think that there is really no difficulty in the manner in which he proposes to give effect to the contract between the parties.

LORD WATSON.—This action was brought in the Court of Session by a Scotch distiller, who died during its dependence, and is now represented by the respondents, against the appellant firm, who are merchants in London, concluding for damages in respect of their breach of a mercantile contract. For the purposes of this appeal, it is sufficient to say that the contract which was made in England, but fell to be mutually performed in Scotland, contains this provision:—"Should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way."

In defence the appellants pleaded,—“(1) No jurisdiction; (2) The action is excluded by the clause of reference.” Both pleas were exclusively founded upon the agreement to refer. They were repelled by the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), and, in the First Division, by Lords Adam and M'Laren, Lord Kinnear dissenting. The learned Judges of the majority were of opinion, with the Lord Ordinary, that, inasmuch as Scotland was admittedly the locus solutionis the whole stipulations of the contract, including the clause of reference, must be governed by Scotch law. In that view, the agreement to refer, being to arbiters unnamed, was plainly invalid; and their Lordships accordingly sent the case to proof before the Lord Ordinary.

With reference to the two pleas which have been repelled, I wish to observe that, although they seem to have become stereotyped in cases like the present, they do not correctly represent the rights of a defender who relies upon a valid contract to submit the matter in dispute to arbitration. The jurisdiction of the Court is not wholly ousted by such a contract. It deprives the Court of jurisdiction to inquire into and decide the merits of the case, while it leaves the Court free to entertain the suit, and to pronounce a decree in conformity with the award of the arbiter. Should the arbitration from any cause prove abortive, the full jurisdiction of the Court will revive, to the effect of enabling it to hear and determine the action upon its merits. When a binding reference is pleaded in limine, the proper course to take is either to refer the question in dispute to the arbiter named or to stay procedure until it has been settled by arbitration. The latter course was adopted in Caledonian Railway Company v. Greenock and Wemyss Bay Railway Company,¹ where the reference was to arbiters unnamed, but had been confirmed by statute. I cite that case, not as establishing, but as illustrating the rule of procedure, which was in force long before its date.

The first question in this appeal is, whether the law of England or the law of Scotland applies to the interpretation of the clause of reference. If the law of Scotland must prevail, the judgments appealed from are unimpeachable. If, on the other hand, the contract must be governed by English law, the clause of reference is obligatory according to that law, and in that event the further question arises, whether the Courts of Scotland ought to give the same effect to it as if it had been a binding Scotch covenant.

Upon the first of these questions I have been unable to arrive at the same conclusion with the Courts below. When two parties living under different systems of law enter into a personal contract, which of the systems must be applied to its construction depends upon their mutual intention, either as expressed in their contract, or as derivable by fair implication from its terms. In the absence of any other clear expression of their intention, it is necessary and legitimate to take into account the circumstances attendant upon the making of the contract and the course of performing its stipulations contemplated by the parties, and amongst these considerations, the locus contractus and the locus solutionis have always been regarded as of importance, although English and Scotch decisions differ in regard to the relative weight which ought to be attributed to them when the place of contracting is in one forum and the place of performance in another. In the present case it does not appear to me to be necessary to discuss the relative value of these considerations, because, in my opinion, the clause of reference is expressed in terms which clearly indicate that the parties had in contemplation and agreed that it should be interpreted according to the rules of English law. If they had stipulated that all disputes arising out of the contract were to be decided in the Court of Session, I should have been of opinion that they had in view the principles of Scotch law, and meant that their mutual stipulations should be construed according to these principles. And to my mind their selection from the membership of a commercial body in London of a conventional tribunal which is to act "in the usual way," or, in other words, in the manner which is customary in London, indicates, not less conclusively, that in agreeing to such an arbitration they were contracting with reference to the law of England.

Upon the assumption that the contract must be read in the light of English law, the respondents maintained that, in so far as concerns the agreement to refer, that law is inadmissible. They argued that the agreement relates, not to the substance of the contract, but to the remedy which the parties were to pursue; and that according to a well-known principle of general law, all questions touching the remedy must be decided according to the rules of the forum in which the remedy is sought. They also contended that the Court of Session were not bound to recognise any reference to unnamed arbiters, whatever might be its validity elsewhere, to the effect of excluding their own jurisdiction, because its recognition would be contrary to the policy of Scotch law. Neither of these contentions is, in my opinion, well founded.

It has never, so far as I am aware, been seriously disputed that, whatever may be the domicile of a contract, any Court which has jurisdiction to entertain an action upon it must, in the exercise of that jurisdiction, be guided by what are termed the curial rules of the lex fori, such as those which relate to procedure or to proof. Don v. Lippman,¹ which is the leading Scotch authority upon the point, has settled that these rules include local laws relating to prescription or limitation. But all the rules noticed by Lord Brougham in his elaborate judgment as belonging to that class refer to the action of the Court in investigating the merits of a suit in which jurisdiction has been already established. I can find no authority, and none was cited to us, to the effect that, in dealing with the prejudicial question whether it has jurisdiction to try the merits of the cause, the Court ought to disregard an agreement to refer which is pars contractus, and binding according to the law of the contract, because it would not be valid if tested by the lex fori. Without clear authority, I am not prepared to affirm a rule which does not appear to me to be recommended by any considerations of principle or expediency. One result of its adoption would be that, if two persons domiciled in England made a contract there containing the same clause of reference which occurs in this case, either of them could avoid the reference by bringing an action before a Scotch Court, if the other happened to be temporarily resident in Scotland, or to have personal estate in that country capable of being arrested.

v. Taffaker Distillery.

The second reason advanced by the respondents for denying effect to the reference would have been more plausible if it had been the law of Scotland that no private agreement could exclude, to any extent, the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals. I am not disposed to hold that Scotch Courts are bound to give effect to every stipulation in a foreign contract, unless it is shewn to be contra bonos mores, in the sense of the law which they administer. There may be stipulations which, though not tainted with immorality, are yet in such direct conflict with deeply-rooted and important considerations of local policy, that her Courts would be justified in declining to recognise them. But the law of Scotland has, from the earliest times, permitted private parties to exclude the merits of any dispute between them from the consideration of the Court by simply naming their arbiter. The rule that a reference to arbiters not named cannot be enforced does not appear to me to rest upon any essential considerations of public policy. Even if an opposite inference were deducible from the authorities by which it was established, the rule has been so largely trenched upon by the legislation of the last fifty years, both in general and in local and personal Acts, that I should hesitate to affirm that the policy upon which it was originally based could now be regarded as of cardinal importance.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be reversed, and the cause remitted, with directions to sist procedure in hoc statu, in order that the matters in dispute may be settled by arbitration in terms of the contract. Such an order will leave the parties at liberty, in the course of the reference, to avail themselves of the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and will enable the Court of Session, in the event of any lapse of the reference, to dispose of the merits of the case.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur.

The substantial question to be determined is whether the law of Scotland or the law of England is to be applied to the interpretation of the arbitration clause in question. One of the parties was a Scotch distiller, and the parties on the other side were merchants in London. The contract was made in England, and was (apart from the arbitration clause) to be performed in Scotland. That clause, set out in the case, is of the highest importance. There is no absolute rule of law as to the way in which the intention of the parties to a contract with reference to the law of a particular place is to be ascertained. Were it not for the arbitration clause, I should assent to the conclusion that the parties contracted solely with a view to the application of the law of Scotland. Having regard, however, to the terms of that clause, I am led to the conclusion that the parties intended that it should be interpreted by the rules of the law of England alone. A contract which provided that disputes "should be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way," distinctly introduces a reference to well-known laws regulating such arbitrations, and those must be the laws of England. This interpretation gives due and full effect to every portion of the contract; whereas the arbitration clause becomes mere waste paper if it is held that the parties were contracting on the basis of the application of the law of Scotland, which would at once refuse to acknowledge the full efficacy of a clause so framed. It

No. 5. is more reasonable to hold that the parties contracted with the common intention of giving entire effect to every clause, rather than of mutilating or destroying one of the most important provisions.

LORD MACNAGHTEN and LORD MORRIS concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am also of opinion that the appeal in this case should be sustained, and the judgment complained of reversed for the reasons which have already been so fully stated, and which it would serve no good purpose to repeat. From the terms in which the clause of reference is expressed in a contract, to which, it must be observed, a firm of merchants in London, and carrying on business there, is one of the parties, I think it is to be inferred to be pari contractus that the agreement which it contained for the settlement of disputes which might arise out of the contract was to be interpreted and governed by the law of England; and I am further of opinion that there are no such considerations of public policy at the basis of the rule of Scottish law in reference to the necessity of arbiters being named in order to create a binding obligation to refer, as can warrant the Courts in Scotland, in an action brought there, in refusing to give effect to the law and practice as to arbitrations in England. In accordance with the ordinary practice in Scotland, I think that procedure in the present action should be stayed to allow the arbitration to be proceeded with in England, as provided by the contract.

ORDERED and adjudged that the said interlocutors of the 6th of July 1893 and the 30th of November 1893, complained of in the said appeal, be reversed: Further ordered, that the cause be, and the same is hereby, remitted to the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland with directions to sist procedure in hoc statu, in order that the matters in dispute may be settled by arbitration in terms of the contract constituted by a "memorandum of agreement between Messrs Roderick Kemp & Company," &c. The respondents were further ordered to pay to the appellants their expenses in the Court of Session from the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and the expenses in the appeal.

Revenue—Legacy-duty—36 Geo. III. c. 52, secs. 12 and 19—Moveable estate directed to be invested in lands to be entailed—"Estate of inheritance."—Section 19 of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, enacts,—“That any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate, unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate” [the duty being payable under sec. 12, “as if the annual produce thereof had been given by way of annuity”] “unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued; but no duty shall accrue in respect thereof, after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate, for so much thereof as shall have been so applied.”

Then follows this proviso,—“Provided, nevertheless, that in case before the same, or some part thereof, shall be actually so applied, any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons, if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons, and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase.”

Macfarlane v.
Lord Advocate.

Testamentary trustees were directed, during the period of six years next after the testator's death, to realise the residue of the trust-estate and to purchase land, and at the end of the six years to entail the same on A and a series of heirs. At the end of the six years A, whose right then vested, presented a petition for disentail, and having by private arrangement obtained the consents of the next three heirs on payment of compensation for their respective interests, as ascertained by an extrajudicial valuation, he obtained a decree ordaining the trustees to convey to him in fee-simple the moneys held by them for investment in land.

The Crown thereupon claimed from the trustees legacy-duty upon the money in their hands at the end of the six years for investment in land, under the 19th section of the Act 36 Geo. III. c. 52, on the ground that A had right to the whole thereof, and had, in the sense of that section, “become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith.” The trustees maintained that the duty fell to be charged only on the succession which had opened to A under the will, and that as he was merely the first of a series of beneficiaries in succession, the duty should be charged on his life interest as an annuity, the proceedings by which he had acquired a right in fee-simple being transactions inter vivos which did not affect his succession.

Held (in aff. judgment of First Division) (1) that the words “shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in real estate” fell to be construed as meaning shall become entitled, if real estate is purchased, to an estate of inheritance in possession; (2) that under the entail directed to be executed A, as institute, would have had an estate of inheritance in possession; and therefore (3) that under the will, and apart from the disentail proceedings, A was liable in duty on the whole sum in terms of the proviso in section 19.

Opinions that if A had been originally liable to duty on his life interest only, he would have become liable under sec. 12 to duty on the whole money on his acquiring an absolute interest by the disentail proceedings.

Held further (aff. judgment of First Division) that money expended in building a mansion-house was not money expended in the purchase of real estate.

(In the Court of Session, Feb. 6, 1892, 19 R. 461, and Jan. 12, 1894, reported in the present volume, p. 348.)

Graham Macfarlane and others (Dunlop's Trustees) appealed against the judgment of 6th February 1892 and against the judgment of 12th January 1894, in so far as it disallowed the claim for exemption for the £12,000 expended in building a mansion-house.

The Crown did not appeal.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question raised by this appeal is whether the Crown is entitled to legacy-duty upon the residue of the estate of the testator, who died in the year 1883, having made a trust-disposition by which the income of his estate or part of it was to be accumulated for a period of six years, and then to be laid out in the purchase of land by the trustees, the land purchased being settled as soon as convenient after the expiry of the six years by the trustees executing a deed or deeds of strict entail of the lands purchased, “to and in favour of William Hamilton Dunlop and the heirs-male of his body lawfully begotten according to their seniority,” whom failing the heirs-female of his body lawfully begotten, whom failing to his brother Hamilton Dunlop and the heirs male and female of his body lawfully begotten, with an ultimate provision, failing those heirs, to the testator's own nearest heirs and assignees whomsoever.

The moneys forming part of the residue, the duty upon which is now claimed, had not at the time in question been applied in the purchase of land; they were still in the hands of the trustees. A residuary account was sent in by the trustees, and William Hamilton Dunlop, who would have been interested under the deed of entail if executed, took proceedings, as he was entitled to do under the Acts which enable a disentail to be effected, by which the interests of the three next heirs were to be ascertained and valued, and, subject to those interests so valued, he became entitled to the residue without the money being expended upon the purchase of land, and settled in the manner provided by the trust-disposition. There is no dispute that it was perfectly competent to William Hamilton Dunlop to take this course—that it was one which the law sanctioned, and that the effect of his having taken it was that which I have described.

The Crown claims the duty upon the whole of this residue, under the provisions of the 36th of Geo. III. c. 52, or the provisions which have been substituted for it, but which do not materially alter those enactments. The statute in the first instance imposes legacy-duty upon all legacies above a certain amount and upon all residue or share of residue which may pass to a beneficiary under a will. In the 12th clause, upon which reliance is placed by the appellants, it is provided,—“That the duty payable on . . . residue or part of residue of any personal estate” (it applies to legacies also, but as this is a case of residue, it is not necessary to refer to that part) “given to or for the benefit of or so that the same shall be enjoyed by different persons in succession who shall be chargeable with the duties hereby imposed at one and the same rate shall be charged upon and paid out of the residue or part of residue so given as in the case of a legacy to one person.” So that even where successive interests are created by the trust-disposition, if the persons entitled to those successive interests are of the same degree of consanguinity so that the duty would be payable at the same rate, the duty is to be paid out of the residue just as if there had been a bequest to one person alone.

The next part of the section deals with the case where a legacy or residue or part of residue is “given to or for the benefit of or so that the same shall be enjoyed by different persons in succession, some or one of whom shall be chargeable with no duty, or some of whom shall be chargeable with different rates of duty so that one rate of duty cannot be immediately charged thereon.” It was to meet that particular case that a departure was permitted from that which is the principle of the Act clearly indicated by the 2d section and the earlier part of the 12th section, that where there was a bequest of residue the duty should prima facie be paid out of that residue on the whole sum which would pass from the trustees to the beneficiary, before distribution. In the case where different rates of duty would become chargeable there was of course a difficulty in providing for that course being adopted; and therefore where persons under such a settlement became entitled for life only or to a temporary interest, they were to be “chargeable with the duty” “in the same manner as if the annual produce had been given by way of annuity.” But the section concludes by providing that “all and every person and persons who shall become absolutely entitled to any such legacy or residue or part of residue so to be enjoyed in succession shall when and as such person or persons respectively shall receive the same or begin to enjoy the benefit thereof be chargeable with and pay the duty for the same or such part thereof as shall be so received or of which the benefit shall be so enjoyed in the same manner as if the same had come to such person or persons immediately on the death of the person by whom such property shall have been given to be enjoyed." So that the scheme of the section was that where you could only charge in succession you were to do so ; but in that case whenever any person or persons became entitled to an absolute interest, then the duty was to be paid upon the whole sum.

June 1, 1894.
Macfarlane v.
Lord Advocate.

That is followed by section 19, which deals with the class of cases which this House has now to consider. It enacts,—“That any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate.” That is the leading idea of the section. Then it continues,—“Unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued.” The word “unless” with which that provision commences is certainly not very happily chosen, because the enactment first being that the sum of money to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with the same duty as personal estate, the word “unless” would seem the proper mode of introducing some exception ; but the words which follow “unless” do not introduce any exception at all ; on the contrary, they provide that where the property is to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, the duty is to be paid in the same manner as if it had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate. That refers to the cases dealt with by section 12.

Then the section proceeds to say,—“but no duty shall accrue in respect thereof, after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate, for so much thereof as shall have been so applied : Provided nevertheless that in case before the same or some part thereof shall be actually so applied any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons, if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons, and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase.”

It is not disputed that if the case is within the proviso which I have just read, the appeal must fail and the judgment of the Court below must be affirmed. The question is whether the residue had been actually applied in the purchase of land before the person “became entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith.” At the time when this dispute arose the money had not been applied to the purchase of land at all, but remained as money in the hands of the trustees. It is obvious that the words “in case any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate” cannot be literally applied, because no person can become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in real estate which is to be purchased in the future. It is obvious that the words need construction, and that their meaning must be, in case a person will become entitled if real estate is purchased, or as and when real estate is purchased, to an estate of inheritance in possession therein.

Macfarlane v.
Lord Advocate.

Now, was Mr William Hamilton Dunlop in the present case in that position? Supposing the land had been purchased, could he have claimed a conveyance to himself which would have vested in him an estate of inheritance in possession? Now, the land which was to be purchased was to be conveyed and settled to and in favour of William Hamilton Dunlop, and the heirs-male of his body lawfully begotten, with other provisions to which I have already called attention. Was the estate which undoubtedly would have been vested in him if the land had been so settled an estate of inheritance in possession? The words "an estate of inheritance" are, I understand, not words of art in the law of Scotland. One has to consider their meaning, therefore, without reference to any technical rule. Is a person who is instituted heir of entail the owner of or possessed of an estate of inheritance? My Lords, as far as I understand the law of Scotland, the heir of entail is the owner of the land. That land will descend to the heirs under the entail, and the limitations upon his ownership are fetters introduced for securing that the land shall descend to the heir. Under those circumstances it certainly appears to me that when one once arrives at what the position of an heir of entail is, there is no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that a person enjoying such rights and having such a title and such ownership does possess an estate of inheritance. Indeed, it seems to me difficult to define an estate of inheritance better than as an estate which does not terminate with the life of the possessor, but which passes to his heirs. It is quite clear that a tenant in tail in England according to the English law is possessed of an estate of inheritance; and it is equally clear that the position of an heir of entail in Scotland and that of a tenant in tail in England do not, for any practical purposes in view of the question of their possessing an estate of inheritance, differ in quality the one from the other. I do not of course mean to say that the rights of a tenant in tail in England and of an heir of entail in Scotland are precisely the same; they are not; but in considering whether it should be said of the one as of the other that he possesses an estate of inheritance, it seems to me that every reason which makes that language appropriate in the one case makes it appropriate in the other. For myself, therefore, I own it seems to me that, quite apart from the disentailing proceedings effected by Mr William Hamilton Dunlop, his case comes within the proviso, and that the intention of the proviso was to meet such a case, and that where a person under a trust-disposition would have taken such an estate if the land had been purchased as Mr Dunlop would have taken in the present case, he should be treated for the purposes of the legacy-duty as the absolute owner just as much as if the bequest had been made to him absolutely.

That really is sufficient to dispose of the present case. But even if that view were not well founded, I should not be satisfied by the arguments of the learned counsel for the appellants that they would be entitled to judgment. The effect of the statutes in reference to disentailing is to enable the first heir of entail to have the interest or expectancies of the three next heirs, in circumstances such as the present, valued, and to insist that, instead of the entail continuing and instead of the land being purchased and settled in the manner prescribed, they according to their several interests shall have paid over to them or be entitled to enjoy the money which was destined by the testator to be laid out in land. Where such a disentail has taken place it is obvious that all succession or idea of succession is at an end. The money in the hands of the trustees is no longer to be settled; there is no longer to be a succession of interests, or any land to be purchased; there will be an absolute title to have that money handed over free of restriction. How under those circumstances ought it to be dealt with for the purposes of legacy-duty? My Lords, it is not necessary to express any opinion upon that after the view which I have invited your Lordships to take upon the effect of the proviso; but I own it seems to me that there is no difficulty in such a case in applying the language of the 12th section of the Act or, if that be inappropriate, even of the 2d section of the Act, which is the charging section. If it is not a case of succession at all, then the 2d section applies. The 12th section only comes in where successive interests have been created and have to be dealt with. Of course, if section 2 applies, or that which is now substituted for it, there is an end of the case. If section 12 applies, then under the earlier part of the section the case does not differ. The whole argument has been based upon the suggestion that the case is one of successive interests within the second part of section 12, and that therefore all that Mr William Hamilton Dunlop ought to do is to pay upon the basis of his having a life interest. But, my Lords, all those successions, whatever they were, which were intended to be created by the testamentary disposition were created subject to the law relating to entail; they were created subject to a statutory power of sweeping them away, and the result of their being swept away, is that there are now no successive interests which can be charged, but that there are absolute interests, and absolute interests only, in the money. I certainly have no difficulty in applying to those circumstances the language at the end of section 12, which provides that although there were to be successive interests, yet whenever the successive interests come to an end, and there is an absolute title in some person or persons, then the duty shall be paid in the manner provided at the end of that section. It is not, however, necessary to come absolutely to any determination upon that point, because the case is really concluded against the appellants by the view which I first presented to your Lordships.

Your Lordships in the course of the argument indicated somewhat clearly that the other point taken by the appellants was wholly untenable, the question being whether money which was expended in building a house upon land can be treated as coming under the words "purchase of real estate." It seems to me that notwithstanding the argument used for the purpose of shewing that the result is the same as if the land with the house on it had been purchased, and that it is hard that the incidence of the tax should be different, it must be remembered that in construing a taxing statute such as this your Lordships have to be guided by the words used, and it would be doing them violence almost amounting to an outrage if the words were held to cover such a case as that under consideration.

I therefore move that the interlocutors appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—Whatever view be taken of this case, whether it be regarded as one in which nothing ought to be looked at except the terms of the trust-deed of the late Mr Dunlop, or whether it be assumed that the fact of the disentail with all its consequences ought to be taken into account, the result to the appellant appears to me to be precisely the same.

With regard to the first of these views, I entertain the opinion that according to Scotch law the expression "estate of inheritance" occurring in the proviso to the 19th section of the Act of 36 Geo. III. ought to be construed as including the right and interest of a Scotch heir of entail in possession. The words are not technical, but they appear to me very aptly to describe that right and interest. A Scotch heir of entail in possession is vested with the full fee of the land. He is the only person who can have the slightest pretence to the position of owner; and the sole object of the restrictions, imposed upon him as taillied fiar, is to protect and strengthen the right of inheritance which is created by the deed of entail, and to make the estate descend in succession to those heirs who are called by the terms of the destination.

But, my Lords, this is a taxing statute, applicable equally to real estate in Scotland and in England; and, following the principles which were laid down by the noble and learned Lords who decided Lord Saltoun v. Her Majesty's Advocate-General,¹ it is clear that if the interest of an heir of entail can by any fair interpretation be brought within the words "estate of inheritance," it ought to be so brought. I need hardly repeat that in England the interest of a tenant in tail, which bears, I will not say a close, but a fair analogy to the interest of an heir of entail in Scotland, would clearly fall within the sweep of the Act. According to that view Mr Dunlop, before he presented the petition of disentail, was within the predicament of the proviso, and was liable to be assessed simply as if he had been a legatee. I have had some difficulty in making up my mind whether that is the right ground upon which to rest the decision of this case, or whether the alternative view which has been presented is the right one. If the disentail is to be taken into account that must be upon the footing that the Legislature has by the provisions of the Entail Acts altered and modified the meaning and effect of such a direction to invest and entail as occurs in the settlement of the late Mr Dunlop. In that view, the result of entail legislation, beginning in 1848 and terminating in the year 1882, has been to prescribe that a direction in these terms shall, in the circumstances which have occurred in the present case, not operate according to its precise terms, but as an absolute bequest to the institute of entail and to certain other of the heirs. It seems to me to be very immaterial whether the case falls under the proviso or condition in the end of section 12 of the statute or under the general taxing words of the Act as a direct bequest of residue to these persons.

I have only to say in addition that the Court of Session appear to have erred in assuming that if the last view be the correct one the case would be within the proviso at the end of section 19. I do not think that that is so; I think the proviso at the end of section 19 is confined to the case where the money is not to be paid over but is to be invested by the trustees, and land is to be conveyed to the beneficiaries indicated in the deed. I am bound to say, however, that the error has been mainly, if not wholly induced, by the form in which the Crown chose to present its case for the consideration of the Court.

LORD ASHBOURNE concurred.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—I agree. Putting aside the disentailing proceedings and the rights flowing therefrom, I think this case clearly falls under section 19 of the 36th of George III. I think the words in the proviso at the end of that section, though not framed in the technical language of the Scotch law, describe the Succession—Vesting—Substitution.—A testator by holograph settlement left the liferent of his whole estates, heritable and moveable, to his widow. He then disposed of the fee of his estates, and, inter alia, provided, "I leave to my nephew J. F. W. my estate of B, but I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said nephew dying without leaving any lawful heir-male of his body, then and in that event my said lands of B are to revert back to my nephew J. J. F. W. survived the testator, but predeceased the testator's widow unmarried, and was survived by J. H. J. F. W. left a general trust-disposition and settlement of his whole estate, heritable and moveable.

In a question between J. F. W.'s trustees and J. H., held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the fee of the lands of B vested in J. F. W. at the testator's death, with a simple substitution in favour of J. H., in the event of J. F. W. dying without leaving an heir-male of his body, and that the substitution had been evacuated by J. LORD WATSON.—This appeal raises a question upon the construction of a clause in the settlement of the late Mr Walter Whyte of Bankhead. The general scheme of that instrument is that Mr Whyte, upon his death, which occurred in 1873, gave the liferent of his entire estate, heritable and moveable, to Mrs Margaret Pollok or Whyte, his spouse, who survived him. The interest of the widow was burdened by an annuity of £300 in favour of Mrs Hamilton, one of the testator's sisters. After that bequest he provides that on the death of his wife the annuity to Mrs Hamilton is to cease, and that in lieu of that annuity she is to take a liferent of two properties which are destined, one to her son John, the appellant in this case, and the other to her son James Hamilton in fee. I do not think it has been seriously disputed that the fee which is destined to the two Hamiltons vested in them a morte testatoris.

Then follows the clause which we have to construe. That, again, is followed by a direction that at the death of his widow his moveable estate shall be equally divided between the families of his two sisters, Mrs Watson and Mrs Hamilton.

The clause which has given rise to the present litigation is in these terms,—
“I also leave to my nephew James Francis Watson, presently residing at Ardmore House, in the parish of Cardross, Dumbartonshire, my estate of Bankhead, situated in the parish of Rutherglen and county of Lanark ; but I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said nephew James Francis Watson dying without leaving any lawful male heir of his body, then, and in that event, my said lands of Bankhead are to revert back to my said nephew John Hamilton.”

The circumstances which have occurred are these : James Francis Watson survived the testator, but predeceased his widow, and when the widow's life-rent came to an end by her decease, the estate of Bankhead was claimed by the present appellant, upon the footing that James Francis Watson's predecease of the widow prevented him from taking any interest whatever in the succession, and also that these words “then, and in that event, my said lands of Bankhead are to revert back to my said nephew John Hamilton,” ought to be read not as a clause of reversion intended to bring back an estate which had been taken during his lifetime by James Francis Watson, but as being intended to operate as a simple gift over upon the widow's death in the event of Watson having predeceased that term.

When the clause is taken by itself, nothing can be clearer to my mind than the intention of the testator. I do not say that a testator who writes his own will, and is not a lawyer, is in all cases to be held to have rightly apprehended the meaning of technical words which he may have used on the occasion of making his will ; but I think it is plain that a testator who uses words which have an intelligible conventional meaning is not to be held as having used the words with any other meaning, unless the context of the instrument shews that he intended to do so.

In this case nothing can be more simple than this clause of the will. It commences with an unqualified bequest, making no reference to the time at which it is to operate, of the estate of Bankhead in favour of Watson. I need hardly say that where such a bequest occurs it must take effect a morte testatoris, except in one or the other of these two cases—namely, where to give effect to it from that date would disturb any of the provisions already made in the will, or where the testator has clearly indicated, either by express words or by plain implication, that he did not intend it to operate until a later period—here the death of the widow.

Then, so far as regards the condition attached, introduced by the words, “I wish it expressly understood,” they refer to one period, and one period only—the death of Watson ; and upon his death, without mention of any other death or any other event which is to be taken into computation along with it, there is a provision that the property shall revert. I need not say that, in the absence of any context to control the meaning of these words, “revert back,” they plainly point to the case where, a beneficiary having taken under the will, the estate which he took is not to descend to his heir-at-law, or to a person appointed by his will, but is to go back to some person favoured by the testator. No. 7.

Accordingly, in order to give the meaning to this clause which is requisite if the appellant is to succeed, I find from the very able and elaborate arguments June 4, 1894.
Hamilton v.
Ritchie. which have been addressed to us by the learned counsel on his behalf, that it is absolutely necessary, in the first place, to discharge from the clause the ordinary meaning of some of the words which it employs; and, in the second place, to introduce into the clause words which are not to be found in it, and are not connected with it by reference to other parts of the deed. The gloss which they desire to put upon it, according to one of several constructions more or less plausible which they suggest, is, "I also leave to my nephew James Francis Watson, at the death of my widow, my estate of Bankhead; but I wish it expressly understood that, in the event of my said nephew James Francis Watson dying during the life of my widow without leaving any lawful male heir of his body"; and when you come to the latter part of the clause, you are required to do this violence to the text, that instead of making the estate go back from one who has taken it already, it is to go to a conditional institute because the institute has failed to take.

These are very considerable alterations. I do not intend to refer to any other of the theories put forward, but they appear to me conclusively to shew that it is impossible to adopt the construction which has been suggested by the appellant, without doing extreme violence, in the first place, to the meaning of some words in the text; and, in the second place, by bringing in words from outside the instrument which are not to be found within it. After giving the liferent of the entirety of his estate to his widow, the testator declares, "at the death of my wife said annuity to cease." It is perfectly plain that these words are introduced into that part of the text of the will for the purpose of indicating the time at which Mrs Hamilton's annuity, chargeable upon the widow's life-rent, is to cease, and her new right as a liferenter of the lands which are given in fee to her sons is to begin. I cannot for a moment suppose that those words were intended to apply to all the subsequent clauses of the deed. I find that the remaining bequests are stated as distinct and substantive gifts, entirely independent of that reference to time as affecting the annuity of Mrs Hamilton.
And then, when he has concluded this destination of the estate of Bankhead to James Francis Watson, the testator proceeds to deal with the division of his moveable estate, and it being necessary to specify a time, he again introduces the words "at the death of my said wife my moveable estate is to be equally divided."

Various theories of construction have been discussed, some of them not very much akin to the question which we have to decide in the present case. I think that the whole substance of the grounds upon which I am prepared to recommend your Lordships to affirm the judgment appealed from is to be found in a single sentence of Lord Rutherford Clark's opinion,—“I think that it came into operation from the testator's death; there is no other time assigned.”

I do not think it necessary to trouble your Lordships with any reference to that class of cases of which one of the most recent is Glendonwyn v. Gordon.¹
It refers to a rule of the law of Scotland to the effect that a general conveyance is not in all cases held to carry estates settled by special destination. But the rule goes no further than this, that a general disposition will presumably carry all lands previously settled under a special destination which the truster or testator has power to dispose of. In order to deprive his general disposition of that effect it is the duty of the litigant who says that the special destination has not been defeated to shew to the satisfaction of the Court, either by the terms of the testator's settlement or by other documents to which it is legally competent to refer, that it was not the intention of the testator to disturb the standing investiture.

I move that the interlocutors appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

The Lord Chancellor has requested me to state that he agrees with the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived.

LORD ASHBOURNE, LORD MACNAGHTEN, and LORD MORRIS concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I am also of the same opinion, and I venture only to add a few words in confirmation of what has fallen from my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson). The practical question in the case is whether under the testator's settlement vesting took place a morte testatoris or was postponed until the death of the liferentrix. In the former case the only question that would remain is whether the property having so vested has been carried by the general trust-disposition and settlement of Mr James Francis Watson. If there was no vesting until the death of the liferentrix, confessedly the appeal must succeed.

Now, on the question of vesting, I have to observe in the first place that there is no trust here created. Though we have not technical words of conveyance, such as the word "dispone," or any word to that effect, there is a word, "leave," which is sufficient to convey the right; so that the will, in the words of Lord Rutherford Clark, was "a conveyance or equal to a conveyance." Then it is quite settled that the mere existence of a liferent, or a direction that annuities shall be paid by a liferenter, has not the effect of suspending vesting: And finally there is no specification of any time in this deed other than the death of the testator as the period of vesting.

I think that there are further circumstances which confirm the general view of the deed now stated. There are several properties here dealt with. It is admitted that in the case of John Hamilton, one nephew to whom certain lands are conveyed, subject to the widow's liferent, the vesting is a morte testatoris. It is conceded that in the case of another nephew, James Hamilton, to whom other lands were conveyed, there was vesting a morte testatoris. There is every presumption that the same result should follow in the case of the third nephew, and indeed it is admitted that were it not for a few words beginning with the clause "but I wish it expressly understood," and so on, it is clear that there would have been vesting a morte testatoris in the case of James Francis Watson also.

I am unable to gather from the clause which has been founded upon that there was any suspension of vesting so long as the liferent subsisted. As my noble and learned friend has pointed out, it is necessary to insert words in the deed in order to give it the effect which is contended for by the appellant. The words are, "I wish it expressly understood that in the event of my said nephew James Francis Watson dying without leaving any lawful male heir of his body." These words would naturally mean dying at any time without leaving any lawful male heir of his body, in which case this would be, as I think it is, simply the provision of a substitution. In order to give them any other effect you must add, "in the event of my said nephew James Francis Watson dying during the lifetime of the liferentrix." There are no such words there, and I see no warrant for inserting such words. No. 7.

Hamilton v. Ritchie.

But the remaining part of the clause seems to me, as it does to my noble and learned friend, to throw much light also upon this question of vesting, if anything further were needed, because that is a clause of reversion of the property—a declaration "that in the event of James Francis Watson dying without leaving any lawful male heir of his body the lands of Bankhead are to revert back." The conception of that clause is that the lands had first vested in James Francis Watson, and that from him they were to revert or descend to someone else. That, I need not say, is a strong confirmation of the view which I think is to be found generally throughout the deed as a whole, that the vesting was to be a morte testatoris. It is no doubt true, as was observed by Lord Young, that the testator contemplated a distribution of his personal estate on the death of the liferentrix; but, with great deference to his Lordship's opinion, I do not think that any further distribution of the heritable estate was provided for beyond that which occurs in the ordinary case of a liferenter and fiars, in which case the liferenter's right is merely a burden on the fee, though the fiars' right to a beneficial possession arises only on the liferenter's death.

With regard to the second branch of the case, I agree with what has been said by my noble and learned friend (Lord Watson) as to the effect of the trust-disposition and settlement of James Francis Watson, the general terms of which were clearly sufficient to convey the lands now in question.

Reparation—Contribution between wrongdoers—Assignment to one of two wrongdoers of joint and several decree against both.—The widow of a man who had been killed by the breaking down of the tackle used in discharging a ship's cargo raised an action against the shipowner and the stevedore who was using the tackle at the time of the accident for damages, the fault alleged against the former being that his tackle was unfit for the work, and that alleged against the latter being that he had recklessly overloaded the tackle. The pursuer obtained decree against both the shipowner and the stevedore, jointly and severally for a sum of damages and expenses. Thereafter she gave the shipowner a charge for payment of the whole sum. He paid it and obtained from her an assignment to the sum of damages and expenses, and to the decree. He then raised an action against the stevedore for payment of half that sum. The stevedore pleaded in defence that the action was incompetent and irrelevant, in respect that there is no contribution between wrongdoers. June 5, 1894.
Palmer v. Wick and Pulteneytown Steam Shipping Co., Limited.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division) that the shipowner was entitled to recover half of the damages and expenses from the stevedore, because he was in right of the decree against the latter; and that the rule that there is no contribution between wrongdoers was inapplicable.

The case was heard in November 1893.

At delivering judgment,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question raised in this case is a somewhat novel one. On the 17th of March 1892, in two conjoined actions, in which Mrs Fowlis and others were pursuers, and the present appellant and respondents were the defenders, the Court of Session decreed and ordained the defenders jointly and severally to make payment of sums amounting to £600. On the 24th of May 1892, a similar decree was made as regards the sum of £239, 4s. 1d., the pursuers' costs of the action. The pursuers, as they were entitled to do, sought payment of the entire sum of £839, 4s. 1d. from the present respondents, who were by the decrees made severally as well as jointly liable. The respondents paid the entire amount, but took from the pursuers an assignation of the judgment, and of the moneys thereby secured. The respondents thereupon commenced an action to recover one half of the amount so paid by them from the appellant. This action the appellant maintained was incompetent on the ground that there is no contribution between wrongdoers, that the judgment had been satisfied, and that the assignation of it to the respondents was ineffectual to confer on them any right to recover in this action.

The first of the two conjoined actions was instituted by Mrs Fowlis on behalf of herself and some of her children, and by others of her children, who were majors, against the respondents, to recover damages for the loss of her husband and the father of the children, whose death was alleged to have been due to the negligence of the defenders. His death was occasioned by the fall of a part of the tackle which was being used in the discharge of a vessel belonging to the defenders. They denied the negligence imputed to them, and alleged that if there had been any negligence it was that of the appellant, a stevedore employed to discharge the ship. The pursuers thereupon brought an action against him also, and the two actions were by order conjoined. The jury found negligence on the part of both the defenders. The decree of the 17th of March, to which allusion has already been made, was the decree applying this verdict. The decree of the 24th of May related to the costs.

My Lords, we have before us in the present action only the pleadings and verdict in the conjoined actions. It is at least consistent with these that the jury may have found their verdict of negligence against the shipping company, not on the ground of any personal default on the part of the company or its managers, but by reason of some negligence imputable to the master of the vessel. It is important to bear this in mind.

The learned counsel for the appellant did not contest the proposition that in general, where one of two co-obligants discharges the entire debt, he is entitled, unless there be some equity to the contrary, to call for an assignation of it, and to use such assignation for the purpose of enforcing payment of the share of his co-obligant. It is no answer to such an action to say that the whole of the debt has been discharged, and that there was, therefore, nothing to assign. There can be no doubt that the decrees of the 17th of March and 24th of May created joint and several debts. Why, then, should a co-debtor, who has paid the entire sum due, and received an assignation (it is unnecessary to inquire whether he could have demanded it), when he seeks to recover the share of his co-debtor, be subject more than other co-obligants to the answer that, the entire debt having been discharged, nothing remains due on the judgment, and that it can, therefore, no longer be proceeded on! The only answer, as it seems to me, must be that the joint debt resulted from a joint wrong, and that the law will not permit or assist any wrongdoer to recover contribution from another. It will be observed, however, that this is to allow the defender to set up his own wrong by way of answer, for the pursuer makes out a prima facie case by the production of the judgment and assignation. He has no need to rely on the joint wrong, or to go behind the judgment and assignation. On principle I can see no reason why, when a joint judgment debt has resulted from a joint wrong, each co-debtor should not pay his share; or why, if one be compelled by the creditor to pay the whole debt, the other should be enabled to go free by setting up his own wrong. Suppose a settlement were arrived at before the case was tried, and the wrongdoers gave a joint and several bond in discharge of the pursuer's claim, can it be doubted that, if one of them were forced to pay the whole, he could recover from the other his share? Why should the case be different where the issue is a decree that they shall jointly and severally pay? The learned Judges in the Inner-House, differing from the Lord Ordinary, have decided in favour of the pursuers in the present action. I am not disposed to dissent from their conclusion unless it can be clearly shewn to be contrary to the established law of Scotland.

June 5, 1894.
Palmer v.
Wick and Pulteneytown Steam Ship-

Limited.

There is certainly no express decision on the point. The appellant relied mainly on a dictum of Baron Hume. That learned Judge said,—“It is all num negotium in regard to those who are so far engaged in the wrong as to be liable for the consequences; and there is no principle here, as in the case of cautioners binding for the same debt, on which to imply any tacit agreement among them for mutual relief or division of the loss. Nor is the law at all inclined to distribute the damages out of tenderness to the delinquents.” The observation that there was no right to mutual relief was not in any way necessary to the decision. It was a mere dictum. On the other hand, Lord Bankton and Lord Kames have both indicated views favouring the right to relief by a person bound ex delicto against his co-obligant.

It is not necessary in this appeal to decide whether there can be any right to contribution in the case of a delict proper when the liability has arisen from a conscious and therefore moral wrong, nor even whether in every case of quasi-delict a delinquent may obtain relief against his co-delinquent, though I see, as at present advised, no reason to differ from the opinion, which I gather my noble and learned friend Lord Watson holds, that such a right may exist. In circumstances such as those with which your Lordships have to deal, I cannot but think that equity and justice are in favour of the conclusion arrived at by the Inner-House, and there seems to be no authority compelling a contrary decision. It was urged that the person seeking relief might be the more culpable of the delinquents; but it is just as likely that he should be the less culpable. In selecting from which of his co-debtors he will obtain payment, the creditor would be guided usually by considerations wholly independent of the relative culpability of those from whom he may recover it.

Much reliance was placed by the learned counsel for the appellant upon the judgment in the English case of Merryweather v. Nixan.¹ The reasons to be found in Lord Kenyon's judgment, so far as reported, are somewhat meagre, and the statement of the facts of the case is not less so. It is now too late to question that decision in this country; but when I am asked to hold it to be part of the law of Scotland, I am bound to say that it does not appear to me to be founded on any principle of justice or equity, or even of public policy, which justifies its extension to the jurisprudence of other countries. There has certainly been a tendency to limit its application even in England. In the case of Adamson v. Jarvis,¹ Best, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court, referred to the case of Philips v. Biggs,² which he said was never decided; "but the Court of Chancery seemed to consider the case of two Sheriffs of Middlesex, where one had paid the damages in an action for an escape, and sued the other for contribution, as like the case of two joint obligors." He then proceeded as follows:—"From the inclination of the Court in this last case, and from the concluding part of Lord Kenyon's judgment in Merryweather v. Nixan,³ and from reason, justice, and sound policy, the rule that wrongdoers cannot have redress or contribution against each other is confined to cases where the person seeking redress must be presumed to have known that he was doing an unlawful act." If the view thus expressed by the Court of Common Pleas be correct (and I see no reason to dissent from it), the doctrine that one tortfeasor cannot recover from another is inapplicable to a case like that now under consideration.

For these reasons I move your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—The respondent company are owners of the steamship "Fergus," which, in April 1891, carried a cargo of pig-iron from Middlesborough to Grangemouth, where it was discharged by the appellant. In the course of that operation, David Fowles, one of the workmen in his employment, was killed by the fall of a block, which formed part of the ship's tackle used in unloading.

The family of the deceased brought an action of damages against the company, in which, besides alleging that the ship's tackle was of slighter make than is usually employed in vessels built for carrying pig-iron, they attributed the fall of the block to the defects of an iron hook to which it was attached. They raised a second action of damages against the appellant, in which they repeated some of these averments, and further alleged that it was the obvious duty of the appellant either to reject the tackle or to use it with great caution; and that, in breach of such duty, he recklessly subjected the tackle to severe and unnecessary strains, by putting loads upon it which would have been sufficiently heavy for tackle made for the express purpose of unloading pig-iron.

The cases were sent to trial together, when the jury found against each of the defenders, that the fall of the block, and its fatal consequences, were due to their fault, and they assessed the total damage sustained by the pursuers at £600. There is certainly room for speculation as to the process of reasoning by which the jury arrived at that double result, but I can find nothing in their verdict, or in the record from which the issue was taken, which can be held to impute personal fault to the company or its directors, in the sense that they knew of any flaw in the tackle of the "Fergus," or were affected by any other knowledge which could make them conscious wrongdoers.

The Court applied the verdict, by decerning against the parties to the present appeal, jointly and severally, for the full amount of the damages fixed by the jury, and found the pursuers entitled to expenses in both actions. These were subsequently taxed at £239, 4s. 1d., for which sum also the pursuers obtained a joint and several decree. They extracted both decrees, and gave a charge to the respondent company, who paid their demands in full, and took an assignment to the decrees. The appellant having declined to relieve them of any part of the sums thus paid by them, the company brought this action, in which they ask decree against him for a moiety of these sums. The Lord Ordinary (Wallwood) dismissed the action, on the ground that the company, being joint wrongdoers with the appellant, had no claim of relief. Their Lordships of the Second Division unanimously recalled his judgment, and gave the company decree as craved.

At the bar of the House the appellant mainly relied on the proposition, which he endeavoured to establish by authority, that, by the law of Scotland, there can be no right of contribution among persons who are jointly responsible for the civil consequences of any delict or quasi-delict. Delicts proper embrace all breaches of the law which expose their perpetrator to criminal punishment. The term quasi-delict is generally applied to any violation of the common or statute law which does not infer criminal consequences, and does not consist in the breach of any contract, express or implied. Cases may and do often occur in which it is exceedingly difficult to draw the line between delicts and quasi-delicts. The latter class, as it has been developed in the course of the present century, covers a great variety of acts and omissions, ranging from deliberate breaches of the law, closely bordering upon crime, to breaches comparatively venial and involving no moral delinquency.

In considering the authorities which were cited on both sides of the bar, as bearing more or less directly upon the present case, it is necessary to distinguish between these two points,—(1) the right of the party injured to select any one or more of the co-delinquents, and to exact full reparation from him or them, without making the rest parties to the suit; and (2) the right, if any, of the co-delinquent who pays to recover a contribution from those persons who were under the same responsibility as himself.

In the case of delicts proper, the first of these points has been established in the law of Scotland from a very early period. Before, and for a considerable time after Lord Stair wrote, the Court of Session was very familiar with claims of reparation for manslaughter, spulzie, and other grave delinquencies, whilst claims of damage in respect of breach of duty by persons in a position of trust and in respect of the negligence of servants, which in recent years have occupied so much of its time, were practically unknown. The result is that the early text-books refer almost exclusively to delicts proper. But the same rule of procedure has been extended to claims arising ex quasi delicto; and a recent instance of its application is to be found in Croskery v. Hendrie and Others,¹ a case to which I shall have occasion to refer hereafter. The enforcement of the rule in all cases falling within the wide category of quasi-delict has led to consequences which, in my opinion, are inconvenient, if not absurd. Thus, if a body of private trustees commit a wilful breach of directions given by the trustor to the great detriment of the trust-estate, all its members must be made parties to any suit for reparation, because they are held, in that case, to be liable ex contractu, whereas if the same body commit a comparatively venial breach of duty in violation of the general law regulating trust administration, any member may be sued for the whole loss resulting because he has been guilty of a quasi-deliict.

The second point, which is of crucial importance in this case, has never been the subject of judicial decision, and the authorities which have any direct bearing upon it are somewhat conflicting.

Lord Bankton and Lord Kames both affirm, in the widest terms, that a right of relief inter se is competent to all persons concerned in and responsible for the civil consequences of the same deliict—a rule which must apply a fortiori in the case of quasi-deliicts. Lord Bankton, after referring to the rule that each co-delinquent is liable, and may be separately sued for the whole, goes on to say i. 10, 4):—"Yet payment and reparation by one liberates the rest, and in equity he ought to have relief against them proportionably, since by his money they are freed from the obligation." In his treatise upon the Principles of Equity, Lord Kames adopts the same doctrine. He discusses (edit. 1800, p. 89) the principle of mutual relief between co-cautioners, and points out that the same principles are equally applicable to correi debendi, adding,—“And it makes no difference whether the correi debendi be bound for a civil debt, or be bound ex delicto, for in both cases equally it is the duty of the creditor to act impartially, and in both cases equally equity requires impartiality.”

Baron Hume, in commenting upon Smith v. O'Reilly and Others,¹ expresses a different view. That case raised no question of relief. A band of young men acting in concert had broken a number of street lamps. They were brought before the Sheriff upon a complaint by the contractor to whom the lamps belonged, with concurrence of the fiscal, and were found jointly and severally liable in a fine of £5 payable to the fiscal, and in £30 of compensation to the private prosecutor. In so far as it related to the fine the Sheriff's decree was plainly erroneous, because conjunct and several liability is unknown to the criminal law. The cause was carried by the accused to the Court of Session, where a fine of £1, 5s. each was substituted for the penalty awarded by the Sheriff, and the compensation reduced to £20. No objection was taken except to the quantum of the decree for damages. In the course of his remarks the learned Baron says,—“It is all unum negotium in regard to those who are so far engaged in the wrong as to be liable for the consequences; and there is no principle here, as in the case of cautioners binding for the same debt, on which to imply any tacit agreement among them for mutual relief or division of the loss. Nor is the law at all inclined to distribute the damages out of tenderness to the delinquents. On the contrary, what the law mainly considers on such occasions is, the convenience of the injured party, that he may recover his damages as speedily and certainly, and with as little trouble and expense as may be.” It is possible that the observations of the learned Baron were directed to the form of the decree which the Judge ought to give to the party injured, when, as in that case, all the delinquents are sued for reparation. If he obtains a joint and several decree against them all, it can in nowise obstruct his convenience in recovering that the delinquent who pays him should have relief from the rest.

I do not think it necessary to cite in detail the passages in Lord Stair's Institutions (i. 9, 5), which were relied on by both parties. They deal with the question whether one co-delinquent can be sued for the whole, which his Lordship states to be not clear in equity, though settled by positive law ; and such expressions as might be held to refer to the right of relief are, in my opinion, susceptible of different constructions. It is, however, material to note that Lord Stair expressly limits the operation of the rule to those persons who have either taken an active share in committing the delict, or who knowingly sanctioned its commission. Mr Erskine (iii. 1, 15), after stating the rule of procedure, says,—“ As soon as the damage is repaired or made up to the party hurt by any of them, the obligation is extinguished as to the rest ; for an obligation founded upon damage cannot possibly continue after the damage ceaseth to exist.” That is certainly true, in so far as the injured party is concerned. His claim is “ founded upon damage ” ; the claim of relief rests not upon any injury sustained by the claimant but upon the fact, as Lord Bankton puts it, that by the use of his money the rest have been freed from their obligation—a circumstance which, in ordinary cases, is sufficient, according to the law of Scotland, to raise a right of relief.

Nor do I consider it necessary to refer in detail to the observations made by the late Lord President (then Lord Justice-Clerk) in Liquidators of Western Bank v. Douglas and Others.¹ That was an action against directors based on gross and wilful malversation and on gross habitual and total neglect of duty, in which all were participant ; and, alternatively, on fraudulent concealment, or fraudulent misrepresentation, or gross negligence, in which all of them were implicated. Some of these allegations, if proved, would have amounted to delict. The defenders pleaded that the action could not proceed until an official of the bank, who appeared on the face of the record to be a co-delinquent, was called as a party. The Court rejected the plea upon the ground that the action was founded upon delict or quasi-delict. The observations of the Lord President, upon which the appellant relied, do not appear to me to carry the doctrine beyond that limit ; and it is necessary to notice in connection with them the views expressed by the learned Judge at a subsequent stage of the same case, in Liquidators of Western Bank v. Bairds.² His Lordship said,—“ In an ordinary action brought against trustees or managers, or mandatories acting under authority from others, where liability is sought to be enforced simply on the ground of gross neglect or omission, it may be fairly questioned whether all the parties implicated ought not to be called, so that, although liable, it may be, conjunctly and severally, they may yet inter se be entitled to relief. The effect of gross neglect may be to deprive trustees of the protection expressly conferred by the trust-deed, or, as in this case, by contract, against liability for omission or for each other. But it does not follow that their liability on that ground, although each may be subjected in solidum for loss caused by the gross neglect of all, is of such a nature as to deprive the trustee who is made liable of his relief against co-trustees equally culpable with himself.” These remarks appear to me to indicate that, in the opinion of the learned Judge, the rule of procedure applicable to delicts had in the case of some quasi-delicts been carried beyond equitable limits, and also that the nature of a quasi-delict may be such that one co-delinquent upon whom liability has been fixed may have relief against the rest.

An opinion to the same effect was expressed by my noble and learned friend Lord Shand in the subsequent case of *Croskery v. Hendrie and Others*¹ already referred to. The action was one of damages against trustees, and was held by the Court to be founded, not upon contract, but upon quasi-delict. In repelling the plea that all the co-delinquents had not been called as defenders Lord Shand said,—“If I thought that by so holding we were prejudicing the question whether, when one of the trustees has been found liable for a breach of trust duty, and there has been no fraud, he could claim a contribution from those who have not been called, but who were also parties to the acts of negligence or violation of duty which created the liability to the beneficiaries, it might have been different. But when a pursuer has reasons for selecting one defender rather than another, there can be no prejudice suffered, as amongst the trustees themselves, in the subsequent question whether those who have not been called, but who were, it may be, equally to blame, must bear a share of the loss to the estate.”

From these authorities, which are to some extent conflicting and in other respects are not so definite as one could wish, I think the following conclusions may be derived: They are at variance in so far as they directly relate to the existence or non-existence of a right of relief among those persons who have incurred civil liability by acting together in the perpetration of an offence against the criminal law. But it does not appear to me that the dicta of those writers who negative the existence of such a right can be held to contemplate every case of quasi-delict, whatever be its nature. They prima facie refer to proper delicts, and might ex paritate rationis be extended to every quasi-delict which, according to the phraseology of Scotch law, sapit naturam delicti; but they cannot, in my opinion, be fairly read as referring to quasi-delicts which involve no moral offence on the part of the delinquent. The opinions expressed by Lord President Inglis, and more recently by Lord Shand, point strongly to that interpretation. These opinions refer, no doubt, to persons who in their trust capacity have been guilty of acts or omissions injurious to the state under their charge and amounting to quasi-delict; but it is obvious that the exception which they suggest cannot be founded on the circumstance that the co-delinquents were trustees, but must rest on the principle that a right of relief exists and is available to a co-delinquent whose acts or omissions are not tainted with fraud or other moral delinquency.

I do not find it necessary for the purposes of this appeal to determine whether and how far the doctrine of Bankton and Kames, or that laid down by Baron Hume, ought to be accepted. I have already indicated my opinion that the circumstances of this case bring the respondent company within the scope of the principle just stated, which I do not hesitate to affirm upon its own merits, whether it be regarded as an exception from the general rule or not. There is weighty and recent authority in its favour, there is no tangible authority against it, and it appears to me to be founded on substantial considerations of equity.

Owing to the novelty of the questions which it involves, I have been led to discuss this branch of the case with, it may be, unnecessary detail. But I desire also to rest my decision upon another and in some respects a broader ground, which is very shortly and forcibly stated in the judgment of Lord Rutherford Clark. This is not an action brought by one delinquent against whom decree has passed in order to obtain contribution from his co-delinquent who has not been sued. The respondent company do not require to allege and prove either delict or quasi-delict as the foundation of their claim, which rests upon a decree constituting a civil debt against the appellant as well as against themselves. There might be some principle in a Court of law refusing to permit a suitor to aver and prove his own crime or moral delinquency as the medium of recovering from one whom he alleges to have been a co-delinquent. But the case is very different where the injured party's claim of damage is liquidated by a joint and several decree against all the delinquents. In that case—which is the present case—the sum decreed is simply a civil debt, and the meaning which the law attaches to a decree constituting a debt in these terms is, that each debtor under the decree is liable in solidum to the pursuer, and that inter se each is liable only pro rata, or, in other words, for an equal share with the rest. In this case it is the appellant who seeks to escape from the natural import of the decree, by going behind it in order to establish his own co-delinquency.

It was urged for the appellant that, seeing it is impossible to determine the exact proportion of the total damage attributable to the fault of each debtor, the whole loss must fall upon the debtor against whom the creditor chooses to enforce the decree, otherwise contributors might have to pay in excess of their real share. I cannot appreciate the force of that reasoning. The creditor is not bound to recover the whole from one; he may take it from all in what proportions he chooses; but that right of selection is not given to him in order that he may assess the damage due by each, but for his own convenience and in order that he may get in his money with the least possible trouble. And I fail to see how any inequality in contribution, such as the appellant suggested, could be redressed by the adoption of a rule which would practically leave it to the creditor to determine whether his damages should be borne by one or more or all of the debtors, and if by all in what proportions. The result of the rule, in many cases, would be that the whole loss would fall upon the debtor who had the least share in causing the injury.

I have not hitherto noticed the English case of Merryweather v. Nizan.¹ Assuming it to be an authority establishing the general rule for which the appellant contends—a proposition which seems to admit of doubt—I can only regard it as a positive rule of the common law of England, which is inconsistent with, and ought not to override, the law and practice of Scotland. The merits of the rule are not, in my opinion, such as to commend it to universal acceptance.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutor appealed from is right and ought to be affirmed with costs.

LORD HALSBURY.—I concur with the proposition that the case of *Merryweather v. Nizan*¹ has been so long and so universally acknowledged as part of the English law that even if one's own judgment did not concur with its principle it would be now too late to question its applicability to all cases in England governed by the principle therein enunciated; but I am not prepared to differ from the views entertained by the Lord Chancellor and my noble and learned friend Lord Watson when dealing with the jurisprudence of Scotland.

The difficulty which has arisen is, I think, one of words. The word "tort" in English law is not always used with strict logical precision. The same act may sometimes be treated as a breach of contract and sometimes as a tort. But "tort" in its strictest meaning, as it seems to me, ought to exclude the right of contribution which would imply a presumed contract to subscribe towards the commission of a wrong. It seems to me, therefore, that the distinction between classes of torts or quasi-delicts and delicts proper is reasonable and just, though I doubt whether in dealing with an English case one would be at liberty to adopt such a distinction. It becomes unnecessary to consider the form of the suit; but I think that in England the transmutation of the cause of action into a judgment would not prevent the application of the principle of Merryweather v. Nizan.¹

LORD SHAND.—I also am of opinion that the appeal in this case should be dismissed, and, having had an opportunity of reading and considering the opinions which have just been delivered by the Lord Chancellor and my noble and learned friend opposite (Lord Watson), I have nothing to add to the reasons which have been given by them.

INTERLOCUTOR appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

Railway—Running powers—Use of joint station—Statute—Construction—Act 29 and 30 Vict. cap. cccxi.—In 1864 the Scottish North-Eastern and the Great North of Scotland Railway Companies built a joint station at Aberdeen, which was by statute declared to be their joint property. It was provided that the control and management of it should be in a joint committee of the two companies. The Scottish North-Eastern Company, with "all the rights, interests, and estate" which it possessed, was afterwards transferred by the Act 29 and 30 Vict. cap. cccxi. to the Caledonian Railway Company. The 99th section of the Act, after reciting that the railways of the North British Company formed, with other railways, lines of communication between London and Scotland, &c., and that it was expedient that free and expeditious transit of traffic over the said lines of communication should be secured, enacted that the expression "Scottish East Coast traffic," as used in the Act, should mean traffic of every description on the Scottish North-Eastern line from or to any place on or beyond and via the North British lines. And by the 106th section of the same statute it was provided that "the North British Railway Company may, for the purpose of conveying Scottish East Coast traffic, run over and use with their engines, trucks, and carriages of every description, the Scottish North-Eastern lines, or any part thereof, and the stations, watering-places, works, and conveniences upon and connected with the Scottish North-Eastern lines." Further, the North British Railway were to be entitled to "the joint or separate use of the offices, warehouses, stations, sidings, and other accommodation at the several stations, wharfs, stopping, loading, and unloading places, sidings, and junctions of the Scottish North-Eastern lines, including, in so far as the company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen, and all conveniences therewith connected. . . ."

After the North British Railway had been for some years admitted to the station, and had enjoyed its conveniences for their traffic, an action was brought by the Joint Committee and the Great North of Scotland Company for declarator that the North British Company had no right, without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Company, to use the station, and for interdict. The First Division held that, the object of the Legislature having been to give every possible facility for the passage of Scottish East Coast traffic upon the lines in question, the North British Company were entitled not only to running powers through the station at Aberdeen, but also to the use of the station itself, and all the conveniences and privileges connected therewith, in so far as these were enjoyed by the Caledonian Company.

In an appeal held (rev. the judgment) that section 106 of the Act of 1866 giving the North British Company the joint or separate use of the stations on the Scottish North-Eastern lines, "including, in so far as the [Caledonian] Company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen," was to be read as giving the use of the Scottish North-Eastern stations, "including, in so far as the Caledonian Company lawfully may include, the station at Aberdeen"; (2) that the Caledonian Company had no right to give the use of the Aberdeen station without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, the other joint proprietor thereof; and (3) that the pursuers were entitled to declarator that the North British Company were not entitled without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Company to use the joint passenger station for the purposes of their traffic, or to run over with their engines the said station or the railway lines of the same.

(In the Court of Session, 28th May 1891, 18 R. 855.)

The pursuers appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Inner-House affirming an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. No question of general principle is involved, the case turning entirely upon the construction of certain statutory provisions and the rights thereby conferred.

The question in dispute is this. In the year 1864 an Act was passed under which a joint passenger station was constructed at Aberdeen by and for the use of the Scottish North-Eastern and the Great North of Scotland Railway Companies. It is not necessary to trouble your Lordships with the terms upon which the expense of constructing that station was contributed by the two railway companies; it is sufficient to refer your Lordships to the rights of the parties in the station when constructed. The station was to be "jointly and equally the property of the company and of the Great North Company." "The lines from the centre of the station to the junction of the Great North of Scotland Railway" were for the purpose of "tolls, rates, and charges to be deemed part of the Great North of Scotland Railway, and the lines from the centre of the station to the Scottish North-Eastern Railway" were "for the same purposes to be deemed parts of the Scottish North-Eastern Railway." The station "when made" was to "be under the control and management of a joint committee" representing the two railway companies. "Each of the companies" was to "be entitled to the free use of the joint passenger station for through and local passenger traffic, and in proportion to their traffic to an equal amount of accommodation therein." And then it was provided that "for all through and local passenger traffic" the stations down to that time used by the two companies respectively were to be abandoned. "The tolls and rates charged by the two companies respectively for the use of their respective portions of the railway and for the use of the joint passenger station" were to "be paid over to the joint committee monthly, subject to a deduction of 40 per cent for working expenses," and "the sums so paid to the joint committee" were to "be deemed profits and divided into four equal parts, and three of such four parts were to be paid to the Great North Company," and the remaining fourth to the Scottish North-Eastern Company. The only other provision with which I need trouble your Lordships is that the expense attending the joint committee and the maintenance, management, and control of the joint passenger station were to "be paid by the said companies as the joint committee or the arbitrator should from time to time direct according and in proportion to the use made of the same by those companies respectively."

Now, in the year 1866, the Act was passed upon which the present question turns, but I think it is desirable to pause for a moment before looking at the terms of that Act in order to see what was the position of the two companies with regard to the passenger station. It is perfectly clear that it was joint property; it is equally clear that although the joint committee might specially appropriate a particular part of it for certain purposes to the one company, and another particular part for certain purposes to the other, the statute did not contemplate any general separate appropriation, nor, so far as we know, was any such general appropriation of one part of the station to the one company and the other part to the other company carried out, but there was to be a free use of the station except so far as any portion was specially appropriated, fairly allotted between the two companies in proportion to their traffic. It is conceded by the learned counsel who argued this case on behalf of the respondents that neither of these joint owners could have brought in a third company to participate in the use of that station without the consent of the other. The utmost right that either company had in it was a joint ownership and a right to a joint use.

Under these circumstances in the year 1866 the Scottish North-Eastern Railway Company, one of these two companies, went to Parliament to promote an amalgamation of the Scottish North-Eastern with the Caledonian Railway Company; upon that amalgamation the Scottish North-Eastern was to become absorbed in the Caledonian and all the rights of the Scottish North-Eastern were to pass to the Caledonian, and the Scottish North-Eastern was to cease as a separate corporation to exist. Now, no doubt it was perfectly competent for the Scottish North-Eastern Company to transfer to another corporation such rights as it had, under any agreement for joint use or such rights as arose out of its joint interest. Of course an amalgamation of this sort could not be carried into effect without an application to the Legislature, but there would be nothing at all out of the usual course in the Legislature, if it thought fit to allow such an amalgamation, passing to the Caledonian Company all the rights which the Scottish North-Eastern had previously possessed, including its rights as joint owner and joint user of the station. But when the amalgamation was sought between the Scottish North-Eastern and the Caledonian Companies the North British Company naturally desired to have a voice in the settlement of matters as between the Scottish North-Eastern and the Caledonian, or at all events a voice as regards the terms upon which that amalgamation was to be permitted, because down to that time the Caledonian and the North British had been competing lines to the point at which they came into contact with and in communication with the Scottish North-Eastern, and from that point the Scottish North-Eastern had carried alike traffic which had come along the North British lines, and traffic which had come along the Caledonian lines. From that point to No. 9. Aberdeen the whole of the traffic had been strictly speaking Scottish North-Eastern, although it may have had its origin on the North British line or may have had its origin on the Caledonian line. It was obvious that if the Scottish North-Eastern was allowed to be absorbed in the Caledonian so that this line which had formed a link between Aberdeen and the termini of the Caledonian and the North British lines was to come into the ownership of one of these two competing companies, there might not unreasonably be an anticipation that the North British Company might be unfairly dealt with as regards its traffic, because whereas the Scottish North-Eastern might be supposed to hold an even hand between them, the Caledonian Company would naturally be disposed to prefer its own traffic. The interest of the North British Company of course was obvious, and it is clear that the provisions which are to be found in the Act were inserted for the protection primarily of the North British Company. As regards the Caledonian, of course it was a matter of indifference to them,—they would have been quite content, I have no doubt, to continue running their own traffic through, and at the same time taking traffic which had its origin upon the North British line to Aberdeen, in the same way as the Scottish North-Eastern had done. But the North British Company naturally enough were not content to trust to that, consequently it is impossible to regard the provisions to which I shall have presently to refer otherwise than as provisions primarily intended for the protection of the North British Company.

The North British Company obtained under the Act running powers over the lines which had been Scottish North-Eastern, so that they could themselves take their traffic over those lines, and not only take their traffic over those lines, but use the stations upon those lines. That undoubtedly was a part of the scheme of the Act, and in so far as those lines belonged exclusively to the Scottish North-Eastern or to the Caledonian there was no difficulty in the matter. Of course it was perfectly competent to either of those railway companies to bargain with the North British and to confer upon the North British the right to use to any extent they pleased both their lines and their stations. But no such bargain was possible as regards the joint station. Neither the Scottish North-Eastern Company nor the Caledonian as its successor could have a right to confer upon the North British Company any power to enter this station, and to use it as of right. That is not disputed; the sole question is whether the Legislature has conferred that right upon the North British Company.

That depends upon the construction of the 106th section of the Act of 1866, and I propose to refer to the words themselves by which the right is supposed to have passed, and to consider first of all their construction both apart from the arguments derived from the supposed object of the Act which is relied upon as stated in section 99, and apart from the force of the argument that it is not likely that the rights of the Great North Company would have been bargained away behind their backs. I say that I shall altogether put aside for the moment those arguments and look merely on the words, of course bearing in mind in construing the language what was the legal position of the parties, that this was not a station belonging to the Scottish North-Eastern Company, and that the right to use that station was a right which they had no legal power to confer.

The 106th section is this—"The North British Railway Company may for the purpose of conveying Scottish East Coast traffic run over and use with their engines, trucks, and carriages of every description the Scottish North-Eastern lines or any part thereof, and the stations, watering-places, works, and conveniences upon and connected with the Scottish North-Eastern lines."

Now, I think that the natural construction to be put upon that would be, if it stood alone, to confine it to the lines which belonged to the Scottish North-Eastern Company and the stations belonging to them and as to which they were in a position to confer the right, and that it would not be the natural construction to extend it to property which did not exclusively belong to them and as to which they were not in a position to confer the right. But however that may be, and without dwelling upon the words "connected with the Scottish North-Eastern lines," which were much relied upon, I would observe that the whole section must be read together, and that it will not do to stop there and to consider what would be the effect of these words if they stood alone, because the North British Company were to "be entitled to the conveniences and privileges, and be subject to the regulations and obligations hereinafter mentioned"; and if those conveniences and privileges, regulations, and obligations relate to some of the matters which are covered by the earlier general words of the statute, it is obvious that upon all sound principles of construction you cannot first of all ask what would have been given them by the general words if they had stood alone and then look to see whether it is also given by these special words. The whole section must be read together.

Now, the portion of the section which deals with the use of the stations is the 4th subsection, and amongst the "privileges and conveniences" conferred is "the joint or separate use of the offices, warehouses, stations, sidings, and other accommodation at the several stations, at the wharves, stopping, loading, and unloading places, sidings, and junctions of the Scottish North-Eastern lines."

Well, if the matter had stood there it might have been open to argument, one way or the other, that the stations of the Scottish North-Eastern lines included this joint station. I confess, my Lords, that my impression would have been to the contrary if there had been nothing more than that, having regard to the legal position of the parties as to this joint station. But then the clause proceeds to say, "including, in so far as the company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen."

Now, everybody agrees that that expression is elliptical, that something is to be supplied, but it appears to me that when you have an ellipsis of this description, there is on the one hand a natural and grammatical supply of that which is left wanting; and there is, on the other hand, an arbitrary and gratuitous supply, and certainly the natural and grammatical supply is to be preferred unless there is reason for rejecting it.

Now, it appears to me that the words "in so far as the company lawfully may" are obviously a limitation or qualification of the word "including." What, then, is to be supplied after the word "may"? "Including in so far as the company lawfully may include it," seems to me to be the natural reading of the sentence, unless there is some strong reason for reading it otherwise, or perhaps, as you are dealing with the joint or separate use of the station, "including in so far as the company lawfully may include it, the use of the station at Aberdeen." Now, if either of those be the correct method of supplying what is left elliptical, it is obvious that it is really fatal to the argument of the learned counsel for the respondents, and to the view taken by the Court below, because the company could not lawfully include the station at Aberdeen to the extent of giving the North British Company a right to come in as against the Great North of Scotland Company, nor could they include the use of it to that extent lawfully, and it was only "in so far as the company lawfully may" that it was to be included.

Now, what is the construction contended for by the respondents? It is said that you are to read it thus, "including in so far as the company lawfully may use it, the station at Aberdeen." It seems to me that that is not the construction, and that to put in a verb in that way is not supplying an ellipsis in any ordinary and grammatical sense; it is putting in the words that are wanted in order to confer the right which it is suggested that the Legislature meant to confer for reasons to which I will allude in a moment.

The judgment of one of the learned Judges in the Court below certainly proceeded very much upon the ground to which I have alluded, and I think it was that view which was substantially contended for by the learned counsel who appeared at the bar for the respondents. The Lord President, indeed, took a different view; he did not regard these words as very important, because the view which he took, although I confess with all deference that I am unable to understand how he arrived at that conclusion, was that supposing that the North British Company had the right which they contended for, nothing more had been given to them than the Caledonian Company lawfully could give. No doubt if that were the conclusion you do not need any words of construction such as are now suggested by the learned counsel for the respondents. Then the case is a very plain one. It is quite certain that anything that the Caledonian Company could lawfully give was to be given as regards the use of the station as well as of others, and I have no doubt myself that these words would be effectual to prevent the Caledonian Company interposing any difficulty, if the North British could arrange with their co-proprietors, the Great North of Scotland Company. To that extent I do not doubt that it is effectual.

Therefore, putting quite aside any argument derived from the improbability that the Legislature would behind the back of a railway company interfere with its rights in a private Act, which really embodies a parliamentary contract—I say putting that aside altogether, and looking at nothing but the plain ordinary and grammatical interpretation of the language, it seems to me to be conclusive against the argument of the respondents.

But, my Lords, reliance was placed by the learned Judges in the Court below, and to some extent has been placed by the learned counsel for the respondents here, upon this. They say that section 99 shews that the Legislature intended to create, or to give the means of a complete and free competition between the Caledonian and North British Companies as far as Aberdeen, and that this free competition which is said in section 99 to be one of the purposes of the succeeding sections, would not be effectually given if the Caledonian Company could succeed to the Scottish North-Eastern Company's right in the station at Aberdeen, and if the North British Company could not insist on a similar right. Well, it may be that it would prevent the competition being as effectual as was contemplated, but it comes to no more than this, that the fact, that that competition could not be made complete without some arrangement with a proprietor outside all the provisions of this Act, had been overlooked, which, of course, is a perfectly possible case; at all events I do not think that any inference can be drawn from this purpose exhibited in the language of section 99 sufficient to

No. 9. justify what to my mind is a violation of the natural and ordinary construction of section 106. And this, I think, is to be observed, that the preamble of the whole Act makes no reference to any such purpose at all. The preamble of the Act makes reference only to the amalgamation of the Caledonian and Scottish North-Eastern Companies, and to the benefits likely to result from such amalgamation. But, my Lords, if there were any force, or whatever force there be in the argument derived from that section, and however great that force is, as I say, it does not seem to me to be possible to contend that it would justify your overriding the natural construction of the language used in the subsequent section. It is difficult to deny that there is at least equal force in any argument the other way, namely, that it is not according to the ordinary practice that in an Act of this description the rights of third parties, who are in no way within the purview of the Act, who are nowhere contemplated in the Act, and in no way came before the mind of the Legislature, should be held to be dealt with by the language used. It does not need authority for the purpose of establishing the proposition that if there be two constructions which are equally open (I am putting it at the very lowest), and the one construction would allow of the rights of third parties being completely preserved, while the other would involve their being infringed, the former is the construction to be preferred; that, I think, can hardly be denied. But when of the two constructions that which would preserve the rights of third parties is the more natural and grammatical, it seems to me that any argument in favour of an interpretation which would put that aside on account of the supposed intention of the Legislature indicated in other parts of the statute, is far more than counterbalanced by the argument derived from the improbability that the Legislature would have so intended.

For these reasons I submit to your Lordships that the interlocutor appealed from must be reversed, and I would suggest to your Lordships that the best course would be to reverse the interlocutor and to "declare that the defenders are not entitled, without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, part owners thereof, to use the joint passenger station, or any part thereof, or the conveniences connected therewith, for the purposes of their traffic, or to run over or use with their engines, trucks, or carriages of any description the said station or the railway lines of the same, or the sidings, accesses, or works extending for 200 yards on each side of the passenger shed of the said joint passenger station, or any part of the same" (as to those last words I should have thought that it was hardly necessary to say that, because that is within the definition of "passenger station"), and then to remit the cause to the Court below with that declaration, so that your Lordships should not pronounce immediately any interdict, but should leave the Court below to pronounce the interdict, and to deal with it upon the basis of that declaration.

LORD WATSON.—Whilst I agree with all the observations which have been made by the Lord Chancellor, I am of opinion that section 106, subsection 4, of the Act of 1866, according to its just construction, is absolutely conclusive against the respondents' case. It appears to me to enact in terms that the joint station is only to be included in the arrangement with regard to running powers which that section sanctions, if and provided that the Caledonian Company have power to include it, and that it is to stand excluded from the scope of the agreement if the Caledonian Company have not that power. Now, it is exceedingly plain to my mind—indeed it is not disputed—that apart from the terms of the Act of 1866 the Caledonian Company could have no power to communicate the use of the joint station to the North British Company or any other company without the consent of the other joint owner of the station, namely, the Great North of Scotland Company. That consent not having been obtained, the joint station is beyond the terms of the Statute of 1866 until such consent has been duly obtained, when it will become operative against the Caledonian Company in terms of the 106th section, and operative against the Great North of Scotland Company in respect of the consent which they will then have given.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur. The question is one on the construction of private Acts of Parliament. Here it is sought to interfere with or affect the rights of a railway company which was no party to the Act of 1866 by a construction sought to be imputed to its 106th section. I do not assent to that construction, and concur in the views of my noble and learned friend on the woolsack.

It would be very dangerous in the case of such Acts of Parliament to assent to the arguments of the respondents. The sections of these Acts are often inserted to give effect to private arrangements between the promoters and other persons who are desirous of making a good bargain for themselves. When it is sought to stretch the construction of such sections so as to affect the rights of third parties, they must be read with great caution, and often fortius contra proferentem. Here the construction which would preserve the rights of third parties is the more reasonable and natural, and no difficulty really arises.

LORD SHAND.—Agreeing as I do with the opinions which have fallen from your Lordships, I only venture to add a few words with reference to the opinion of a learned Judge—Lord Adam—who has gone very fully into the consideration of the clauses which have formed the subject of the argument. His Lordship's judgment appears to me to be based upon two views, upon each of which I venture to differ from the statement he has made.

In the first place, the main point in the case is really to determine the meaning of subsection 5 of section 106 of the Statute of 1866. In dealing with that subsection I find that his Lordship says, with reference to the words upon which practically the whole question between the parties turns—I mean the words “including, in so far as the company lawfully may, the station at Aberdeen, and all conveniences therewith connected”—“Now, what is the meaning of the words ‘in so far as the Caledonian Company lawfully may’? It is an elliptical form of expression, but I think the meaning is that they are to be entitled to the use of the joint station so far as the Caledonian Railway Company may themselves lawfully use it—that is to say, that the North British Railway Company were to have exactly the same privileges and uses as the Caledonian Railway Company.” My Lords, if that had been so, there might be a basis—there probably would be a basis—for the judgment which the Court of Session has pronounced, but I agree with the Lord Chancellor and with your Lordship in thinking that that is not the true construction, or even the meaning, according to the grammatical construction of the words which have been used. It appears to me to be clear that the force of these words “including in so far as the company lawfully may the station at Aberdeen,” is this—including the use of the joint station in so far as the Caledonian Company may give such use. The preliminary part of the section deals with use only, and I think that this part of it refers to the use only. If, therefore, all that is given, all that is included, is such use as the Caledonian Company can give, then you are simply thrown back to the question—Can the Caledonian Company, they being themselves only one of two joint owners of the station, and one of two parties entitled to use it, give any use of it without the consent of the other party being obtained? Upon that point it is, as the Lord Chancellor has observed, conceded that as between two joint owners no such use can be given.

The other observation which I desire to make is with reference to the succeeding passage of Lord Adam's opinion in which he refers to the clauses of the Act of 1864, which provided for a certain appropriation of the accommodation at the joint-station. His Lordship in this seems to assume that substantially there was to be an appropriation of one part of the joint station to one of the companies, and of another part to the other company, so that the Great North of Scotland Company might have one part of the station, and the Scottish North-Eastern, or the Caledonian as succeeding them, the other part of the station. His Lordship says,—“That is to say, that the companies who built this station, and whose joint property it was, were to have it appropriated for their accommodation; in other words, part of it in proportion to their traffic is to be set aside for the particular use of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, and part of it is to be set aside for the use of the Caledonian Railway Company.”

If that had been the state of matters, I think there would have been a great deal to be said for the view that the Caledonian Company having a part of that station set aside for their exclusive accommodation might introduce a third party into that part of the station; but when we look at the provisions of the Act of 1864, I think it is clear that the great bulk of that station was intended to be used for joint accommodation—an accommodation in which the two parties were to be equally interested, as it was joint property—and that being so, there being not two separate stations, as there would be in the case supposed, but substantially one station for joint accommodation, I think, with great deference to Lord Adam, that this reasoning of the learned Judge in support of his judgment fails. I have merely ventured to add these observations in order to shew that so far as I am concerned I have very carefully considered the elaborate opinion which his Lordship has delivered in this case.

I have only further to add that if the canon of construction which has been applied in so many cases, that you are not to interfere with the rights of third parties in a private, personal, and local Act such as this is, public though it be—if it is to be applied here—there can be no possible doubt upon the case. But even taking it upon the footing that the Great North of Scotland Company had appeared before the committee which passed this Act, and that upon their intervention these words “in so far as the Caledonian Company have the power to use” had been inserted, I should have been prepared to hold that the result must be the same, because I think that the North British Company have failed to shew that the Caledonian Company had any power whatever to give the use of the station for which they have here contended.

I therefore agree with your Lordship in thinking that the decision must be reversed.

LORD BOWEN.—I concur both in the reasoning of the noble and learned Lords who have already spoken, and in the result to which that reasoning has led them. No. 9.

“ORDERED that the interlocutor appealed from be reversed, that it be declared that the defenders are not entitled, without the consent of the Great North of Scotland Railway Company, part owners thereof, to use the joint passenger station, or any part thereof, or the conveniences connected therewith, for the purposes of their traffic, or to run over or use with their engines, trucks, or carriages of any description the said station or the railway through the same, or the sidings, accesses, or works extending for 200 yards on each side of the passenger shed of the said joint passenger station, or any part of the same; and that the cause be remitted with this declaration to the Court below to proceed therein as is just: That the respondent do pay the costs both here and in the Court below.”

Copyright—Infringement—Monthly Railway Time-Table—Interdict.—The proprietor of a book of local railway time-tables published monthly presented a bill of suspension and interdict against the publishers of another book of time-tables, for the same locality, selling or exposing for sale any time-tables copied or only colourably different from the complainer's time-tables, or containing excerpts therefrom.

Held upon a proof (alt. judgment of the First Division) (1) that in so far as the respondents' publication consisted of ordinary time-tables, there had been no infringement of copyright; but (2) that in so far as the respondents' publication consisted of certain pages of selected and condensed information as to tourist arrangements and Saturday excursions, which were proved to have been copied from the complainer's publication, there had been a breach of copyright, and that the complainer was entitled to interdict against the respondents issuing any publication containing the said copyright matter. .

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Inner-House recalling an interdict of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Low), and assoilzieing the defenders. The action was brought in respect of an alleged infringement by the defenders of the copyright claimed by the pursuer in certain time-tables which were published by him at Perth. The work alleged to have been pirated contains time-tables, and certain other information to which I will more particularly allude presently. The piracy complained of consisted of an alleged improper use of certain time-tables, published by the pursuer relating to railway trains, and also relating to ferries and steamers and coaches. The Lord Ordinary came to the conclusion that the defenders had pirated a part of the pursuer's work in which he had a copyright, in the matter contained in pages 40 to 53 of the defenders' work, with the exception of a particular time-table, and also in certain other pages which he specified, and in respect of these he granted an interdict. The Inner-House, as I have said, recalled that interlocutor, coming to the conclusion that there had been no piracy at all.

No. 10. The time-tables, which are to be found on the earlier pages which I have mentioned, namely, 40 to 52 and part of 53, consist of tables in the usual form found in all railway time-tables, taking Perth in the main as the starting-point, this being a periodical published at Perth for the information of persons coming to or going from (more particularly going from) that place. The information in these time-tables was of course derived by the pursuer from sources which were as open to the defenders as to himself, and he does not and cannot claim any right to the information as such ; he can only claim copyright in them if they are the result in some respect or other of independent work on his part, and if advantage has been substantially taken by the defenders of that independent labour. The mere publication in any particular order of the time-tables which are to be found in railway guides and the publications of the different railway companies could not be claimed as a subject-matter of copyright. Proceedings could not be taken against a person who merely published that information which it was open to all the world to publish and to obtain from the same source.

Leslie v.
Young & Sons.

As regards some of these tables, there is really nothing more to be said against what the defenders have done than that they have published the same table between the same stations in the same order as the pursuer ; but then those tables, with all those stations and all those times of the trains, are to be found in the companies' books, and neither party would have anything more to do than to copy them in order to arrive at the information which is to be found in both books. It is true that in some cases the mileage has been taken, and is admitted by the defenders to have been taken from the pursuer's book. As regards other of these tables, it is said that they were not mere copies of tables to be found in the railway guides, but that there was a certain selection of stations, the smaller stations being omitted, and a selection of trains, some of the trains also being omitted. That applies no doubt to some of the tables. But, my Lords, looking at these tables as a whole, and having regard to the fact that it is admitted that the defenders' work is, as regards these tables, not by any means in all respects a copy of the pursuer's work, that it is not denied that there was a certain amount of original work done by them in compiling these tables, and that there are the differences which have been pointed out, I do not think it can be said that as regards these tables there has been an appropriation by the defenders of the pursuer's work such as to entitle the pursuer to complain, and to obtain the interdict which he claims. The real truth is, that although it is not to be disputed that there may be copyright in a compilation or abstract involving independent labour, yet when you come to such a subject-matter as that with which we are dealing, it ought to be clearly established that, looking at these tables as a whole, there has been a substantial appropriation by the one party of the independent labour of the other, before any proceeding on the ground of copyright can be justified. I do not, therefore, see my way to differ from the conclusion at which the Inner-House has arrived on this part of the case—that the interdict of the Lord Ordinary ought not to stand.

But there is another part of the case which strikes me as of a very different character. It is not separately dealt with by the Inner-House, although it was specifically mentioned by the Lord Ordinary. It appears to me the only part of the work which can be said to indicate any considerable amount of independent labour, and to be entitled to be regarded as an original work. I refer to the part on pages 63, 65, 67, and 69 containing the information with regard to excursions. It seems to me that this was a compilation containing an abridgment of information of a very useful character, and such as was likely to be taken advantage of by those who were travelling in the neighbourhood of Perth. Now, those pages have been, the first with some slight variation, and the others absolutely literally, copied by the defenders from the pursuer's book. It is said that they form only a small portion of the whole book—four pages, it was said, out of forty—and that the first part consisted of an A B C timetable which was wanting in the work of the appellant. But I do not think that that is a just way of regarding the matter in point of law, because a compilation of this kind may contain several independent features of different merit, of differing advantage to the public, and likely to operate to a different extent in promoting the sale of the work. It may be that one part of a work of this kind, though containing only a few pages, may be the very thing the presence or absence of which would most largely promote or retard the sale of the work. Therefore, although these pages are but few, it seems to me that nevertheless they may be properly treated as an independent work and protected by the copyright law. If that be the proper conclusion, it seems to me impossible for your Lordships to resist the further conclusion that there has been in this case a piracy, a substantial appropriation of the pursuer's work by the defenders, and that there is therefore a right to an interdict on the part of the pursuer.

For these reasons I think that the interlocutor appealed from ought to be recalled, and that in place thereof the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary ought to be varied by restricting and confining the interdict to the matter printed upon pages 63, 65, 67, and 69, and that the interdict should be against printing, publishing, selling or exposing for sale, circulating or distributing the time-tables or any other work containing the matter printed on pages 63, 65, 67, and 69 of the defenders' Perth time-tables.

There remains the question how the costs ought to be dealt with. The appellant was in the right in coming to this House, because the respondents had obtained an interlocutor which your Lordships think cannot be supported; and therefore I see no reason why the ordinary rule should not be followed, in accordance with which the respondents would pay the costs of this appeal. But then we come to the question of the costs below. There the present respondents were partly in the right in their appeal from the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. On the other hand, the appellant was partly in the wrong in putting forward too large a case, and it was that very large case which involved great expense in the proof. A great part of the proof was occupied with the question as to these time-tables, some of which, as I have said, really were not an abridgment at all, but were matters regarding which, as it seems to me, it was impossible that the pursuer could reasonably complain of an invasion of copyright. It is therefore clear that a large part of the expense of taking the proof before the Lord Ordinary has resulted from the pursuer insisting upon a contention which I believe all your Lordships think, and which the Inner-House also thought, it impossible to support. I believe all your Lordships think that justice will best be attained by ordering the respondents to pay the costs of this appeal, and ordering that the pursuer shall have one-third of his taxed costs of the proceedings at the trial, and in the Inner-House.

LORD WATSON.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the argument which was

No. 10. addressed to us for the appellant (with, I ought to say, the exception of a few sentences which related to those pages of his book which refer to tourist arrangements and to Saturday excursions), I have had no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the reasoning of the learned Judges of the First Division of the Court of Session was right, and that, for the reasons assigned in their judgments, there is no ground for granting any interdict against the respondents. But those two points, to which I have already alluded, were overlooked, as it seems to me, by the learned Judges, because they were not pressed upon the attention of the Court. Upon that part of the case I have as little difficulty in holding that an interdict ought to issue. I am not prepared to say that every line or even every page of a compilation such as this carries with it a right to protection as copyright. I should be very sorry to affirm that to be universally true. But it appears to me that, in copying these tourist and excursion tables, the respondents have taken the bulk of that portion of the work which carries such a right. If there are any parts of this work which really involve such merit as to entitle them to the protection of copyright, I think these are chiefly to be found in the pages which have been appropriated by the respondents without a single alteration.

Leslie v.
Young & Sons.

I think it would be impossible in these circumstances for the respondents to dispute that they have pirated the work to that extent, except by shewing that such part of the work had no protection. I do not think there can be any doubt that a work of this kind, shewing that a considerable amount of original trouble was taken in bringing all the information together in the form of an abstract for the use of a particular locality, is entitled to protection.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—I concur. The portions of this book referred to by my noble and learned friend upon the woolsack, and my noble and learned friend who has just spoken, are, I think, clearly entitled to protection. They are a substantial part of the book; they contain a great deal of very useful information—the result of careful work and accurate compilation—and I can myself well believe that a great many purchasers would be influenced in making their purchases by the existence of those pages and of those pages alone, not needing the other information, which was very accessible and easily obtainable.

Although for the purposes of the order of the House attention is confined to those particular pages, I am myself of opinion from what I have heard in the able arguments which have been addressed to the House, and from my own examination of the books, that the respondents have very largely availed themselves of the labour and general ability shewn by the appellant here, and although attention is necessarily confined in the order of your Lordships' House to the particular pages referred to by my noble and learned friend on the woolsack, still one cannot, in measuring and in considering the question of costs, forget the bearing and the general merits of the rest of the book. I have no doubt, my Lords, that the order proposed to be made is one which is fully in accordance with the justice of the case, and I entirely concur in the portion of the order with reference to costs.

LORD SHAND.—I concur also in the opinions which have been delivered, and in thinking that your Lordships should grant to the appellant relief to the extent to which it is now proposed to be given.

So far as the time-tables are concerned, which really embrace a considerable proportion of the book in point of length, it is to be observed that the information there given is derived from common sources accessible to every one. No. 10.

 There is no information there given which is not to be found in the ordinary June 7, 1894.
 railway time-tables which are issued by each of the railway companies—particularly the Caledonian and North British Companies, whose railways are the Leslie v. subject on which information is given in these books. The only particulars in Young & Sons.
 which I think it is said that some advantage is gained by the use of these time-tables is that there is a convenient arrangement for people starting from Perth, and a selection of the more prominent stations instead of giving the whole list of stations as they appear in the time-tables issued by the railway companies.
 It does not appear to me that there has been either such labour or such ingenuity shewn with reference to either of those matters as properly to make them the subject-matter of a copyright. Therefore I am of opinion with your Lordships that, so far as the mere time-tables are concerned, there should be no interdict granted.

As regards the other matter, the list of tours which has been selected, which is also no doubt taken from the tables of the railway companies, there has not only been a selection, but also a condensation and an arrangement which would be of very considerable value to the travelling public. It is clear that those have been simply copied, word for word, in the publication which is complained of, and I cannot doubt that that forms a material part of the pursuer's book, and that he is entitled to the remedy which he asks for it. I am of opinion, therefore, that the interdict which has now been proposed should be granted, and I concur in the view that has been taken with regard to the expenses which ought to be paid to the pursuer.

“ORDERED that the said interlocutors of the 20th of July and the 17th of November 1893, be reversed, except in so far as the said

v. Lockwood.

The Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (incorporated with the principal Act of 1883 by section 27), enacted, section 1, that "after 1st July 1889 a person shall not be entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent . . . unless he is registered as a patent-agent in pursuance of this Act." Subsec. (2) "The Board of Trade shall . . . make such general rules as are in the opinion of the Board required for giving effect to this section, and the provisions of section 101 of the principal Act shall apply to all rules so made as if they were made in pursuance of that section." By subsection (3) it was provided "that every person who proves, to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, that prior to the passing of this Act he had been bona fide practising as a patent-agent, shall be entitled to be registered as a patent-agent in pursuance of this Act. (4) If any person knowingly describes himself as a patent-agent in contravention of this section, he shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding £20."

The Board of Trade made certain rules known as the "Register of Patent-Agents' Rules, 1889," which were laid before Parliament, and were not annulled. They provided a mode by which a patent-agent practising before the Act should be entered in the register of patent-agents on proving to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade that he had bona fide practised before the Act. They also provided for the payment of a fee of £5, 5s. on being entered on the register, and of an annual fee of £3, 3s. by all patent-agents on the register, and for erasure of the name from the register if these were not duly paid. These fees were employed for the purpose of keeping up a chartered institute of patent-agents incorporated by royal charter of 1891, and of providing and maintaining its library.

L., a patent-agent who had practised before 1888, and had been registered as a patent-agent, declined to pay those annual fees, maintaining that he had a statutory right to design himself as a patent-agent, and to practise as such. His name was thereupon removed from the register. In an action at the instance of the institute, and of three registered patent-agents against L. concluding for declarator that the defender was not entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent so long as he was not registered, and for interdict against him so describing himself, the Second Division assoilzied the defender on the ground that the rules imposing fees upon the defender were ultra vires of the Board of Trade, since they imposed, without statutory authority, a tax upon the defender as a condition of his statutory right to be on the register.

In an appeal the House recalled the judgment of absolvitor, and dismissed the action as incompetent on the ground that the statute in making the use of the designation "patent-agent" by a person not registered a criminal offence and subjecting the person so using it to a penalty did not confer any civil right upon other persons to prevent him using it.

Opinions that the rules were intra vires of the Board of Trade.

Opinions (per the Lord Chancellor, Lord Watson, and Lord Russell of Killowen) that by section 101 of the Act of 1883 the rules formed part of the statute, and that it was not competent for any Court of law to entertain any question as to their validity.

Opinion (per Lord Morris) that the rules had only statutory effect in so far as they were made "for giving effect" to section 1 of the Act of 1888, and that the question whether they were so might competently be raised in and determined by a Court of law.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In this case the summons of the present appellants claims a declaration that the defender was not registered as a patent-agent in pursuance of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888, and was not entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent; and, in the second place, that the defender ought and should be interdicted, prohibited, and discharged from describing himself as a patent-agent. The pursuers in the action were the Institute of Patent-Agents and three registered patent-agents practising in Glasgow. An interdict in the terms concluded for by the summons was granted by Lord Low, the Lord Ordinary, who came to the conclusion that the defender had held himself out as a patent-agent when not registered, and that he was therefore liable to be interdicted in the manner prayed.

Ld. Chancellor
(Herschell).
Lord Watson.
Lord Morris.
Lord Russell
of Killowen.

When the case came before the Second Division of the Inner-House they recalled the interdict. They came to the conclusion that although the defender was not registered as a patent-agent, and had been holding himself out as such without being registered, his name had been improperly removed from the register by the Institute of Patent-Agents or the registrar appointed, and, consequently, that although not registered, he could not be treated as having committed an offence by so holding himself out. The majority of the learned Judges came to the conclusion that the rule under which the registrar had purported to erase his name was invalid, being ultra vires although duly made by the Board of Trade with the formalities and in the manner prescribed by the Act. They came to this conclusion on somewhat different grounds, to which I shall have to call attention in a moment. I will first state to your Lordships what are the statutory provisions, and what are the rules made under them.

Provisions relating to the registration of Patent-Agents were first made in the year 1888 by the 1st section of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act of that year, which provided that after the 1st of July 1889 a person should not be entitled to describe himself as a patent-agent unless registered as such in pursuance of the Act; and, next, that the Board of Trade should as soon as might be after the passing of the Act, and might from time to time, make such rules as were, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, required for giving effect to the section. It contains a further provision, which I shall have occasion to call attention to hereafter. It also provides that,—“If any person knowingly describes himself as a patent-agent in contravention of this section, he shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds.”

It will be observed that the enactment does not provide for the manner in which the register is to be formed, who is to be the registrar, the formalities requisite for registration, or any particulars in relation to it, but leaves it to the Board of Trade to make such general rules as in their opinion are required for giving effect to the section; the effect, of course, intended by the Legislature being the establishing a complete system of registration for patent-agents. The Board of Trade accordingly made a number of rules, and amongst them a rule requiring a certain fee to be paid on first registration, and an annual fee of three guineas so long as the person continued on the register, and providing further that nonpayment of the prescribed fees should be a ground for erasing the name from the register.

Institute of Patent-Agents
v. Lockwood.

The Lord Ordinary considered that those rules were intra vires. The majority of the Inner-House appear to have thought that no rules with reference to fees could be intra vires, inasmuch as the power to impose fees was not expressly conferred. Lord Rutherford Clark, I gather, dissented from that view, and concurred with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that some fees might be properly imposed by rules. He said,—“It is quite possible that fees may be exacted for the maintenance of the register, but the fees which are fixed by the rules are plainly in excess of what is required for that purpose, and it is equally plain that they were not imposed in order to carry that purpose into effect.” I am unable to see upon the record any foundation for that conclusion. It seems to be suggested that there was an admission that they were larger than would be required for such a purpose, but no such admission has been made at the bar, nor does it appear on the record, and I cannot but think that there was some misapprehension as to there being an admission going to that extent.

I confess that it seems to me, if there were any power to impose fees at all, very difficult indeed to arrive at the conclusion, when the Board of Trade have sanctioned a particular fee, that it is within the province of a Court of law to canvass their conclusion, and to determine what is the legitimate amount at which the fee may be fixed. Such a department as the Board of Trade is very much more competent to determine a question of that description than Judges can possibly be, and it would be, I think, not an improvement upon any scheme of legislation which gave power to fix fees if those fees were made subject to the control of the Judges according to their views of what fees were reasonable or unreasonable.

The question whether there is power to impose a fee at all is, no doubt, a much more serious question. The contention on the part of the respondent is, that there being no express power given to impose fees, it can never be supposed that it was intended to commit to a public body without express sanction and authority the power to impose taxation, which this in effect is. I cannot myself regard this as properly called taxation. The Statute of 1883, of which this Act in many particulars is an amendment, creates a register, or, at all events, continues a register, and it provides that the Board of Trade, with the sanction of the Treasury, may regulate the fees to be required for registering and doing other acts in connection therewith; and of course the fixing of fees for a great variety of matters being left to a rule-making body is a description of legislation thoroughly well understood. It is every-day practice for those to whom rule-making is committed to have committed to them also the fixing of the fees which are to be paid in relation to matters to be done under the rules. There is, therefore, nothing novel in legislation of this description. But it is said that no such right is expressly conferred. My Lords, it is impossible to my mind to conceive wider language than that which is used in the 2d subsection of the 1st section of the Act of 1888. The truth is, the legislation is a skeleton piece of legislation left to be filled up in all its substantial and material particulars by the action of rules to be made by the Board of Trade. The section itself contains no provision with reference to the register or the registrar or proceedings on registration, or any of those matters; but it gives very wide power to the Board of Trade to make such rules as are in their opinion required for giving effect to the section. It seems to me that thereupon it was their duty to make all the rules necessary for making the legislation contemplated by the section effective. The Legislature must be taken to have contemplated that a register could not be made without some one filling the office of registrar, or some corresponding office; that any person performing those duties would require a payment for performing them; that the funds not having been expressly found by Parliament, must be somehow or other provided; and seeing that the system and scheme of the legislation under the previous Act had been that fees on registration should, at all events, go towards the expenses of paying for registration, I cannot but think that it was well within the scope of this enactment that the Legislature should entrust the Board of Trade, who were to make these rules, with the power of fixing such fees as they thought reasonable and necessary for carrying into effect the purposes of the section. Unless they had done so, it seems to me very difficult to say that it would have been possible to carry them into effect at all. With all deference to the learned Judges who have taken a different view, it appears to me that the conclusion at which they have arrived has been induced by not sufficiently regarding the method of legislation which has been followed in the section now under consideration, and not observing that it was the intention of the Legislature, having expressed the general object, and having provided the necessary penalty, to leave the subordinate legislation, so to speak, to be carried out by the Board of Trade.

No. 11.

v. Lockwood.

What I am about to say bears also upon the further question which has been argued. It is said that this would be a very large power for the Legislature to commit to any other body; but it must be remembered that it is committed to a public department, and a public department largely under the control of Parliament itself; and not only so, but inasmuch as the section provides that these rules are to be dealt with in the same manner, and subject to the provisions contained in the 101st section of the previous Act, the result is to leave the matter completely in the control of Parliament, because any of the rules made by the Board of Trade may be annulled by either House of Parliament within forty days after they are laid on the table, and the laying of them on the table is made compulsory. Therefore, my Lords, I can see nothing extraordinary in leaving to such a body as the Board of Trade the powers which are in question in this case, at all events when the exercise of their functions by a great public Department of State, itself under the control of Parliament, is placed directly under the control of Parliament also and made subject to its direct action.

That really would be sufficient to determine that these rules were such as the Board of Trade were entitled to make. I will say one word, however, before leaving this part of the subject, upon the point suggested that they involved something harsh or unfair as regards the respondent, inasmuch as it was said that before this he could exercise his profession or calling of a patent-agent without any registration, without the payment of any fee, and now he can only do so and represent himself as a patent-agent by paying an annual fee to keep on the register. That is, in a sense, perfectly true; but, on the other hand, it must be remembered that the position of a patent-agent on the register, when nobody not on the register can call himself a patent-agent, is a position very different, and, in many respects, much more advantageous, than that which he occupied before; and I am not prepared to say that there is any hardship in imposing a small and reasonable fee upon a man who obtains that advantage in order that the register, in the interests of the public, may be carefully and properly maintained.

Institute of
v. Lockwood.

Then it is said that a right expressly given him by the statute is interfered with, inasmuch as the statute provides that "every person who proves to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade that prior to the passing of the Act he had been bona fide practising as a patent-agent shall be entitled to be registered as a patent-agent in pursuance of this Act." Well, my Lords, a complaint is not now made that he was not so registered. It is sought to read this statute as if it ran thus:—"Shall be entitled to be registered, and ever thereafter maintained on the register," which does not appear to me to fall within the language of the Act. But further than that, the argument loses sight of this, that he is only entitled to be registered in pursuance of this Act. Now, where is there anything in this Act about his title to be registered at all, or how is he to get on the register, or who is to put him there, or what register is it to be, and kept by whom? Nothing of the sort is to be found in the section. The words "in pursuance of this Act" only become intelligible if you read into the section, as the statute provides you shall, the rules which are made under subsec. 2. But if you read into the section, as shewing how he is to be registered in pursuance of the Act, the rules made under subsec. 2, then of course every rule, which is intra vires at all events, (putting aside for the moment the other question), is to be read into the section, and have just the same effect as if it had been contained in the Act itself; and if so it is impossible to say that he can claim to be registered otherwise than in the manner which the statute, as filled up, if I may say so, by the rules, provides.

So far I have dealt with the question whether the rules are intra vires; but there is no doubt another very important question which has been argued before your Lordships, namely, whether this question can be canvassed in the Courts, when once the rules have been made by the Board of Trade and laid as provided on the tables of both Houses of Parliament. It is said that it is only rules properly made under subsec. 2 which can become part of the Act and be treated as such.

The words of subsec. 2 are,—“The Board of Trade shall as soon as may be after the passing of this Act, and may from time to time, make such general rules as are in the opinion of the Board required for giving effect to this section, and the provisions of sec. 101 of the principal Act shall apply to all rules so made as if they were made in pursuance of that section.” Therefore, any rule which in the opinion of the Board of Trade is required to be made in order to give effect to the section, is a rule made pursuant to the provisions of subsec. 2, and any rule made pursuant to the provisions of subsec. 2 is to be dealt with as if made in pursuance of sec. 101 of the principal Act. Now, let us see what is to be the effect as regards rules made in pursuance of sec. 101 of the Act of 1883. First of all, “the Board of Trade may from time to time make such general rules and do such things as they think expedient,” and their “general rules may be made under this section at any time after the passing of this Act, but not so as to take effect before the commencement of this Act, and shall (subject as hereinafter mentioned) be of the same effect as if they were contained in this Act, and shall be judicially noticed.” The “subject as hereinafter mentioned” is this, that they are to be laid before Parliament and remain before Parliament for consideration for forty days, and during those forty days they may be annulled by a resolution of either House. If not so annulled, or until so annulled, what is the effect? They are to be “of the same effect as if they were contained in this Act.” I have asked in vain for any explanation of the meaning of those words or any suggestion as to the effect to be given to them if, notwithstanding that provision, the rules are open to review and consideration by the Courts. The effect of an enactment is that it binds all subjects who are affected by it. They are bound to conform themselves to the provisions of the law so made. The effect of a statutory rule if validly made is precisely the same—that every person must conform himself to its provisions, and, if in each case a penalty be imposed, any person who does not comply with the provisions whether of the enactment or the rule becomes equally subject to the penalty. But there is this difference between a rule and an enactment, that whereas apart from some such provision as we are considering you may canvass a rule and determine whether or not it was within the power of those who made it, you cannot canvass in that way the provisions of an Act of Parliament. Therefore, there is that difference between the rule and the statute. There is no difference if the rule is one within the statutory authority, but that very substantial difference, if it is open to consideration whether it be so or not.

I own I feel very great difficulty in giving to this provision, that they “shall be of the same effect as if they were contained in this Act,” any other meaning than this, that you shall for all purposes of construction or obligation or otherwise treat them exactly as if they were in the Act. No doubt there might be some conflict between a rule and a provision of the Act. Well, there is a conflict sometimes between two sections to be found in the same Act. You have to try and reconcile them as best you may. If you cannot, you have to determine which is the leading provision and which the subordinate provision, and which must give way to the other. That would be so with regard to the enactment and with regard to rules which are to be treated as if within the enactment. In that case probably the enactment itself would be treated as the governing consideration and the rule as subordinate to it. Those are points which I need not dwell upon on the present occasion.

Although it is not necessary for the determination of this case to express an opinion upon it, yet, as the matter has been so much discussed, I think it only right to express the opinion which I entertain, that the words to which I have referred are really meaningless unless they have the effect which I have described, and they seem to me to be the apt and appropriate words for bringing about the effect which I have described. They are words, I believe, to be found in legislation only in comparatively recent years, and it is difficult to understand why they have been inserted unless with the object I have indicated.

I have dealt at length with the question whether this rule is ultra vires or not and whether it can be so treated, because it is the ground upon which the decision proceeded in the Court below, and inasmuch as an adverse view was expressed to the validity of the rule, it appears to me well that, differing as I do from that view, I should express my differing opinion.

But that does not really conclude this case. The further question remains which was dealt with in some subsequent observations of one of the learned Judges, Lord Young, whether, even assuming that the rule is good, assuming that the name of the defender was properly erased, assuming that he had no right to practise as a patent-agent, assuming that by doing so he rendered himself liable to the penalty prescribed, it is open to the Institute of Patent-Agents and three practising patent-agents to come to the Court of Session and ask for the conclusions to be found in the summons of the pursuer. My Lords, upon

No. 11. that I confess, with all deference to the Lord Ordinary, I cannot but entertain a very strong opinion. You have here, for the first time, a new offence created June 11, 1894. —the offence of practising as a patent-agent without being on the register. But Institute of Patent-Agents v. Lockwood. for the enactment creating that offence, the defender has done nothing of which anybody would have a legal right to complain either civilly or criminally. The Legislature, having created that new offence, has prescribed the punishment for it, namely, a penalty of £20. Can it possibly under these circumstances be open to bring the individual, not before the summary Court at small expense to determine the question of his liability to a £20 penalty, but to bring him before the Court of Session with its attendant expense and to ask the Court of Session to make a declaration that he has been breaking the law in a manner which the Legislature has said subjects him to a penalty, and, then, having proved that he has rendered himself liable to a penalty, to ask the Court of Session to interdict him, with this result, that if he were to offend again he would not be subject to the summary procedure and the £20 penalty, but would be liable to imprisonment for breach of the interdict?

My Lords, it seems to me, I confess, scarcely necessary to do more than state the contention to shew that it is impossible that it can be supported. If that be the law, the number of cases must have been almost innumerable in which such a proceeding would have been competent, and yet it is absolutely unheard of. I will not dwell upon the grave inconveniences which would result from sanctioning a procedure of that description. The mode of procedure and the amount of penalty are often regarded by the Legislature as of the utmost importance when they are creating new offences, and the law would, I believe, contrary to their intention, be most seriously modified if it were held that the party committing a breach of that which for the first time is made an offence were to subject himself by so doing to proceedings of this description which might result in a committal to prison.

For these reasons, I think that this action was not competent. It is not necessary to decide whether there are any cases in which a declaration might be asked. The only declaration asked here is a declaration of the law contained in the 4th subsection of section 1, and a declaration that the defender has broken the law. That is the only declaration asked for. Obviously the sole object of the action is an interdict.

Although not on the grounds on which the Court below have proceeded, I concur in the result that the action cannot be maintained, and move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed. Although I differ, and I believe all your Lordships differ, from the Court below in the grounds upon which you are dismissing the action, yet I do not think it ought to make any difference with regard to the costs, because, for the reasons I have given, I think that the proceedings ought never to have been taken; that the defender might well defend himself on any ground that he could; and that, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

LORD WATSON.—I am of the same mind with the Lord Chancellor on both the points which he has discussed. I agree with the noble and learned Lord that it is impossible to sustain the judgment of the Second Division upon the grounds which have been assigned for it, but that the judgment is right upon a ground which was pointed out by Lord Young at the close of the advising.

It appears to me that were the House to sustain the present action as a competent one it might lead to very unfortunate results. In reality this is a case in which the interference of the civil tribunal was invoked for the purpose of repressing that which the Legislature intended should be dealt with as a crime. I do not think it was intended by the Act of 1888 to create in the patent-agents whose names are on the register a right which they could defend against those who use the term "patent-agent" without having their names on the register by means of a resort to the Court of Session. On the contrary, I think it was the plain meaning of the Legislature that when a man whose name was not on the register chose to hold himself forth as a patent-agent, the full measure of punishment to be inflicted upon him should be a fine within the sum limited, viz, twenty pounds, to be fixed by a summary Court of criminal jurisdiction. There is a mass of statutes regulating sanitary and other improvements for the benefit of the general public, which every neighbouring member of the public has a certain interest in seeing enforced, as to which it would never do to permit the civil Courts to adjudicate. It is clear, upon the face of such legislation, that breaches of those laws were intended to be dealt with simply as a matter of police regulation, to be punished by a fine. Here, in the Act of 1888, the main intention of the Legislature appears to have been to protect poor inventors from being robbed by unskilled patent-agents who failed to make a specification and claim in such a form as would secure to them the fruits of their invention.

Upon the other point, looking to the view which your Lordships take of the incompetency of this suit, it is certainly not necessary for its decision to observe upon the grounds which found favour with the learned Judges of the Second Division; but I concur with your Lordships in thinking that, although the question does not arise in this case for judicial determination, still, seeing that the point has been decided in the Court below, and that we have heard full argument upon it, it is right that your Lordships should express an opinion. I must say that, for my own part, I have felt very little difficulty in rejecting the view which commended itself to the learned Judges of the Court below.

The 1st section of the Act of 1888, by subsection 1, imposes a prohibition upon persons whose names are not on the register against using the description of "patent-agent"; and the next subsection lays upon the Board of Trade the duty of making by-laws or regulations for establishing and maintaining a register of patent-agents; those who had been patent-agents before the date of the Act having their names inserted, as a matter of course, if they complied with the regulations; those who were not in that position, and who were subsequently admitted, having their qualifications tested by examination, or in some other mode.

Now, it appears to me that the whole scheme was left to the discretion of the Board of Trade; and it is impossible for me to say that, looking to those regulations, the Board of Trade have in any measure exceeded that discretion. It was by their opinion, not by any judicial opinion, that the matter was to be determined. The Legislature retained so far a check that it required that the regulations which they framed should be laid upon the table of both Houses; and of course these regulations could have been annulled by an unfavourable resolution upon a motion made in either House. But what is to be the effect if no such motion be made or carried, or if a motion hostile to the scheme be made in both Houses and rejected by both? The statute makes no difference between these cases. The views expressed by the learned Judges in the Court below, so far as I understand them, would in the latter case make

But I think that all doubt upon that subject is entirely removed by the terms of section 101 of the Act of 1883, which for all practical purposes is incorporated with section 1 of the later Act. "Any rules made in pursuance of this section," in applying the earlier statute to the later, must be read as "Any rules made in pursuance of section 1, subsection 2, of the Act of 1888"; and assuming that the regulations before us were made by the Board of Trade in pursuance of section 1, subsection 2, of the Act of 1888, then in that case these words apply—"shall be of the same effect as if they were contained in this Act, and shall be judicially noticed." My Lords, in regard to these words which I have just read, I do not think I can express my opinion more clearly than by saying that I think that they mean exactly what they say. Such rules are to be as effectual as if they were part of the statute itself.

LORD MORRIS.—I am quite of the same opinion as the noble and learned Lords who have preceded me, viz., the noble and learned Lord upon the woolsack, and my noble and learned friend opposite, on the two main propositions—first, that the action was incompetent, as being brought by persons who had no right to an interdict; and, secondly, that the general rules made by the Board of Trade in this case are intra vires and come within the powers conferred upon them by section 1, subsection 2, of the Act of 1888, combined with section 101 of the Act of 1883.

I could add nothing usefully, and therefore would not waste your Lordships' time by saying more, except that I cannot go to the further proposition which, as I understand, the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack has laid down, that it is not competent for the Courts of justice to consider whether these general rules are intra vires or ultra vires. I am of opinion that it is not alone competent for the Courts of justice to consider, but that it is their duty to consider, whether the rules are ultra vires; that there is no power delegated by the Legislature to the Board of Trade to make any general rules which, when made, are to be considered intra vires provided they are laid before both Houses of Parliament, and provided that nobody has taken the trouble either to read them or to make any motion upon the subject.

Subsection 2 of section 1 of the Act of 1888, which has been repeatedly referred to, enacts: "The Board of Trade shall as soon as may be after the passing of this Act, and may from time to time, make such general rules as are in the opinion of the board required for giving effect to this section, and the provisions of section 101 of the principal Act shall apply to all rules so made as if they were made in pursuance of that section." Section 101, subsection 3, which is to be read with that, is: "General rules may be made under this section at any time after the passing of this Act, but not so as to take effect before the commencement of this Act, and shall (subject as hereinafter mentioned) be of the same effect as if they were contained in this Act, and shall be judicially noticed." Now, I admit that the words are very strong; the general rules are to have the same effect as if they were embodied in the Act; I accede to that. But what general rules? General rules which are made for "giving effect" to that section; not all general rules—there is no such power in my opinion given to the Board of Trade. What are the general rules which are to have the same effect as if they were contained in the Act? The general rules made under the section—general rules such as the Legislature has, under section 101, delegated to the Board of Trade the authority of making. But if a Court of justice (before whom all these questions must ultimately come) considers that certain rules are rules which do not come within this section, in my opinion they would be ultra vires, and it would be the duty of the Court not to regard them as operative. As regards the question of their receiving any further sanction from the fact of their being laid before both Houses of Parliament. That is a matter of precaution; they do not receive any imprimatur from having been laid before both Houses of Parliament; it is only that an opportunity is given to somebody or other, if he chooses to take advantage of it, of moving that they be annulled. It is a precaution which in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred would be practically a sufficient precaution; but with reference to the abstract proposition which was queried in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls which has been cited, I have arrived at the conclusion that if the rules were not such rules as it was contemplated the Board of Trade should have the authority of making under the sections giving them the authority of making rules, it was the duty of the Court to determine that they were ultra vires.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN.—I agree in the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived.

In the facts of this case, I think the second plea of the respondent is a good answer to the action, on the ground that the remedy is not injunction but summary prosecution under section 1, subsection 4, of the Act of 1888. As to the broader questions, I think the rules are intra vires, and are therefore valid and binding, even apart from the provision in section 101 of the Act of 1883, which is incorporated in and made part of section 1, subsection 2, of the Act of 1888, namely, that the rules made are to have effect as if contained in the Act itself. But further, I think that if the rules are to be read as part of the Act (as I think they ought to be) it is not, in this case, competent to judicial tribunals to reject them. Such effect must be given to them by judicial construction as can properly be given to them, taking them in conjunction with the general provisions of the Act or Acts of Parliament in connection with which they have been formulated.

A. Graham Murray, Q.C.—The judgment as it stands is one of absolver. The judgment of the House would lead to a judgment of dismissal.

LORD WATSON.—It ought not to be an absolver. The proper form is, "Recall the decree of absolver, and remit to the Court below to dismiss the action."

"ORDERED that the interlocutor of the 26th of January 1893 be varied by deleting the words 'Assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action,' and inserting in lieu thereof the words, 'Dismiss the action': Further ordered that the said interlocutor of the 26th of January 1893, subject to such variation, and also the said interlocutor of the 22d of February 1893, be affirmed: And it is ordered that the cause be remitted back to the Court of Session, to do therein as shall be just and consistent with this

Black v. Clay.

JOHN CLAY (Respondent), Respondent.—Asher, Q.C.—J. J. Cook—Mark Napier.

Lease—Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 7—Compensation for improvements—Notice—Determination of tenancy.—The Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, sec. 7, provides that "a tenant shall not be entitled to compensation under this Act unless four months at least before the determination of the tenancy he gives notice in writing to the landlord of his intention to make a claim for compensation under this Act."

The lease of a farm was granted for nineteen years from the tenant's "entry, which is hereby declared to be to the houses, grass, and fallow land" at Whitsunday, "to the arable land in corn crop at the separation of the crop from the ground, and to the barns, barn-yard, and two cot-houses at Whitsunday following." After removing from the houses and grass the tenant, four months before Martinmas, gave notice to the landlord of his intention to claim compensation.

Held (aff. judgment of the First Division) that the tenancy of the holding did not terminate before Martinmas, and that the notice given by the tenant was sufficient.

Opinion (per Lord Watson) that after the tenant's removal from the lands under crop his possession of the barns, barn-yard, and cot-houses unconnected with any land, either pastoral or agricultural, would not be possession of a holding in the sense of the Act.

(IN the Court of Session 7th November 1893, 21 R. 41.)

The complainer, Mr Black, appealed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The question raised by this appeal is whether the respondent is disentitled to compensation under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, by reason of his not having "four months before the termination of the tenancy" given notice to the landlord of his intention to make a claim for compensation under that Act, as required by the provisions of sec. 7.

The lease under which the respondent held commenced in 1860, and was for a term of nineteen years, but it has since been extended by tacit relocation. By the lease the lessors set and in tack and assedation let to the lessees all and whole the farm and lands of Winfield for the space of nineteen years "from and after the entry of the said John Clay, which, notwithstanding the date or dates hereof, is hereby declared to be to the houses (with the exceptions after mentioned), grass and fallow land on the 26th day of May in the year 1860, to the arable land in corn crop at the separation of the crop of the same year from the ground, and to the barns and barn-yard and two cot-houses at Whitsunday 1861, from these periods respectively to be possessed by the said John Clay and his foressaids during the space above written."

It will be observed that the term runs from the entry of the tenant, which, as to part of the farm, is to be on the 26th of May 1860; as to other part on the separation of the crop; and as to the residue of the subjects comprised in the letting, on the 26th of May 1861; and that these several subjects are to be possessed by the tenant during the space of nineteen years "from these periods respectively." At what period did the tenancy determine under these circumstances within the meaning of the section to which I have referred ?

Black v. Clay.

It was contended for the appellant that it determined at Whitsunday 1892, when the tenant ceased to hold the grass and fallow lands, and that his subsequent possession of the arable land was not a possession as tenant but only a privilege accorded to one whose tenancy was already at an end. In support of that contention reliance was placed on the opinions expressed in this House in the case of Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun.¹ In that case (where the terms of the lease, so far as regards the grass and arable lands, were very similar to the present) the tenant was entitled to a new term on giving to the landlord notice that he required it "at least twelve months before the expiry of the above term of nineteen years." No more was determined in that case than that the notice given was ineffectual, inasmuch as it was not given twelve months before the term had expired as to a part of the lands held. But there is no doubt that opinions were expressed by noble and learned Lords, especially by Lord Westbury, which give some colour to the contention urged in the present case. That noble and learned Lord said :²—"According to the common law or custom of Scotland, if a lease be granted to a new tenant of a farm partly of arable and partly of meadow or pasture land, for a term of years to commence from Whitsunday, such tenant is entitled to enter on the grass or meadow land immediately on the commencement of the tack ; but the outgoing tenant is entitled to continue in possession of such arable lands as are sown until the separation of the crop from the ground. Still, the lease commences and the term of years runs and is computed in law from Whitsunday, both as to grass and arable, although the common law or custom allows the outgoing tenant to reap and carry away the off-going crop, and gives him a limited right of entry and occupation for that purpose."

I own I have some little difficulty in reconciling the opinion thus expressed with the language used in the lease then under consideration. But in the present case it appears to me to be impossible to adopt the construction contended for. The barns, and barn-yards, and two cot-houses, are to be possessed for nineteen years from the Whitsunday subsequent to the entry on the grass lands. It is not pretended that any such right as this exists "according to the common law or custom of Scotland," which was the foundation of Lord Westbury's opinion, that in the case of the arable lands no tenancy existed, but a mere permissive possession when the term as to the grass lands had come to an end. It appears to me impossible to avoid the conclusion that, as to the barns, barn-yard, and cot-houses, a tenancy is created a year later and terminates a year later than the tenancy of the grass lands ; and if there be a separate lease as to these, how can the lease be construed otherwise than as creating a tenancy in the arable lands which is to continue until the "separation of the crop" after the Whitsunday ? The words of the demise are the same with regard to all three subjects, which are to be possessed for the space of nineteen years from the periods named "respectively."

For these reasons, I cannot but come to the conclusion that the contention that under the lease there was to be one lease, and that as from the Whitsunday when the tenancy of the grass lands came to an end, cannot be supported.

That seems to me to be sufficient to dispose of the appeal. The appellant in

No. 12. his pleadings rests his case upon the ground that the requisite notice was not given four months before that date. It is true that before the Lord Ordinary June 22, 1894. the appellant contended that the actual date when the crop was separated must Black v. Clay. be ascertained; but it may be doubted whether this was open to him upon the pleadings; and any such point was abandoned in the Inner-House.

It is not necessary to determine whether when the ish as to the arable land is to be "the separation of the crop," that is to be regarded as synonymous with the Martinmas term, so that the notice would be in time if given four months before "Martinmas," or whether in the case of the present lease the notice would be in time if given before the ish as to the barns, barn-yard and cot-houses when the tenancy comes completely to an end. I understand that my noble and learned friend Lord Watson is of opinion that the former is the correct view. There is an obvious convenience in such a conclusion, and I do not desire to be understood as expressing any dissent from it.

I do not feel pressed by the difficulty suggested in argument with regard to the period prior to which a notice must be given under sec. 28 of the Act in order that the lease may not be renewed. It may well be that having regard to the object in view the prescribed notice under that section must be given prior to the first ish, where several are provided for by the lease. It does not follow that where there is more than one ish the notice required by section 7 must be so given.

I think, therefore, that the interlocutor appealed from should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—The appellant, who is proprietor of the farm of Winfield, in the county of Berwick, in May 1891, obtained a decree ordaining the respondent to remove from the houses (with the exception after mentioned), grass and fallow land, at the term of Whitsunday 1892, from the arable land at the separation of the crop of the same year from the ground, and from the barns and barn-yard and two cot-houses at Whitsunday 1893. The respondent was tenant under a lease which commenced in 1860. The original term of the lease was for nineteen years; but it was extended for thirteen years beyond that period, by tacit relocation. The decree of removing was in conformity with the stipulations of the lease in regard to entry and ish. The farm was thereby let "for the space of nineteen years from and after the entry of the said John Clay, which, notwithstanding the date or dates hereof, is declared to be to the houses (with the exceptions after mentioned), grass and fallow lands on the 26th day of May in the year 1860, to the arable land in corn crop at the separation of the crop of the same year from the ground, and to the barns and barn-yard and two cot-houses at Whitsunday 1891, from these periods respectively to be possessed by the said John Clay and his foresaids during the space above written." It is, in my opinion, material to notice, that the three portions of the entire farm, for which different times of entry are assigned, are each of them set "in tack and assedation," and are to be possessed by the tenant, for the full period of nineteen years from and after their respective dates of entry.

Sec. 2 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. c. 62), confers upon a tenant of agricultural or pastoral lands, "on quitting his holding at the determination of a tenancy," the right to obtain from his landlord compensation for certain improvements. It is provided by sec. 7 that a tenant shall not be entitled to compensation under the Act, unless "four months at least before the determination of the tenancy he gives notice to the landlord in writing of his intention to make a claim."

Black v. Clay.

The respondent quitted possession of the houses (with the exception of the barn, barn-yard, and two cot-houses), and also of the grass and fallow lands, at the term of Whitsunday 1892. He thereafter, on the 6th day of June 1892, gave the appellant notice of a claim for improvements under the provisions of the Act of 1883, which notice was followed by an application to the Sheriff for the appointment of a referee, in terms of sec. 2 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 20). The appellant then instituted the present process of suspension and interdict before the Court of Session, in order to restrain all further procedure towards the assessment of compensation, upon the ground that the notice served upon him did not comply with the requirements of the 7th section of the Act of 1883.

The Lord Ordinary (Low) refused the interdict, and his decision was unanimously affirmed by the learned Judges of the First Division. In the Outer-House the appellant maintained that the actual date at which the last of the respondent's crop of 1892 was separated from the ground constituted the determination of his tenancy within the meaning of the statute; and he contended that a proof ought to be allowed for the purpose of fixing that date. The Lord Ordinary held that such inquiry was unnecessary, being of opinion that the term of Martinmas must be taken as the ish for the arable lands under crop in the year 1892. His Lordship said,—“I think that an ish at the separation of the crop is practically a Martinmas ish. The rent of a farm is due for the crop and possession of each year separately, and the term of Martinmas is regarded as the end of one crop year and the beginning of another. It is assumed, on the one hand, that the crop will be secured by Martinmas; and on the other hand, the tenant has up to Martinmas to secure the crop. No doubt, if the crop is secured before Martinmas the incoming tenant could not be refused access to the land for the purpose of ploughing, but the outgoing tenant is entitled to exercise his discretion as to the most suitable time for gathering the harvest; and accordingly it is not uncommon that the ish and entry of arable land is made 'at the separation of the crop, or Martinmas,' the two terms being used as synonymous.”

When the case went to the Inner-House the appellant adopted a new line of argument. He there maintained that the possession had by the respondent after Whitsunday 1892, for the purpose of reaping and ingathering his crop, did not constitute tenancy, but merely amounted to a privilege accorded to a tenant by the common law, which was not altered in legal character by its introduction into the lease in the form of a stipulation. That was also the chief, if not the only, argument submitted for the appellant at your Lordships' bar; and it was mainly rested upon the decision of this House in Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun.¹ In that case the lease expired, as to houses and grass, at Whitsunday, and, as to arable land under crop, at its separation, the landlord being under an obligation to grant a new term, upon a notice, by the tenant demanding renewal, “at least twelve months before the expiry of the above term of nineteen years.” The only question was, whether the specific term of nineteen years, which the contracting parties had in view, was to run from the Whitsun-

No. 12. day of entry to the Whitsunday of ish, as to houses and grass, or from the later date of entry to the arable lands till the time of the tenant leaving them. It was held by the House, affirming the judgment of the Court of Session, that Whitsunday was the term which the parties contemplated for the expiry of the nineteen years, and that the tenant, having failed to give notice twelve months before that term, was not in a position to demand a renewal of his lease.

June 22, 1894.
Black v. Clay.

I cannot regard the decision in *Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun*¹ as establishing the principle contended for by the appellant, which appeared to me to be this: that no words of demise will be sufficient to create a tenancy of arable lands under crop, after houses and grass lands are surrendered to the landlord, so long as the demise is made for the sole purpose of enabling an outgoing tenant to tend his crop, and reap it at maturity. The proposition is, to my mind, not altogether intelligible, because the quality of the possession had by an outgoing tenant of land under crop, after he has flitted from houses and grass lands at Whitsunday, differs, so far as I am aware, in no single particular from the possession of lands under crop which he had enjoyed during the previous years of the lease, which was admitted to be possession under his tenancy. No such general question was really involved in the decision of Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun.¹ That it was not the intention of the noble and learned Lords who gave judgment in that case to negative the possibility of a double ish, one for houses and grass, and another for land under crop, appears from the judgment of Lord Wensleydale, who said,²—"If it is a lease with a double termination, one for the houses and grass land, and the other for the arable, I am clearly of opinion that the majority of the Judges have come to the right conclusion."

The leading judgment in this case was, in the First Division, delivered by Lord M'Laren. The Lord President concurred in the views expressed by his Lordship, and in the additional observations which were made by Lord Kinnear. Lord M'Laren was of the same opinion with the Lord Ordinary in regard to the proper construction of the time indicated in the lease as the separation of the waygoing crop from the ground. Upon that point his Lordship observed,—“The reason why the expression ‘separation of the crop’ is used in the clauses relating to entry and removal, is that the incoming tenant may have access to each field as soon as its crop has been ingathered, and shall not be liable to be kept out of possession by a troublesome outgoing tenant in the assertion of a theoretical right to retain possession until Martinmas. But this construction is quite consistent with Martinmas being the autumnal term, wherever it is necessary that something to be done in fulfilment of the lease should be referred to a definite day—payment of rent being a clear case in point. I have therefore no difficulty in holding that, where notice has to be given four months before the autumnal term, the term of Martinmas is the time from which the period of four months is to be reckoned.”

I entertain little doubt that the contract embodied in the lease before us makes effectual provision for three terms of entry and three terms of ish, in regard to different portions of the subjects let; and that, until the arrival of each term of ish, a proper right of tenancy exists with respect to such part of the subjects let as the tenant is bound to quit possession of at that term. I am also of opinion with the learned Judges of both Courts below, and for substantially the same reason, that, in cases like the present, the expression “separation of the crop” ought to be read as signifying the term of Martinmas. I venture to think that, whether tested by reference to their popular meaning, or to their legal effect, "separation of the crop" and the "Martinmas term" are equivalent expressions when they occur in a Scotch lease. When the arable ish is Martinmas, the outgoing tenant could not prevent his successor from ploughing before that term land from which his crop had been removed; nor, in the case of a late harvest, could his successor prevent him from reaping his crop after the term. And, in my opinion, whichever of these expressions be used in the lease, it must be taken to mean the actual term of Martinmas, in all cases where the contractual rights of landlord or tenant are made to depend upon their giving a previous notice. Upon any other interpretation, many conditions, to be performed after Whitsunday at a time previous to, and dependent upon, the date of the tenant's removal from lands under crop, would become inextricable.

Black v. Clay.

Assuming the right construction of the lease to be that which I have indicated, the question still remains, which of the three periods of ish ought to be regarded, for the purposes of this appeal, as the determination of the respondent's tenancy within the meaning of sections 2 and 7 of the Act.

The definition which the Act gives of the expression "determination of tenancy" is not definitive for all purposes. It is defined (section 43) as meaning "the determination of a lease by reason of effluxion of time, or any other cause." That explanation affords no aid in ascertaining whether the punctum temporis from which the time for giving a notice, to be calculated retro, is the first, the second, or the last term of removal. That is a question which, in my opinion, must be decided according to the nature and object of the notice; and I can detect no inconsistency in holding that, in one section of the Act requiring notice, the beginning of removal, and that in another the final removal of the tenant may be contemplated.

In this case I have come to the conclusion that the "determination of a tenancy," as that expression occurs in sections 2 and 7 of the statute, refers to the time when the tenant finally gives up possession of the subjects which in the statute are described as his "holding." Section 2 is framed upon the assumption that his quittance of his holding and the determination of his tenancy are to be, in point of time, coincident. A holding which entitles the tenant to the benefit of its provisions must, according to section 35 of the Act, be "either wholly agricultural or wholly pastoral, or in part agricultural and as to the residue pastoral." The respondent's holding, in so far as it consisted of lands in crop after Whitsunday 1892, was agricultural, and that is, in my opinion, sufficient for the disposal of this appeal. But I entertain serious doubts whether, after his removal in the autumn of 1892, the respondent remained in possession of any holding within the meaning of the Act. I do not think that the bare possession of a barn, barn-yard, and two cot-houses, unconnected with any land either pastoral or agricultural, is possession of a holding recognised by the Act. That view of its provisions does not appear to me to be in the least inconsistent with the main object of the Act, which obviously was to confer certain benefits upon an outgoing tenant. He can have no practical difficulty in intimating his claim of compensation for improvements four months before Martinmas. To postpone that intimation until four months before the following Whitsunday, when he cedes possession of subjects neither agricultural nor pastoral, and not required for any purpose connected with lands agricultural or pastoral, would, in my opinion, be unnecessary, and would suspend for six

No. 12. months his right to recover moneys which he had previously expended for the benefit of his landlord or successor in the tenancy. Not only so, but in so far as concerns the bulk of the statutory improvements specified in part 3 of the schedule, to which the consent of the landlord is not required, it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the landlord to check, or for an arbiter to assess satisfactorily the amount of the tenant's claim, if the time for giving notice were extended to the 15th of January following the tenant's removal from lands under crop.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the interlocutors appealed from ought to be affirmed, with costs.

My noble and learned friend Lord Shand, who heard the argument in this appeal, is unable to be present to-day; but his Lordship has requested me to state that the opinions which I have expressed have been carefully considered by him and have his entire concurrence.

LORD MORRIS.—I have had an opportunity of reading the reasons which have been assigned by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson for his judgment, and I desire to express my entire concurrence.

Tramway—Sale to Local Authority—Undertaking—Price—Rental value—Tramways Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. c. 78), sec. 43.—Section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, provides that where the promoters of a tramway in any district are not the local authority, the local authority may within six months after the expiration of a period of twenty-one years from the time when such promoters were empowered to construct such tramway, require the promoters to sell to them "their undertaking, or so much of the same as is within such district, upon terms of paying the then value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale or other consideration whatsoever) of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking within such district," such value to be determined by a referee appointed by the Board of Trade.

In an action for the reduction of an award by a referee under this provision, held (diss. Lord Ashbourne, aff. judgment of the First Division) that having regard to the fact that the tramway company could not assign the right to use the tramways, the "then value" of the tramway meant the then value of the tramway lines, and that in ascertaining the value the basis of the calculation should be the sum which would be required to construct the lines less a sum for depreciation.

At delivering judgment,—

No. 13.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—In the first of these cases the appellant company was formed under the provisions of a private Act of Parliament in the year 1871. This Act incorporated Part II. and Part III. of the Tramways Act, 1870. Section 43 of that Act entitled the respondents, within six months after the expiration of a period of twenty-one years from the time when the appellants were empowered to construct the tramway, by notice in writing, to require the appellants to sell their undertaking. They accordingly, on the 12th of August 1892, gave notice to the appellants that, in exercise of their rights under that section, they would purchase the appellants' undertaking within the city of Edinburgh. The appellants and respondents having differed as to the price to be paid, the Board of Trade appointed Mr Henry Tennant, of York, as referee, to fix what the price should be. In the narrative of the award or decree-arbitral, which he made, Mr Tennant stated that, in his opinion, after careful consideration of the terms of section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, in valuing the tramways, he was not entitled to take into account the present profits or rental value of the undertaking, but that the proper value of the tramways to be determined by him according to his construction of the statute was such sum as it would cost to construct and establish the same, under deduction of a proper sum in respect of depreciation for their present condition, and that in estimating such cost he was entitled to take into account the fact that the tramways were then successfully constructed and in complete working condition.

July 30, 1894.
Edinburgh
Street Tram-
ways Co. v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The present conjoined actions were thereupon raised by the appellants against the respondents for the purpose of reducing Mr Tennant's award or decree-arbitral upon the ground that his view of section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, was erroneous, and for declaration that he ought, under that section, to have fixed the value to be paid by the respondents for the tramways upon the rental basis, and for an order on him to proceed with the reference, and to find and declare the value of the tramway lines according to their rental value.

Both the Lord Ordinary and the First Division of the Inner-House have held Mr Tennant's award to be good, and have assolized the respondents.

The question on this appeal is whether these decisions were correct. The question turns on the construction to be put upon the language employed in section 43 of the Tramways Act, 1870, which prescribes the terms upon which the promoters of a tramway (in this case the appellants) are to sell their undertaking to the Local Authority. The words are as follows:—"Upon terms of paying the then value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale, or other consideration whatsoever) of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking."

It is contended on behalf of the appellants that the value of the tramway must be ascertained by taking into consideration what rental could be obtained for it if let with all the statutory rights of using it possessed by the promoters, and then allowing whatever may be thought the proper number of years' purchase of the rental which could thus be obtained. The sum so arrived at, it was argued, would represent the then value of the tramway within the meaning of the section.

Before discussing the language used by the Legislature it is, I think, necessary to consider the nature of the rights and powers of the promoters which it is said are to be thus taken into account, and the manner in which they are conferred upon them.

Street Tram-

ways Co. v.

Edinburgh.

The promoters obtained authority, in the first place, to interfere with public highways by laying down tramways upon them, and maintaining the tramways so laid down. But the most important power which they obtained was that contained in section 34 of the Tramways Act, 1870, which authorised them to use upon the tramways so laid down carriages with flange wheels, or wheels suitable only to run on the rail prescribed by their Act, and provided that, subject to the provisions of their special Act and of that Act, the promoters and their lessees should have the exclusive use of their tramways for carriages with flange wheels or other wheels suitable only to run on the prescribed rail.

It will be seen that the power thus conferred is limited to the promoters and their lessees, the promoters being the person or company authorised to construct the tramways. The right conferred is a personal one, and cannot be claimed by any persons who do not come within the designation of promoters or lessees of promoters. It is not conferred upon the promoters' assignees. A conveyance, therefore, by the promoters of their tramways, or even of their undertaking, would not carry with it the right to the statutory monopoly conferred upon the promoters by the section to which I have referred.

I proceed now to consider the words of the provision upon which the question at issue turns. It is to be observed that, although the undertaking is described as the subject of the sale, it is to be sold, not upon terms of paying its then value, but upon terms of paying "the then value of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking." It appears clear that the word "tramway" cannot be read as synonymous with "undertaking." The words which follow "tramway" are, to my mind, conclusive upon this point. What, then, does "tramway" mean as used in the section? I have examined every instance of its use in the statute, and it appears to me in every other case, at all events, to be used to describe the structure laid down on the highway, and nothing more, and I cannot see my way to give any other meaning to it in the section under consideration. The word "tramway" may, no doubt, without impropriety be held to include all proprietary rights attached to it; but I do not think that it can with propriety be held to comprise all the powers in relation to the tramway which are conferred by the statute upon the promoters.

I have already pointed out that the power exclusively to use the tramway was granted to the promoters as such, and is not capable of transfer by them. This is distinctly recognised by the enactment which immediately follows that under consideration. It is provided that when a sale has been made all the rights, powers, and authorities of the promoters in respect to the undertaking sold shall be transferred to, vested in, and may be exercised by the authority to whom the same has been sold in like manner as if the tramway was constructed by such authority under the powers conferred upon them by a provisional order under the Act, and in reference to the same they shall be deemed to be the promoters. It is by virtue of this enactment, and of this alone, that the local authority become entitled to the exclusive use of the tramway, which was previously vested in the promoters. It is the statute, and not the company which originally constructed the tramways, which confers upon the local authority this right. No. 13.

It is also worthy of note that some, if not all, of the rights, powers, and authorities of the promoters are treated as not included even in the term "undertaking," inasmuch as they are spoken of as the rights, powers, and authorities of the promoters "in respect of the undertaking sold."

July 30, 1894.
Edinburgh
Street Tram-
ways Co. v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

I have so far dealt with the language of the section, without taking into consideration the words within the parenthesis, upon which so much of the argument turned; what was to be paid by the purchasers was the then value of the tramway, "exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale, or other consideration whatsoever."

It was contended for the appellants that the presence of the parenthesis indicated that in the opinion of the Legislature the term "value of the tramway" would, but for the words in the parenthesis, have justified an allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, and must therefore include something more than the value of the structure. I cannot assent to this argument. The words of the parenthesis may well have been enacted by way of precaution to make sure that countenance was not given to any contention which would have involved fixing a sum in excess of the value of the structure. There is, I think, a fallacy involved in considering the meaning of the words which follow the parenthesis by themselves, and then inquiring how far the meaning thus attributed to them is to be modified by reason of the words which precede. Each part of the provisions throws light on the other. It is by reading it as a whole that the intention of the Legislature is to be ascertained. The words found within the parenthesis, to my mind, support the view that "tramway" is to be construed in the manner which I have indicated, and not in that contended for by the appellants. It is said that the words "exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking" were introduced for the purpose of preventing the arbitrator making any addition to the value otherwise arrived at in respect of such profit. I find it difficult to understand how it could ever be supposed that an arbitrator would make any addition to the value of the tramway in respect of the past profits of the undertaking, or how it could ever have been thought necessary to prohibit his doing so. It is, however, quite intelligible that it might be thought necessary to guard against his allowing for, or, in other words, taking into account past profits in arriving at the value of the tramway. But if the word "allowance" is used in this sense in relation to past profits, its meaning must be the same in relation to future profits. I therefore construe the words as enacting that neither the profits made in the past nor to be anticipated in the future were to be taken into account in assessing the value.

It was argued that if the value of the tramway were arrived at by taking so many years' purchase of the rental which could have been obtained for it, if let, no profits would be allowed for in the value so ascertained. I am unable to adopt this view. How would it be possible to determine the rental which could be obtained except by reference to the profits which had been or which might be made? The rent which a tenant would be prepared to give would obviously depend upon the profits to be anticipated.

It was further argued that the Legislature had only excluded an allowance for past or future and not for present profits. Why, it was asked, if all profits were to be excluded were the words "past or future" inserted? To my mind the words cover all profits whether made or to be made, and the reason for their insertion appears to me plain. If the word "profits" alone had been used it would have been open to contention that only profits actually made were referred to, and that the provision did not exclude an allowance for profits to be anticipated in the future.

Reading the enactment as a whole, I can find no indication, but quite the contrary, that the arbitrator in determining the then value of the tramway was to take into account those rights and powers which had been possessed by the promoters as such by virtue of the statute, and which would be thereafter by the same statute conferred upon the local authority.

Reliance was placed by the appellants upon the provision of sections 41 and 42 of the Tramways Act, 1870, enabling the Board of Trade, if the promoters discontinued the working of their tramway or were insolvent, to declare that their power in respect of the tramway should be at an end. In the first of these cases the Board of Trade were empowered to declare the powers of the promoters at an end from the date of the order, in the latter, at the expiration of six months from the making of the order, but in both cases it is provided that the powers of the promoters shall thereupon cease and determine "unless the same are purchased by the local authority in manner by this Act provided." Inasmuch as section 43 applies to a purchase by the local authority within three months after any order made by the Board of Trade under either of the two preceding sections, it was contended that this shewed that the purchase of the undertaking was regarded by the Legislature as a purchase of the powers of the promoters.

I do not think it possible to give the effect contended for to this argument, and to construe the word "tramway" in that part of section 43 which regulates the terms of payment in a different manner to that which a consideration of the section itself suggests on account of the language employed in the two preceding sections. That language is certainly not very felicitous. Whether the undertaking is purchased or not, the powers of the promoters equally cease and determine; the purchase does not keep their statutory powers alive. The powers are possessed thereafter by the local authority by virtue of the statute in precisely the same manner as they were acquired by the promoters.

For these reasons I think the interlocutors appealed from should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs.

LORD WATSON.—These appeals,—the one Scots and the other English,—were heard together at your Lordships' bar. They appear to me to raise precisely the same question, under circumstances which differ in no material respect. The majority of the learned Judges in both countries have come to the same conclusion. In Scotland the majority consisted of the Lord Ordinary, with three Judges of the First Division, the Lord President dissenting. In England the decision of a Divisional Court was unanimously reversed by three Judges sitting in the Court of Appeal.

The respondents are local authorities, who have exercised their statutory option of requiring the appellants, who are street tramway companies, to sell a section of their tramway undertaking on the terms and conditions prescribed by statute. In that event, it is enacted that the price payable to the appellants shall be the value, to be ascertained failing agreement by arbitration, of certain enumerated subjects, comprised in that part of their undertaking which has been taken over by the local authority. No. 13.

In both appeals the rights of the parties are regulated by the Tramways Act, 1870. Section 43 of that Act defines the consideration payable to be "the then value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale or other consideration whatsoever) of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters, suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking within such district." In the second, the provisions of the London Street Tramways Act, which became law on the day after the general statute, and by which the respondent company were incorporated, are also applicable. Section 44 of the later Act defines the consideration to which, in the event which has occurred, the company are entitled, in terms identical with those which I have just quoted from the general statute.

The parties having failed to agree as to the quantum of consideration, applied to the Board of Trade, who, in the first case, nominated Mr Henry Tennant, and, in the second, Sir Frederick Bramwell, to be statutory referee. These gentlemen issued their respective awards; and the judicial proceedings in which these appeals are taken, though differing considerably in form, were instituted by the tramway companies with the same object, viz., in order to have the awards set aside, or corrected, in so far as objectionable. In so far as concerns the valuation of their lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant, the appellants have stated no objection. Their impeachment of the awards is rested solely upon the ground that the referees have failed to give due effect to the enactments of the statutes of 1870 in valuing the particular subject therein described as "the tramway."

It is plain that the expression "the tramway," as it occurs in the clauses already referred to, cannot mean the undertaking of the company, because it is enumerated as one of those parts of the undertaking which are to be separately valued, the sum of the values being the measure of the consideration which the company is to receive. Accordingly, it was not disputed in argument that the words must refer to the structure of stone and iron, or other material, which is affixed to the solum of the streets, and upon which tramway vehicles run. So far, the parties are agreed as to the identity of the subject to be valued; but the important question remains, upon what footing it ought to be valued; and upon that point the present controversy turns. I do not regard the question thus raised as one which merely concerns the method of valuation which ought to be followed. In my opinion its solution depends, not upon so-called principles of valuation, meaning thereby the various formulæ, some of them alternative, according to which value may be calculated, but upon the nature and extent of the interest which the Legislature intended should attach to and accompany the structure to be valued and paid for, under the description of "the tramway."

So far as I can judge, the right of property in a tramway line, as such, may be of three different degrees. It may be no higher than bare ownership of the materials of which the line is composed, without any one having the right to retain or use them in situ. Again, it may be that the property of the line does not carry with it the privilege of future user, but that others than the owner selling may either possess or be in a position to acquire such privilege. Or, it may be, that the right to use the line for tramway purposes, in perpetuity or for a time limited, is inherent in the right of property. Although physically the subject is the same, the interest in it, which must be regarded as the true subject of valuation, is very different in these three cases.

The referees have dealt with "the tramway" as a subject belonging to the second of these classes; and they have accordingly put upon it what may conveniently be termed a construction value. The rule which he followed is thus stated by Mr Tennant, "that the proper value of the said tramways to be determined by me, according to my construction of the statute, is such sum as it would cost to construct and establish the same, under deduction of a proper sum in respect of depreciation to their present condition, and that, in estimating such cost, I am entitled to take into account the fact that said tramways are now successfully constructed and in complete working condition." Sir Frederick Bramwell came to practically the same conclusion. He declined to give any effect to evidence led by the company for the purpose of shewing "the rental value of the purchased tramways considered as let or capable of being let," whilst he received, and took into account, evidence adduced on behalf of the County Council tending to shew "the proper cost of construction of the purchased tramways, and the depreciation of such value, by comparing the condition at the time of sale and purchase with the condition when newly constructed." He refused to admit evidence as to the profit arising from previous use of the tramways; and arrived at his valuation on the basis of cost less depreciation, such valuation to be increased by the sum of £9442, in the event of its being judicially determined that no deduction from the original cost ought to be made in respect of depreciation.

The view maintained by the appellant companies in opposition to that which has been taken by the referees is fully disclosed in their pleadings. In the first appeal the company crave declarator to the effect that the referee is bound to value the lines of tramway purchased by the local authority according to their rental value, and that by capitalising, at so many years' purchase as he may think proper, the rent at which, one year with another, such lines might, in their actual state, be reasonably expected to let, or by giving effect to such rental value in such other manner as he may find and determine to be just. In the second appeal the notice of motion given by the company to set aside or refer back the award is rested upon these grounds,—(1) That the referee ought to have taken into consideration the evidence which they submitted as to the rental value of the tramways and ought not to have excluded the evidence which they tendered as to the profits which they had derived from traffic thereon; and (2) that the evidence given on behalf of the local authority with regard to the cost of construction, either with or without depreciation, ought not to have been considered by him.

If, according to its just construction, the expression "the tramway," as it is used in section 43 of the general and section 44 of the London Tramways Act of 1870, was meant to designate the lines of tramway considered simply as structures and apart from any privilege of user, it would not seem to be doubtful that the awards complained of are in strict conformity with the intendment of these clauses. On the other hand, if the expression, when rightly construed, includes not merely the fabric of the tramway lines, but an exclusive right to use them for tramway traffic in the future, then neither award has exhausted the reference, because it leaves unvalued an important item, which, upon that construction, the Legislature has appointed to be valued and paid for.

Which of these constructions ought to prevail is, to my mind, the only point which your Lordships require to decide. I see no reason to doubt that these words, "the tramway," are capable of being so employed as to indicate that they embrace the use and occupation of the fabric, as well as the fabric itself, or even to indicate that they apply to the whole stock and goodwill of a tramway undertaking. But, in their primary and natural sense, the words appear to me to denote nothing more than the fabric of the tramway lines upon which traffic is conducted. In order to give them a wider meaning as they occur in the enumeration of particulars to be valued under section 43, I think it is incumbent upon the appellants to shew, by reference to their context or to the general scheme of the statute, that they were intended by the Legislature to have that wider significance.

No. 13.

Edinburgh
Street Tram-
ways Co. v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The exclusive occupation and use of any portion of a public street or highway, whether by an individual or a company, is, at common law, an invasion of the rights of the public. Accordingly, an exclusive privilege of using rails laid along a street for tramway traffic cannot exist without statutory sanction, and when a right of that kind has been created its extent and its duration must be wholly dependent upon the terms of the authority given by the Legislature. In the present case, the right of exclusive user, as against the general public, is not one of the subjects which the appellant companies were authorised to acquire, either by agreement or by compulsion, for the purposes of their undertaking. The privilege of user is conferred upon them by section 34 of the Tramways Act, 1870; and they have, in my opinion, no right whatever against the public beyond what is given them by that clause.

Section 34 provides that "the promoters of tramways authorised by special Act and their lessees" may use carriages with flange wheels, or wheels suitable only to run on the rail prescribed by such Act. It then goes on to enact that "subject to the provisions of such special Act, and of this Act, the promoters and their lessees shall have the exclusive use of their tramways for carriages with flange wheels, or other wheels suitable to run only on the prescribed rail." It is not a consideration to be overlooked, that the Act deals separately with the privilege of exclusive use, which is given directly to "the promoters and their lessees." But the appellant companies are not the only promoters to whom the gift is made, and they can have no lessees. Local authorities becoming purchasers under sections 41, 42, and 43 are also "promoters" within the meaning of section 34. They are the only promoters who have power to let the tramway; and they are by section 19 expressly debarred from working the undertaking, except through a lessee. In my opinion, the plain import of the enactments of section 34 is to give the promoters who construct the tramway an exclusive right to use it, which is strictly personal, and is therefore incapable of being communicated by them to any other person; and also to give the same exclusive right to local authorities who acquire the tramway, with the additional power of communicating the privilege to their lessees.

The appellants maintained that the provisions of sections 41, 42, and 44 qualify the enactments of section 34, and shew the intention of the Legislature to have been that the appellant companies' right of user should not be treated as a privilege personal to them, but as a continuing asset, which they could dispose of to the local authority. For reasons which I shall presently state, I do not think the provisions of section 44 have any bearing upon the point. Section 41 deals with the case of the promoters discontinuing to work their tramway, and section 42 with the case of their becoming insolvent, so that they are unable to maintain and work their tramway with advantage to the public. In either of these events the Board of Trade are authorised to declare that "the powers of the promoters" shall cease and determine, unless the same are purchased by the local authority "in manner by this Act provided," which admittedly means on the same terms as to price which are prescribed by section 43. It was said by the appellants to be matter of necessary inference from these provisions that "the powers of the promoters," to be purchased by the local authority in the events contemplated, must of necessity include the promoters' privilege of exclusive use. With the majority of your Lordships, I have been unable to appreciate the force of that reasoning. I cannot understand why the powers to be so purchased ought, upon any sound canon of construction, to be read as necessarily including a power or privilege previously given to the promoters in such terms that it was not theirs to sell.

As already indicated, the provisions of section 44 are, in my opinion, of no relevancy to the construction of the terms of sale and purchase prescribed by section 43. Section 44 empowers the original promoters, after they have used their tramway for traffic for a period of six months, to sell their undertaking, with consent of the Board of Trade, to any person, persons, corporation, or company, or to the local authority of the district. If the transaction be not with the local authority, the purchaser comes into the shoes of the seller, and is affected by the provisions of sections 41, 42, and 43. But in no case of sale and purchase under section 44 do the provisions of section 43 with respect to price apply. The parties selling and purchasing are left at liberty to adjust the terms of the transaction according to their own pleasure. The promoters may fix their own price, and decline to accept any other consideration.

I do not suggest that the inference which I derive from the other clauses of the Act, with respect to the personal character of the right of user possessed by the appellant companies, must necessarily govern the interpretation of "the tramway" in section 43. But I think the inference is sufficient to exclude any presumption that the Legislature intended local authorities to purchase and pay for, as inherent in the subject described as "the tramway," a right of future use which did not belong to the sellers, and had already been vested in the purchasers themselves by an express statutory grant.

I shall now advert to the terms of section 43, upon which these appeals really depend. It authorises local authorities, after a certain lapse of time and upon certain conditions which have been duly observed by the respondents, to require the promoters "to sell, and thereupon such promoters shall sell to them their undertaking," or such part thereof as is within the district of the authority making the requisition. The word "undertaking" is not defined in the Act; but it appears to me that it must signify all the real and moveable property belonging to the promoters necessary for conducting tramway traffic, together with all rights and interest in or connected with such property which belong to the promoters, and are capable of being transmitted from them to the purchaser. I do not think the word can be reasonably construed so as to include any property, or any right or interest, which does not belong to the promoters, and does not pass from them to their purchaser under the compulsory contract of sale. On the assumption that the promoters' privilege of use is personal, and therefore limited to the period during which they may continue to be owners of the tramway, the privilege of use after the expiry of that period, which they did not possess, cannot be regarded as part of the undertaking which they are required to sell. No. 13.

I need not repeat the language which is used in section 43 to prescribe the consideration to be paid by the local authority to the promoters for the sale of their undertaking. The parenthetical words are so introduced as to apply to and qualify the value to be put upon each and all of the particular subjects enumerated. No question has been raised with respect to allowance for compulsory sale or other similar consideration; but the able arguments addressed to us were largely directed to the import and effect of the first part of the parenthesis, "exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking." I understood the appellants to concede that these words are not to be wholly disregarded in estimating the value of the tramway; and, in my opinion, the concession was inevitable. It was urged on their behalf that the making of an allowance for present or future profits, in estimating the value of a tramway line, is something quite different from ascertaining its rental value on the footing of its being a lettable subject, and, consequently, that whilst the first of these things was expressly forbidden, the second was impliedly sanctioned by the clause in question. In the course of the argument an ingenious suggestion was made to the effect that, whilst past and future are, present profits are not, excluded from the consideration of the referee. What can possibly constitute present profits, referable to a mere punctum temporis, and distinguished from past and future profits, was not explained in argument, and is a problem which I am unable to solve to my own satisfaction. I see no reason to doubt that the words occurring in the parenthesis were meant to be, and are equivalent to, "any profits whether past or future."

The prohibition of any allowance for past or future profits does not appear to me to be compatible with the adoption of rental value, for which the appellants contend. It is in substance an enactment that the profits which the tramway has earned, or may be capable of earning, are not to be taken into account at all in estimating the amount which is to be paid by the local authority. It may be true that there are some heritable subjects upon which a rental value can be put without minute investigation of their capability of yielding pecuniary profits. The yearly value of a dwelling-house in a particular street may be approximately ascertained by reference to the average of the rents actually paid for similar tenements in the same street, and without entering into an inquiry whether its occupation has been or will be a source of profit to the occupant. But it is a mistake to suppose that valuation by rental is a process disassociated from the idea of profit. On the contrary, it is simply one of several methods used for the purpose of arriving at an estimate of the profits arising from the ownership of heritable estate. It is not a satisfactory method in the case of a tramway line which has never been let, and has no competing line within its district. The questions whether a hypothetical tenant could be found, and what rent he might be reasonably expected to give if he were found, cannot be easily solved, if at all, except by estimating what amount of profit the line had yielded in the past, and was likely to yield in the future. An intending lessee, whether real or hypothetical, would hesitate to pay a rent which was not based upon these data. Again, I can well understand that future profits might be assumed as an element in ascertaining rental value, and yet that, in a compulsory sale, they might afford grounds for a further allowance in respect of the seller's loss of profit arising from disturbance of his business. But the case of past profits is very different. When past profits have been taken into account, as enhancing rental value, I am at a loss to understand upon what possible grounds they could be regarded as entitling the seller to any further allowance. I am unconscious of doing injustice to the opinions of the learned Judges from whom I differ when I say that not one of them has suggested in what shape such further allowance could be made.

These considerations all tend to confirm the inference which I draw from the language of section 43, as well as from the other provisions of the Act to which allusion has been made, that inference being that the Legislature, by the expression "the tramway," meant to denote the bare fabric of its lines, unaccompanied by an exclusive privilege of using them. I therefore concur in the judgments which have been moved by the Lord Chancellor.

LORD ASHBOURNE.—The facts of the case have been so fully stated by the Lord Chancellor that I need only refer to them at such length as may make my meaning plain.

The direct question raised before your Lordships is whether the arbitrator was right in valuing the tramway at what it would cost to make, or whether he ought to have ascertained what it could have been let for to a tenant who could use it, and then have capitalised its annual value.

The cases of the Edinburgh Street Tramways Company and of the London Street Tramways Company have been argued together, as they depend upon precisely the same point. The question in the Edinburgh case¹ depends upon the construction of sec. 43 of the General Tramways Act, 1870, and the London case² depends upon sec. 44 of the London Street Tramways Act; but the two sections are in identical terms, as is the case with many other sections of these Acts. For convenience I shall refer only to the sections of the General Tramways Act, 1870, and shall not deem it necessary to note specially the corresponding sections of the London Street Tramways Act of 1870, which are mentioned in detail in the judgments in the London case.² The decision is of deep moment to all the tramway companies of Great Britain, and involves interests of considerable magnitude.

The section is not clear. In any view of the case, it is a cumbrous and unfortunate piece of drafting—not plain or direct—and each side is confronted with difficulties in its interpretation. It is not surprising to find that amongst the Judges before whom the case has come there have been wide differences of opinion; and therefore I have applied myself to the consideration of the case with many doubts and misgivings as to the soundness of my own judgment on important points, where, though I might be supported by the opinions of Judges of eminence, I know my conclusions have been opposed to authorities for whom I entertain the very highest respect.

The clause requires the closest and most critical examination and analysis, in order to see what is the method of the transfer, what is sold, and what is to be paid.

What is the method? As Mathew, J., in the London case² has forcibly said,—“Nothing would have been easier than to have said in terms that at the end of the twenty-one years there shall be a transfer of the undertaking, and the company shall be paid for the cost of materials in situ capable of being worked, less depreciation.” But the Legislature in its wisdom has used a long, complicated, and involved sentence, from which we have to spell out and infer such meanings as we can. The transaction is to take place by a sale. A sale involves a selling and buying, a bargaining, and here an arbitration. If what was meant was a statutable transfer at a statutable price, it was certainly not felicitous drafting to enact that the transaction should be carried out by the machinery set out at such length in the section.

But a far more important consideration in the matter is what is sold and transferred under the section. The undertaking, of course, is sold; but the great difficulty is to give the due and proper meaning to the word "tramway." Is it only the tramway in situ, or the tramway with the power to use it? This is really a governing point in the case. Does the sale of the tramway include, or involve, or carry with it the right to use it? The words of the section are,— "When any such sale has been made all the rights, powers, and authorities of the company in respect of the undertaking sold . . . shall vest" in the purchaser. The words here again are not the best or the clearest. They must be read not only with the rest of the section, but also in connection with other sections, in order to see whether the right to the tramway is treated in the Act as carrying with it the right to use the tramway. Sec. 41 deals with the discontinuance of tramways, and enacts that in certain cases the Board of Trade may by order declare that from the date of the order the powers of the promoters shall be at an end, "and the said powers of the promoters shall cease and determine, unless the same are purchased by the local authority in manner by this Act provided," i.e. by sec. 43. Thus sec. 41 expressly states that the powers—including the right to use—are purchased under sec. 43. Sec. 42 is to the like effect. It deals with the insolvency of promoters, and provides for the ceasing of their powers "unless the same are purchased by the local authority in manner by this Act provided," i.e. again by sec. 43. In this connection it is important to note sec. 44, which enacts,— "Where any tramway in any district has been opened for traffic for a period of six months, the promoters may, with the consent of the Board of Trade, sell their undertaking to any person, corporation, or company, or to the local authority of such district; and when any such sale has been made, all the rights, powers, authorities, obligations, and liabilities of such promoters in respect to the undertaking sold shall be transferred to, vested in, and may be exercised by, and shall attach to the person, corporation, company, or local authority to whom the same has been sold, in like manner as if such tramway was constructed by such person, corporation, company, or local authority under the powers conferred upon them by special Act, and in reference to the same they shall be deemed to be the promoters." In my opinion a sale under sec. 44 would carry with it the right to use the tramway. Similar words are used in sec. 43; the machinery of sale is resorted to, "the rights, powers, and authorities" are also transferred, and I cannot resist the conclusion that under both sections the buyer was intended to purchase and acquire with the tramway the right to use it.

It was argued before your Lordships that the powers were to be regarded as the creatures of the statute, given independently by its provisions to the "promoters," and that the sale had nothing to say to them, and did not carry, affect, or transfer them. I do not find any such idea in the judgments of the Court of appeal in the London case. Lindley, L.J., says,¹—"The vendors have only a right of user (that is, by sec. 2); they have no land to sell; they have only an easement so far as the land is concerned; but they have an exclusive right to use the tramway (by sec. 29), and to grant licences to other persons to use it (by sec. 37). These rights will be enjoyed by the purchasers, and these rights must be borne in mind in ascertaining the value of the tramway. These rights exclude any valuation of the tramway as so much old iron to be broken up and removed. The tramway must be valued as an existing tramway, used as such by the vendors before the sale, and to be used as such by the purchasers after the sale." The words of A. L. Smith, L.J., on this point are very strong and clear:¹—"I cannot doubt that what is to be sold and bought is not merely the tramway in situ as a structure, but the undertaking of the company as a going, toll-earning, concern; that is to say, the tramway as then in use, with the rights, powers, and authorities of the company to maintain it in the public streets, run cars thereon with flange wheels to the exclusion of all others; to take the prescribed tolls for so doing, and to exercise the other powers contained in the Act. Of this I have no doubt; the words of the section are clear, 'And thereupon the company shall sell,' not their rails and sleepers, but 'their undertaking,' and 'when such sale has been made, all the rights, powers, and authorities of the company in respect to the undertaking are to vest in the County Council.' A. L. Smith, L.J., in the clearest words, gave his opinion that the company had to sell "the powers granted to the company of running cars with flange wheels thereon to the exclusion of all others, and of taking the prescribed tolls and the other powers in the Act mentioned"; and he adds emphatically, "that this is what is to be sold by the company to the London County Council, I do not doubt." I concur in this view of A. L. Smith, L.J., which I regard as of the highest importance, as stating and explaining the great value of the subject-matter to be sold.

It may be that the language of the section is involved and roundabout, that the conveyancing is defective, but, to my mind, it is much more in accordance with the language of all the sections of the Act to hold the conclusion I have indicated, than to spell out a narrower one in contradiction to what I believe to be the meaning of section 43 itself, as well as to the clear words of sections 41 and 42, and the construction required to give effect to section 44.

If, then, the undertaking sold comprised or included a tramway capable of being used and with a right to use it, the next great question is, What is the price to be paid for it under the section? The section answers (leaving out the parenthesis for the present), "the then value of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant."

The actual tramway, in a very literal sense, consists of little else except its iron rails. "The then value of the tramway" from the old iron point of view would be a ludicrous mockery; and, accordingly, every one—Judges and arbitrators alike—repudiate any such construction, and admit that a wider interpretation must be sought. A. L. Smith, L.J., says,—“There can be no doubt that in any ordinary case, where an undertaking such as the present is to be sold and paid for, its present—that is, its then value—is in practice arrived at by capitalising its rental value.” Matthew, J.² more in detail, says,—“Value is to be ascertained as it would have to be ascertained for rating purposes,” and, therefore, you must construe the word in that sense. “These tramways are hereditaments capable of earning profits and assessable under the Poor-Law No. 13. Acts. That is clear from the Pimlico case,¹ and the meaning which I have indicated of the word 'value' is recognised in many statutes in pari materia; July 30, 1894. as, for instance, in the Valuation (Metropolis) Act of 1869, and also in the Street Tramways Co. v. Union Assessment Acts. To get at the value of the hereditament, you take the profits, deduct the tenant's charges and reasonable profits, and what is left is the rent which would be paid by a tenant for the opportunity of earning his profit. By capitalising that rental you arrive at the value of the hereditament." I therefore take it that, apart from the parenthesis, "the then value" would be held to have its ordinary meaning, as stated by A. L. Smith, L.J. Edinburgh Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The onus of proving that the ordinary meaning should not be given to the words "the then value" is cast upon those who deny it, and the respondents insist that for this purpose they are entitled to rely upon the parenthesis, which says, "exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale or other considerations whatsoever." Prima facie, these words imply that, but for their use, the thing excluded would have been included. An exception, a parenthesis, an exclusion, under ordinary circumstances, would be held to qualify and lessen the generality of preceding words. Here, according to the contention, they are used, not to abate, but to destroy and contradict the ordinary meaning of the words "the then value." If the argument is correct, that the value of the tramway is only the value of the materials in situ, profits would not need to be excluded, because not comprised in the original subject-matter.

It is admitted that "the then value" is not to be found in the value of old iron; it is admitted that something very much more is to be assessed. Where is the line to be drawn? A. L. Smith, L.J., well puts the question, "Are the words of exclusion in this section so strong, when applied to the things to be paid for, namely, a tramway in situ, as to exclude the ordinary way of ascertaining present value?"

It must be borne in mind that the County Council can only acquire ownership rights under the sale. They can let, but cannot themselves use, occupy, or work the tramway. They are debarred from making occupiers' profits; and, therefore, it is most reasonable to provide that no allowance should be made for them in the sale. It is most fair that in a sale to a public authority "the then value" should not be run up by the history of "past" or the anticipation of "future" profits. These words "past or future" are suggested by the word "then." The provision is that no "allowance" is to be made, and that is very far from an enactment that "the then value" may not be ascertained according to the ordinary rule and practice in like cases. The argument of the respondents concentrates attention exclusively upon the parenthesis, and ignores and belittles everything in the section which would explain its terms. The Lord President in his judgment well says,²—"The contention of the Corporation seems to me exposed to the grave objection that it allows words having a subordinate and qualifying position to kill the plain import of the main proposition to which they relate, and does so by ascribing to those words more meaning than, prima facie, they bear. I cannot conceive why the Legislature should describe the transaction as a sale, and say the terms are to be the payment of the existing value of the tramway, &c., and then, incidentally and by way of exclusion, put in words which make the terms inconsistent with sale and purchase, and inconsistent also with payment of existing value."

It must be remembered that "the then value" of lands and buildings has also to be measured under the same section, and it would be almost impossible to ascertain the value of land and buildings without considering what rent a tenant would pay for them. The land and buildings may have cost vast sums, and no one could suggest the reasonableness of giving less than their fair value under this provision. No "allowance" is here to be made for "past or future profits"; but "the then value" is to be arrived at by the ordinary methods.

It is also not to be forgotten that under this section a tramway company might be compelled to sell the most paying and successful part of its undertaking, retaining only the part which barely, if at all, paid its expenses. Under this section, admittedly, they could get no compensation for compulsory sale or for severance. The company concede that they, under its terms, are debarred from "any allowance" for their profits in "the past" or their hope of greater profit in "the future"; but could it have been intended that in providing they were to get "the then value," they were to get less than would come to them under the ordinary rule, and be subjected to an arbitrary standard discovered by the arbitrator?

The Kirkleatham case¹ is important as shewing (to quote Henn Collins, J.) "the words which the Legislature uses when it does intend that the thing sold and the thing paid for shall be the materials, and not the right to use the materials." The section in the present case is framed in an entirely different manner, because, in my opinion, the Legislature contemplated a different operation with different results.

No question of hardship can be considered. The construction of this section is all that is before your Lordships. I venture to think that the construction suggested by the County Council is unreasonable, and that it would be natural to expect that if the Legislature contemplated such a meaning they would have said so in plain language. The weighty words of Mathew, J., are worthy of attention,—“The Act of Parliament was intended to inform such of the public as were disposed to become shareholders in this kind of undertaking, and one would expect plain language addressed to such persons and their advisers as to what the Legislature meant. If Parliament meant to inform the public,—‘You shall not have at the end of twenty-one years compensation for the value of the undertaking, but your undertaking shall be sold for the cost of the materials in situ, less depreciation,’ I cannot help thinking that very few tramways would have been constructed, because a shareholder proposing to take shares has to satisfy himself that the profits of the undertaking would not only pay him interest upon his investment, but would restore to him wholly or partially at the end of twenty-one years his capital.”

I have already intimated the doubts which I must entertain of the soundness of my views when I recognise the high authority of those who have reached a different conclusion; but, with all deference and submission, in my opinion, the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—My noble and learned friend, Lord Shand, is unavoidably prevented from being present. He has prepared a judgment which he desires should be read to the House.

No. 13.

LORD SHAND.—The two appeals of the Edinburgh Street Tramways Company against the Magistrates and Town-council of the city of Edinburgh and the London Street Tramways Company against the London County Council, involve the decision of the same question, and the arguments of counsel in both cases have been presented on that footing. That question depends on the true meaning and effect of section 43 of the General Tramways Act of 1870, which is incorporated in the special Acts of the Edinburgh Street Tramways Company, and which is substantially in its terms embodied in the London Street Tramways Act, sec. 44.

July 30, 1894.
Edinburgh
Street Tram-
ways Co. v.
Magistrates of Edinburgh.

The Magistrates and Council of Edinburgh and the London County Council have respectively availed themselves of their statutory powers to acquire portions of the tramway systems belonging to the appellants respectively, having served notices requiring these companies to sell parts of their respective undertakings on the terms prescribed by the provisions of the statutes above mentioned. In order correctly to define these terms, as to which the parties so widely differ, it appears to me to be of importance to ascertain, in the first place, what are the rights or powers belonging to the appellants under their statutes, and whether or how far they are enabled to transfer these rights and powers to the local authorities as purchasers of their respective undertakings.

The promoters were authorised to lay down their tramway lines or rails on the public streets without making any payment or compensation for the ground so occupied to the local authority or other corporation or body in whom the right to the solum of the streets might be vested. The tramway companies, however, acquired no right of property, but a right of user only, viz., the right of exclusive use of their tramways for carriages with flange wheels or other wheels suitable only to run on the prescribed rail. And the right acquired was not in perpetuity, for at the end of twenty-one years, and of every succeeding period of seven years, the promoters might be required by the local authority to sell on the terms specified in section 43 of the General Tramways Act of 1870, while the same result might follow within a shorter period than twenty-one years under sections 41 and 42 of the statute, in consequence of the discontinuance of the promoters to work the tramways, or the insolvency of the promoters, followed by an order of the Board of Trade, and a notice to purchase given with consent of the Board of Trade by the local authority.

The Edinburgh Tramways Company could not assign their rights, which were given to them only, and not to assignees; and though by section 46 of the London Tramways Act there was given a power of sale of the undertaking with consent of the Board of Trade, this was subject to the company's obligations and liabilities, one of which was the obligation to sell the undertaking to the local authority, after the lapse of twenty-one years, on the terms specified in section 44 of the company's Act.

Having regard, on the one hand, to the privilege given to the promoters of laying their tramways on the public streets without making compensation for the ground occupied, and, on the other, to the limited rights conferred—limited as to time, in the option of the local authority, and limited also as to extent, the right of user only being conferred—it might reasonably be expected that, should the local authority (who it may be presumed, have themselves a right of property or other direct interest in the solum of the streets) desire after the lapse of twenty-one years to avail themselves of the statutory power conferred on them to acquire the tramway system or a part of it, they should be enabled to do so on terms which would have relation to the peculiar nature of the promoters' rights, and the privilege which the promoters had obtained to occupy and use the public streets without payment. Accordingly, reading sec. 43 in the light of these considerations, I have come to be of the opinion expressed by the large majority of the learned Judges who have considered the question in the two cases under review, and as I concur in the reasons which have been already stated by the Lord Chancellor, and by my noble and learned friend Lord Watson, I shall content myself with making very few additional observations.

The promoters are required to sell their "undertaking," or so much of the same as is within a defined district, and for that undertaking the local authority are required to pay. The clause proceeds, however, to say that the sale is to be made "upon terms" of payment, followed by a specification which expressly excludes certain elements or items from consideration, and expressly enumerates others, for which payment is to be made. The undertaking is to be sold "upon terms of paying the then value (exclusive of any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale, or other consideration whatsoever) of the tramway, and all lands, buildings, works, materials and plant of the promoters suitable to and used by them for the purposes of their undertaking." In my opinion, the defined terms of payment for the undertaking does not include a capitalised rental of the tramway system as contended for by the appellants.

It must be observed that the promoters, unless in default from having ceased to work the tramways with advantage to the public, have the full benefit of twenty-one years' enjoyment of the exclusive user which the statute on very advantageous terms confers on them; but the notice by the local authority determines the right of the promoters to any continuance of that right of user, which is the sole right they have. Excepting under sec. 43, the promoters had no right to sell their undertaking. They have no power to assign their rights. The interest which belongs to the promoters, and may be transmitted or transferred by them, does not include a right either of property, such as a railway company has in the line which it owns, or even of user by the promoters, for that right was personal and in effect temporary, being subject to determination by a notice which has been given. It includes only, therefore, their tramway as laid upon the ground, and the houses, plant, and other property enumerated in sec. 43, used in connection with the working of it, and of which they are proprietors. It is true that the local authority by the purchase acquires a more extensive right—a right of a permanent nature. This might follow, as it appears to me, because of the direct right of property, or other direct interest, which the local authority has in the streets, and because having once acquired the undertaking the local authority is under no obligation thereafter to sell it as the promoters were. The permanent right thus acquired is not, however, conferred by the promoters, or acquired from them, but is conferred by the special provision of the statute in sec. 43, which declares that "when any such sale has been made" all the rights of the promoters in respect of the undertaking sold shall be transferred to the local authority "in like manner as if such tramway was constructed by such authority under the powers conferred upon them by a provisional order under this Act, and in reference to the same they shall be deemed to be the promoters." No. 13.

These considerations appear to me to have a very material bearing on the meaning to be attached to the very specific terms of payment expressed in sec. 43 of the statute, and to exclude the contention that the value of the undertaking was to include a capitalised rental, or an estimate founded on profits, or any of the other items included in the parenthetical clause, viz. "(any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale, or other consideration whatsoever)." I think the terms of the section used were inserted with the purpose of making it clear that the company was to be paid the value of the property it possessed in the tramway and in connection with the working of the tramway, and for that property only, but not for rights which they could not assign, and which they could only exercise for a defined period, and which were thereafter determinable on notice by the local authority. I agree with the learned Judges who have held that an allowance given as an estimate of rental past or future would be in truth an allowance for profits of the undertaking past or future, and that this is excluded by the statute; and I am further of opinion that the enumeration of subjects for the value of which payment is to be made—"the tramway and all lands, buildings, works, materials, and plant of the promoters"—includes exhaustively all that is to be paid for, and does not include any sum as for estimated rental value or estimated profits. The word "tramway" throughout the statutory provisions by which the appellants acquired their rights is used as meaning the tramway lines or structure laid down. It is, in my judgment, used in the same sense in sec. 43, and does not include rental value of a subject which had been held in effect under a temporary right of user which came to an end by the notice to purchase.

It has been said that if the Legislature intended to deprive the sellers of any estimate or allowance for such return as a tenant might give for the use of the tramway system, this would have been expressed in terms more clear—in some such terms as are suggested by Mathew, J., in his very able opinion. There is no doubt that the language used has left room for great discussion and great diversity of opinion. But there is an enumeration of the subjects for which payment is to be made which does not include profits of any kind, and an exclusion of items by language which does mention profits, and is otherwise of a very comprehensive kind—an exclusion of "any allowance for past or future profits of the undertaking, or any compensation for compulsory sale, or other consideration whatsoever." It seems to me that these general and comprehensive words are at all events so clear that, if it had been intended to give the appellants what they now ask, the words "or other consideration whatsoever" would certainly have been qualified by such words of exception as "excepting an allowance for such return or rental as a tenant might give for the use of the undertaking."

On these grounds I am also of opinion that the appeals in both cases should be dismissed.

INTERLOCUTORS appealed from affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs.

JAMES STEVENSON (Petitioner), Respondent.—Murray, Q.C.—H. Tindal
—Atkinson.

Husband and Wife—Parent and Child—Cruelty by husband to wife as affecting right to custody of children—Custody of Infants Act, 1886 (49 and 50 Vict. c. 57) sec. 5.—The wife of a Scotsman (who with her husband's assent had since her marriage chiefly resided in her father's house in England where the three children of the marriage were born) commenced a suit in the English Courts for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. The husband objected to the jurisdiction on the ground that his domicile was in Scotland.

The husband subsequently presented a petition to the Court of Session for the custody of the children against his wife, who had removed them from his custody under pretence of taking them on a visit to her father. The wife, in answer, averred that on some occasions the petitioner had treated the children with cruelty, and further made specific statements of cruelty to herself.

The Court granted the prayer of the petition, holding that the averments as to the father's conduct to the children were not such as to shew that their moral or physical welfare would suffer, and that the averments of cruelty to the wife were not a relevant ground for refusing to the father the custody of his children.

In an appeal the House, holding that the wife's averments of cruelty to herself were relevant in answer to the husband's petition for the custody of his children, and considering it expedient that the inquiry into the husband's conduct should be made in the wife's proceedings for judicial separation, in which the question as to the custody of the children might also be determined, recalled the interlocutor of the First Division, on the wife undertaking to abandon the proceedings in England, and to raise and duly prosecute an action of separation in Scotland, and directed the Court to sist the husband's petition in hoc statu.

Held further that having regard to the interests of the children, the eldest of whom was not more than eight years of age, and all of whom had for the greater part of their lives resided with their mother, the interim custody should remain with the mother.

(In the Court of Session, 30th January 1894, reported in the present volume, p. 430.)

Mrs Stevenson appealed.

The Lord Advocate, for the appellant, stated that the question arose upon the petition of Colonel Stevenson for the custody of the three children of his marriage with the appellant, and the main question was the relevancy of the appellant's answer to that petition. The facts of the case set forth in the answers to the petition were in outline these:—The parties were married on 21st July 1885. The appellant was the third wife of Colonel Stevenson. He had three children by his first marriage, one by his second, and three by the present marriage, a boy of eight years, and two girls of seven and five years respectively. The marriage took place in London, and during the larger part of her married life the appellant had, with her husband's assent, lived with her father in England. All the children were born there, and the eldest child, now eight years of age, had only been for about one year and two months in his father's house.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—What difference does that make ! I do not quite see.

Lord Advocate.—Having regard to the law established by the Custody of Infants Act, 1886, sec. 5, it may be that a course of conduct, the individual items of which would not be very material, would come to have a very great materiality taken all together. One of the complaints here is that we have not got all the facts which might be material. Any judgment upon this question ought, we submit, to be upon ascertained and not merely upon the relevancy of the statements made by the lady. No. 14.

Stevenson v.
Stevenson.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, referring to a suit which had been raised by the appellant in the High Court of Justice in London for judicial separation prior to the present proceedings, said that the reasonable thing would be to wait the result of that suit. If the appellant was entitled to a separation everything relating to the custody of the children would be determined at the same time.

The Lord Advocate explained that the appellant had presented a petition for judicial separation in England, because she then thought, as she still did, that the matrimonial domicile was in England. The marriage took place in London, and such home as there was had been for six of the seven years of married life in England in the house of the appellant's father. The respondent, however, had objected to the jurisdiction of the English Court on the ground that his domicile was Scotch. The question of custody, however, could be settled in the present petition. The appellant did not dispute the jurisdiction of the Scotch Court in this matter, because the children were in Scotland when they were taken away.

LORD SHAND.—You suggest that there may be considerations arising in the present case under the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, that might not have been considered in Scotland apart from that Act, namely, the welfare of the infant, the conduct of the parents, and the wishes as well of the mother as of the father?

Lord Advocate.—Yes, that Act was certainly intended to modify what was regarded as the severity of the Scotch law.

LORD SHAND.—I think the learned Judges in the Court below seem to treat clause 5 as having practically no application to the present case.

Lord Advocate.—We think so.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—According to my understanding of their judgments, what they begin with is this, and they found very largely upon it, that you took these children out of the custody of the father, and out of the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts by a falsehood. They regard it as a question of enabling that custody to be resumed which the father possessed in common with you, and of which he was deprived by your fraud.

Lord Advocate.—The appellant is not seeking any benefit from the fact that the custody is with her at present. The case may be treated as if she put forward a petition for the custody of the children.

LORD MORRIS.—How can you rely upon the 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act, which begins,—“The Court may, upon the application of the mother of any infant,” “make such order as it may think fit regarding the custody of such infant.” Was there any application made to the Court by your client?

Lord Advocate.—Not formally by her, because the matter was raised by the husband first; but we have submitted that the considerations pointed out in that section must apply whoever is the applicant.

LORD MORRIS.—I do not know about that. I think if by the common law of the land the father has prima facie a right to the custody of the children, and you are relying upon the statute, you should bring yourself within the terms of the statute.

No. 14.

June 5, 1894.
Stevenson v.
Stevenson.

LORD WATSON.—On the other hand I think the Statute of 1886 was intended to give the Court a much freer hand in dealing with the custody of children than it had before had.

I should not stand upon the words in the statute as to “the application of the mother.” It appears to me that the wife might appear in answer to an application by her husband, and the same considerations would apply.

LORD SHAND.—Supposing the mother were legitimately in possession of the children,—she is not, but supposing she were,—and then the father presents a petition, and the mother replies to that petition, is it suggested that section 5 would apply in such a case?

Lord Advocate.—Yes. By putting in her answer she practically applies for the custody,—she could put in her own statement, or make an application,—surely that would be sufficient, especially in a case affecting the custody of the children.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Apparently Lord Adam makes no reference to this 5th section of the Guardianship of Infants Act at all. There is a reference to it in the judgment of the Lord President, but it does not seem to have been very forcibly pressed.

Lord Advocate.—The Lord President says,—“In reaching the conclusion that the prayer should be granted, I have in consideration the welfare of the children, the conduct of the parents, and the wishes as well of the mother as the father.” He quotes the words of the Act. These would not have been considerations under the common law of Scotland.

LORD WATSON.—The appellant has brought an action of judicial separation in England. The respondent objects to the jurisdiction, so that is the first question. If the English Court sustain its jurisdiction, I suppose it will try the action. If it should not sustain its jurisdiction the lady professes to be ready to proceed with an action in Scotland. Practically, the question then is what do the interests of the children require us to determine as to their custody in the meantime?

LORD CHANCELLOR.—What one feels one would wish to do as a matter of justice, without reference to any technicalities, would be to make some order with regard to the custody of the children which should be a temporary order.

LORD WATSON.—I understand from your statement that your client, the wife, has from her means (which seem to be ample as compared with those of her husband) been alimentering the children and getting them medical treatment and education. In fact she has done everything and he has done nothing.

Lord Advocate.—That is so, my Lord, he cannot do anything. He has not the means.

LORD WATSON.—The result of granting the petition would be to invert the position of the children altogether. I have very little consideration for either spouse, but great consideration for the children in a case of this sort.

After some discussion as to the question of jurisdiction, the Lord Advocate said that the appellant was willing to abandon the suit of separation in England, and to raise an action of separation in Scotland, if that would tend to clear the matter.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—What do you say, Mr Murray, to this, that supposing the English suit is abandoned and the appellant undertakes at once to commence and prosecute a suit in Scotland, she should then have the interim custody of the children till its determination?

No. 14.

June 5, 1894.
Stevenson v.
Stevenson.

Murray.—My client thinks it very hard, inasmuch as it is admitted that his children were taken away by a false statement.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—They were taken where they had almost always been with their mother. One has to look at the interests not of the father or mother but of the children. In the case of very young children the mother is the natural custodian. With one exception these children are all within what is called the age of nurture, and the other is only just above it. Of course one understands the objection on the part of the husband to the suit in England, but if the suit in England is abandoned, and instead of that a suit is brought in Scotland, which is undoubtedly his domicile, and prosecuted there, then, without determining what the ultimate state of things is to be, she should have the custody of the children during the intervening period. Of course the father should have access to the children.

Murray.—I am sorry that I am not in a position to give any consent on behalf of my client to such a course as is suggested.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—Will you tell us why these allegations of the appellant are not relevant and not to be considered. Supposing those statements are true, do you deny that the wife would be justified in refusing to continue to live with her husband?

Murray.—I do not think I can deny that, my Lord. That is to say,—there is only one statement of personal violence such as would justify the separation, but there is one.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—That being so, on what ground could the husband insist that the children should be put in his custody? We are dealing here with very young children, and naturally the children would be in the custody of, in the sense of living with, both the spouses. On what ground could the husband here insist that the children should be put in his custody when his wife cannot live with him?

Murray.—So far as I understand the Guardianship of Infants Act of 1886, it did not in any way alter the prima facie right of the father to have the custody of the children.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—But it made it only a prima facie right; and would not the prima facie right of the husband be displaced by the facts that the husband has so behaved to the wife that she is justified in not living with him, and that the children are so young that giving the custody to the father would take them out of the custody in which they would naturally be as infants? Surely the Act was passed for just such a case as this,—as I understand it,—the rights of the husband, the father, are no longer to be absolute, but if he has misconducted himself he should not be entitled to the custody as an absolute right, but the Court should consider the mother as well as the father, and consider, above all, the interests of the children.

Murray.—Of course I entirely admit the last proposition, but it seems to me that there are two classes of misconduct. There may be

No. 14.

June 5, 1894.
Stevenson v.
Stevenson.

misconduct between husband and wife which would perfectly entitle the wife to discontinue living with the husband, and which yet would not really interfere with the proper relations of parent to child.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—I cannot agree to that at all, because if one of the spouses, the husband we will say, has so behaved that the wife is justified in saying, "I will not live with my husband," you ought not to put upon her this, that she being the injured party is only to do that under the penalty of having the children committed to the sole custody of the wrongdoer. It is just to meet a case of that sort, as it seems to me, that this Act was passed.

Murray.—According to my view, on the face of the statute this question depends now upon considerations not of the legal position of the husband so much as upon questions of fact affecting the interests and welfare of the children. In directing the custody of the children you are not always simply to follow the course directed by their interests. You may be swayed in making your decision by the conduct of the spouses, one or other.

After consultation,—

LORD CHANCELLOR.—This appeal arises on a petition by a domiciled Scotsman to obtain an order from the Court giving him the custody of the children of his marriage with the appellant. The Court below made an order giving him the custody of the children. The answer set up to his petition by the appellant was that he had been guilty of the matrimonial offence of cruelty, and that she had commenced proceedings against him in the Court of Probate and Divorce in England to obtain a judicial separation. The respondent denied the jurisdiction of that Court, on the ground that the matrimonial domicile was Scotch.

It appears to all your Lordships, having regard to the tender age of the children, and the fact that during the greater part of their life they have lived with the mother, that they should continue to live with the mother while the proceedings between the spouses continue for the purpose of determining what their future relation is to be, and whether the wife is to obtain a separation from her husband or not. The question being raised as to the proper forum for the proceedings to try that issue, the appellant undertakes to abandon the English proceedings and to commence proceedings in Scotland, and to proceed therein with due diligence. Your Lordships think that whilst these proceedings are pending the custody should remain where it now is, namely, with the wife. Of course no opinion is expressed at all as to the determination of the issues of fact, which at present are mere allegations, nor as to what should be done when that action is concluded.

LORD WATSON, LORD ASHBOURNE, LORD MACNAGHTEN, LORD MORRIS, and LORD SHAND concurred.

ORDERED that the appellant undertaking to abandon the proceedings in England and to commence without delay an action for separation in Scotland, and to proceed therein with due diligence, the interlocutor appealed from be recalled, and the cause remitted to the Court of Session in Scotland, with directions to sist proceedings in hoc statu.

Process—Evidence—Questions in cross-examination affecting character of witness.—At a trial for assault alleged to have been committed upon a doctor sent by a parochial board to vaccinate a child, by the child's father, the doctor was asked in cross-examination whether he was at the time of the alleged assault under the influence of drink. He answered in the negative. The following questions were then put to the doctor,—“ Were you under the influence of drink during any part of the day? What quantity of intoxicating drink had you that day?” The Sheriff-substitute disallowed the questions, and thereafter convicted the accused.

The accused appealed upon a case stated.

The case did not set forth the grounds upon which the Sheriff-substitute had disallowed the questions.

Held that as there was nothing in the case to shew that the questions were not legitimate, and as the answer to them might have affected the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, the conviction fell to be set aside.

Observed that if the Sheriff was satisfied that the questions were put for the sake of insult, or that they were not to be backed up by evidence, he was right in refusing to allow them to be put.

THIS was an appeal upon a case stated at the instance of Robert Falconer, farmer, Wards, Alves Parish, Elginshire, against a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute of Elginshire (Rampini) convicting Falconer of an assault upon Dr George Hugh Mackay on 7th June 1893.

High Court.

The case set forth as follows:—“ It was proved by the evidence of the said George Hugh Mackay and his coachman, Thomas Murdoch, that when the former called at the farm of Wards, occupied by the accused, for the purpose of vaccinating his child, under orders of the Parochial Board of Alves, the accused knocked him to the ground, beat him with his fist, and compressed his throat. It was proved that the alleged assault took place about seven o'clock in the evening of the day in question. The witness Dr Mackay was asked in cross-examination whether he was at the time of the alleged assault under the influence of drink. He answered that he was not. The following questions were then put and disallowed: . . . (2) Were you under the influence of drink during any part of that day? . . . (3) What quantity of intoxicating drink had you that day? A copy of the notes of evidence taken at the trial by the Sheriff-substitute is sent herewith.”

No. 1.

 Falconer v.
 Brown.

The question of law was—"Whether the Court was right in disallowing the questions put to the witness George Hugh Mackay by the agent for the accused?"

Argued for the appellant;—The questions disallowed by the Sheriff-substitute were highly material to the defence of the accused—all the more that the only witnesses to the alleged assault were the person assaulted and his coachman. It was impossible to say that the answer to them might not have induced the Sheriff-substitute to acquit the accused. The conviction, in these circumstances, fell to be quashed.

Argued for the respondent;—The fact of the assault did not depend upon the evidence alone of the doctor, and a perusal of the notes of evidence shewed that the Sheriff-substitute had disallowed the questions as he was of opinion that they were only put to annoy and insult the witness.

The Court intimated that the notes of evidence were not competently before the Court.

LORD M'LAREN.—This case comes before us under the Summary Prosecutions Act, and the question arises under a complaint of the ordinary character for assault preferred by the procurator-fiscal against Robert Falconer for assaulting George Hugh Mackay, Bachelor of Medicine.

The assault is not of a very gross nature, and the circumstances as stated by the Sheriff arise out of the circumstance that Dr Mackay had been sent by the Local Authority for the purpose of vaccinating Falconer's child, and having strong objections to vaccination, and being under the influence of excitement, Falconer had knocked the doctor down and maltreated him in the way set out in the case.

The only question we have to consider is one relating to the admissibility of evidence, and it stands in this position :

The evidence related to the sobriety of Dr Mackay. He was asked whether he was under the influence of drink, and he replied in the negative. Passing over one of the three questions, as to which no argument was addressed to us, the witness was then asked whether he was under the influence of drink during any part of that day, and what quantity of drink he had taken on the day. These questions were disallowed by the Sheriff-substitute, and the question of law is whether the rejection of the evidence was right.

Now, it is undoubtedly the right of every accused person to cross-examine the principal witness or injured party as to his character generally, and specially as to his conduct at or near the time when the occurrence took place, and the Sheriff-substitute recognising that rule rightly allowed the question whether Dr Mackay was under the influence of drink at the time of the assault.

If such a line of cross-examination were indicated in a case which I was myself trying, I think that if the first question had been negatived in an unqualified manner by the witness, and it was proposed to follow it up by special interrogatories, then, in any case, and especially if the witness appeared to be a man of respectability—and there was nothing in the circumstances to suggest doubts as to his sobriety—I should have asked whether the agent was prepared with evidence independent of that of the witness under examination as to his state of insobriety. If the reply had been negative, I should most probably have disallowed as useless the further questions (as the Sheriff-substitute has done), because these could lead to no other result than a persistence in the negative answer already given.

But we are not told on what grounds the Sheriff-substitute disallowed the second and third questions. He does not appear, for anything stated to us, to have inquired whether a case was going to be made as to the habits of Dr Mackay, or whether other witnesses were in attendance to speak to his conduct during the time, or to have elicited whether these questions were put in the bona fide conduct of the case, or were merely put for purposes of annoyance. Dr Falconer v. Brown.

I shall certainly not assume that the allowance of the questions would have elicited anything to the prejudice of the witness. There is nothing whatever in the proceedings to suggest that it would have done so, and we approach the case with no other information than that special questions were proposed by the agent of the accused, and disallowed by the Sheriff-substitute.

In the absence of any explanation of the special reasons for disallowing these questions, and the questions (if put bona fide and with the purpose of following them up) being quite legitimate, I am of opinion that the Sheriff-substitute was in error in disallowing them.

There remains for consideration how far the rejection of this evidence may affect the result of the trial, and whether it vitiates the conviction and sentence. In civil cases it is generally held that if the Judge's ruling disallowing evidence be reversed the verdict necessarily falls. If the Judge admits evidence which the Court of review may hold to be irrelevant or objectionable on other grounds the Court may take into consideration whether the evidence might have affected the verdict of the jury. But where a question is disallowed and the Court has no means of knowing what would have been the answer to that question, it is impossible to say whether this unknown element of evidence ought or ought not to have affected the verdict. Here the circumstances are peculiar. The assault did not arise out of a quarrel, but, as we are told, in consequence of Falconer's objection to the vaccination of his child, and his endeavour to prevent the order of the Local Authority being carried out. I need not say that no medical man has any right to perform an operation—such as vaccination—on a child without the parent's consent. All that can be done is to bring a parent who refuses his consent before the proper Court on a charge of disobedience to the statute. The difference between the doctor and the child's father being of this nature, can we assume that questions as to the doctor's steadiness and sobriety are irrelevant to the inquiry, or that the answers to such questions might not have thrown light on the question who began the assault, and whether the assault was provoked?

I have not read the notes of evidence, because we have held that they are not competently before the Court, and I am quite unable to form any opinion as to how the answer to the questions might have affected the conclusion to which the Sheriff-substitute came. I may imagine that all the probabilities of the case are against the theory of the defence. I have no conception that any just imputation can be made against Dr Mackay, but as a purely legal question I am unable to say that the admission of evidence might not possibly have affected the conclusion arrived at by the Sheriff-substitute, and therefore I am of opinion not only that the second and third questions ought to have been allowed, but that the conviction must be set aside.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I am of the same opinion. I think the Sheriff-substitute, upon the case stated, ought to have allowed the second and third questions to be put. I entirely agree with Lord M'Laren that every Judge has the right to refuse to allow a question otherwise competent to be put to a witness, if he is satisfied that it is put at haphazard, and in order to insult and annoy the witness. It is necessary for the protection of witnesses and the decent conduct of judicial business that this power should exist. There are indications here which lead me to think that such were the grounds on which the Sheriff-substitute disallowed the second and third questions, and if he had said so, I should not have been for interfering with his exercise of his discretion. But he has not told us so, and we only know that the questions were put and disallowed.

Now, Dr Mackay was the first witness called, and therefore the Sheriff-substitute had no further information as to the facts of the case than those disclosed in the earlier part of Dr Mackay's evidence.

Dr Mackay denied that he was drunk on the day in question, and the natural course was to test the accuracy of his statement by cross-examination, and if the question was put bona fide, the agent for the accused was entitled to ask what quantity of drink he had had during that day.

Now, the Judge might have asked the agent whether he proposed to lead evidence to prove that Dr Mackay was under the influence of drink, and if the agent had replied in the negative, then the Judge might have been justified in refusing to allow the question to be put. But here there is nothing to justify us in holding that the Judge was justified in stopping the cross-examination.

That being so, the only question is, was the evidence so material as to justify us in quashing the conviction, and on that point I have nothing to add to what Lord M'Laren has said.

We are not in a position to judge what the decision of the Sheriff-substitute would have been if the question had been put and answered.

In all probability Dr Mackay would have said he had not drunk to excess. But we cannot tell, and we have therefore no alternative but to say that the Sheriff-substitute was wrong in refusing to allow the second and third questions.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with everything that has been said by your Lordships. I came to the conclusion independently that it was very likely that the questions put to Dr Mackay in cross-examination were simply meant to annoy. But I have now looked at the notes of the evidence and they confirm the view that the Sheriff's reason for stopping the cross-examination was that he thought it was based on nothing.

We must deal, however, with the case as stated. The Sheriff seems to have thought that by sending us the notes of the evidence he made them part of the case, and that the Court could go into the evidence. We cannot do anything of that kind; the Sheriff is the sole judge as to the evidence. We must have stated to us not the evidence given but the facts found to be proved, and we can only consider whether the Sheriff has been right in law in the conclusion he drew from them.

There is a great distinction to be drawn between questions put to throw dirt and those which relate to relevant matter in the personal history of the witness. Here we are much more careful to protect the witness than in other parts of the United Kingdom, and we are right in not allowing vague suggestions against the character of a witness by a series of insulting questions. If the Sheriff was satisfied that questions were being put for the sake of insult, or that they were not to be backed up by any evidence, I think he would have been quite right to refuse to allow them to be put.

But we do not know that; we must take the case as it stands, and the question is, was he right in disallowing the questions as incompetent? It must be remembered we are not here dealing with questions put to a witness vaguely to blacken his character. The questions related to the time when the alleged assault was committed; they went to the essence of the case. There could be no reasonable ground for disallowing them at the stage stated other than that the point of the attack was to insult the witness; but that is not before us, the question being simply whether the questions should have been disallowed. I think it must be answered in the negative.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

Procedure—Proof—List of productions—Photograph.—Held that it was incompetent to examine a witness as to the likeness in a photograph which could not be produced, not being in the list of productions.

Procedure—Proof—Question tending to prove crime not charged—Competency.—In a trial for murder, the prosecutor proposed to ask a witness whether a certain document which was pertinent to the case and which bore the name of the witness as a signature was in fact signed by him, the suggestion being that the signature was forged by the prisoner.

Held that as the crime of forgery had not been charged against the prisoner the question was incompetent.

Procedure—Proof—Hearsay—Fugitive.—Of two persons charged with the crime of murder, one disappeared and was declared an outlaw. During the trial which proceeded against the other, the prosecutor stated that he had without success exhausted all possible resources for finding the fugitive, and he proposed to elicit from a witness who knew him a statement made by the fugitive to the witness shortly after the alleged murder.

Held that the evidence was incompetent, in respect (1) that statements made in the panel's absence could not be evidence against him; and (2) that the failure to find a person did not make hearsay evidence as to statements made by him competent.

Procedure—Precognition of witnesses—Opinion per Lord Justice-Clerk that where the interests of the public in the punishment of crime or the interest of a prisoner charged with crime call for the ascertainment of facts, it is the duty of witnesses on either side to give information to the other side.

ALFRED JOHN MONSON and Edward Sweeney alias Davis alias Scott, HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-Clerk. were charged upon an indictment which set forth as follows:—“(1) That you, having formed the design of causing by drowning the death of Windsor Dudley Cecil Hambrough, sometime residing at Ardlamont House, aforesaid, now deceased, did in execution thereof bore or cause to be bored in the side of a boat, the property of Donald McKellar, boat-hirer, Tighnabruaich, Argyllshire, a hole, and having plugged or closed said hole, you did, on 9th August 1893, induce the said Windsor Dudley Cecil Hambrough to embark along with you, Alfred John Monson, in the said boat on the said date; or on 10th August 1893, you, Alfred John Monson, in execution of said design, did in Ardlamont Bay, in the Firth of Clyde, while the said boat was in deep water, remove, or caused to be removed, the plug from said hole, and admit the water into and did sink the said boat, whereby the said Windsor Dudley Cecil Hambrough was thrown into the sea; and you, Alfred John Monson, and Edward Sweeney alias Davis alias Scott did thus attempt to murder him; (2) that on 10th August 1893, at a part of a wood situated about 360 yards or thereby in an easterly or north-easterly direction from Ardlamont House aforesaid, you, Alfred John Monson, and Edward Sweeney alias Davis alias Scott did shoot the said Windsor Dudley Cecil Hambrough, and kill him, and did thus murder him; and you, Edward Sweeney alias Davis alias Scott being conscious of your guilt in the premises, did abscond and flee from justice."

The trial took place before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury on 12th December 1893 and following days.

Scott disappeared soon after the alleged murder and failed to appear at the diet.

Counsel for the Crown moved that letters of fugitation should be granted and sentence of outlawry was pronounced against Scott.

During the course of the trial, which proceeded against Monson alone, and which resulted in a verdict on 23d December of not proven, the following questions of competency arose and were disposed of.

A witness adduced by the Crown deponed, in examination in chief, that he had seen Scott at Ardlamont. Being asked further—" (Q.) Have you seen Scott since the occasion you mentioned? (A.) No. (Q.) Have you been shewn a photograph by Inspector Stewart and Inspector Greet?"

Comrie Thomson objected, and argued;—To the question put there was no objection, but if it was proposed to follow up that question by asking—"Do you recognise whose photograph it is?" that was incompetent. The photograph not having been produced, the defence had had no opportunity of examining it, and could not cross-examine upon it.

The Solicitor-General stated that he was prepared to prove that the Crown had not discovered the photograph until after the indictment had been served, and therefore too late to be made a production.

Argued for the Crown;—It would be competent to ask a witness,— "Did you see a person with A on such and such an occasion; and if so, do you recognise that person?" and then to ask A, "What was the name of the person with you on such and such an occasion?" A photograph was on this question of evidence in no different position from a person. The defence could suffer no hardship, the photograph and the witnesses being here.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I have no hesitation in holding that no questions can be asked about a photograph which cannot be produced. A photograph would have been a perfectly proper production to be made in this case, and if produced, it could have been used for any competent purpose; but this is a photograph which it is admitted cannot now be produced. It is one of the advantages of our law that a person accused of a crime is entitled to notice of the articles produced against him, and certainly if a photograph is to be founded upon as part of the prosecutor's case, that photograph ought to be given notice of.

It would be a singular thing to allow evidence as to a photograph simply because it could be proved that the prosecutor did not recover it in sufficient time to produce it. It is not maintained that he can now produce it. That he should be allowed to lead evidence as to what is practically the contents of an article which he cannot be allowed to produce in evidence—that is to say, a likeness shewn by the photograph—is out of the question. It would be to place the defence under every disadvantage as regards preparation of the case or cross-examination at the trial.

2. A large part of the evidence adduced by the Crown upon the question of motive was directed to shew that for a considerable period prior to the alleged murder Monson had been in very great financial straits, and that he had a substantial interest in compassing the death of the deceased; that the negotiations for obtaining a lease of Ardlamont had been conducted by Monson himself, and that he had obtained it when he was absolutely without funds. The lease bore to be signed by the factor of the proprietor, by Monson and Cecil Hambrough, and by Adolphus Frederick James Jerningham, Cecil Hambrough's trustee. The suggestion of the Crown was that Monson had forged the name of Jerningham.

No. 2.
Dec. 23, 1893.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Monson.

In these circumstances, counsel for the Crown put the lease into Jerningham's hands, and proposed to ask him if it contained his signature.

Counsel for the panel objected to the competency of the question.

Argued for the Crown;—The question fell to be allowed. The whole circumstances of the case must go to the jury—the prisoner's financial position, his relations with the deceased, and the circumstances under which he came to be at Ardlamont. It was highly important to know how he came to be in possession of the house and shootings. The question which was disallowed in the case of *Her Majesty's Advocate v. Pritchard*¹ was not disallowed on the ground that it related to a crime not charged in the indictment, but on the ground that the answer could have no bearing on the crime charged. Here the question which it was proposed to put had a close bearing on the crime with which the panel was charged, and ought, therefore, to be allowed. It fell within the rule upon which the other question in Pritchard's case was allowed.

Argued for the panel;—The question was clearly incompetent. In Pritchard's case the Crown were allowed to prove, as an incidental fact tending to establish motive, that the panel had been guilty of gross misconduct. The Crown was not, however, allowed to lead proof of the crime of procuring abortion. If the panel was here to be charged with forgery, that crime should have been libelled. He had no notice of it, and was therefore not prepared to meet it.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This question which has been raised by the prosecutor—the question of putting it to Mr Jerningham whether the signature attached to this lease is his signature or not—is a very important one indeed, and I do not know that in the form in which it occurs here it has ever occurred in a case before. As regards all circumstances tending relatively to throw light on the particular offence charged in the indictment—all ordinary circumstances—which cannot be made matter of criminal charge, it is not necessary in the ordinary case for the public prosecutor to give any notice of them. A person charged with a crime is under the necessity along with his advisers of preparing for every ordinary matter which may be relevant to the charge, and I think that is well illustrated in the case of Pritchard.

That was a case where the crime charged was poisoning a wife, and it was held competent to ask a witness whether the prisoner had been having relations of improper intimacy with his female servant, that not being a matter which could have been made the subject of a criminal charge, and being one which might be proved as an incidental fact tending to establish motive; but when it was further proposed to ask the question whether the prisoner in those circumstances had used means to procure premature delivery, that was not allowed. That was a suggestion of crime, and crime with which the prisoner might have been charged in the indictment, thus giving him notice that he had to meet that charge. I do not think that that case is exactly parallel to this.

In that particular case what was proposed to be asked could have had no connection with the question which was being tried. The question of the undue familiarity had to do with the question that was being tried. The question of the prisoner having tried to get rid of the consequence of that intimacy could have had nothing to do with it except to throw suspicion upon him as regards the charge upon which he was brought to the bar—suggesting that if he could do the one thing he might do the other—and the Court disallowed it. That is not the case we have here. This is a pure case of a criminal charge under which, as indicating the history which led up to the charge, it is proposed to ask whether a particular document which is pertinent to the case was not signed by the person whom it appears to have been signed by, and therefore is a forgery. Now, if it is a forgery, whoever forged it, or was a party to forging it, it is a criminal act; and if it was thought of sufficient importance in this case to prove that this document was a forgery, then that might have been done by making a charge of forgery, and I must say, in this case no one could have had the very slightest doubt, that it would have been not wrong to make such a charge, if the charge could be proved. If the charge had been made, the prisoner, through his advisers, would have made all preparations to meet it, but his legal advisers have no notice of any such charge, and it is impossible for them at this stage competently to bring forward evidence to meet it. This document was produced by the Crown and laid before the prisoner, but it was not alleged in the indictment that the prosecutor proposed to prove that the document was a forged document. I am of opinion that it would not be safe to allow such a question, which would tend to prove a very serious crime—one of the most serious crimes known to the law—as part of the incidents of a charge of another kind. It appears to me that the only right and proper course is to make that serious crime also matter of a charge, if the public prosecutor considers it to be of such importance to his case, as regards the history of the other crime, that he wishes to have it proved. I have therefore come to the conclusion that I must refuse to allow this question to be put.

3. It was proved that on 10th August, the morning upon which the deceased had met his death, he had started on a shooting expedition accompanied by Monson and another man. The latter had, as stated, left Ardlamont a few hours after the tragedy, and the police had been unable to arrest him. In these circumstances the Crown endeavoured to prove that the man, who was described and known under the name of Scott by witnesses residing at Ardlamont, was the same person as a man Davis or Sweeney, who was proved to be a betting-agent in London. They led evidence to shew that they had made every effort in vain to find Scott; that Monson and Davis or Sweeney were associated in betting transactions, and were in the habit of meeting in various hotels and public-house bars in London prior to the date of the alleged murder; that Davis had left London for the north on or about 7th August, and that the person known as Scott had arrived at Ardlamont on the 8th.

Sydney Russell of London, a bookmaker, was examined by the Crown, and stated that on the 16th or 17th of August Davis, who was well known to him as a brother bookmaker, appeared at his house in London looking fatigued and ill.

Counsel for the Crown then proposed to ask the witness to repeat a statement made to him on the occasion by Davis. No. 2.

Counsel for the panel objected to the question.

Dec. 23, 1893.
Her Majesty's
Advocate v.
Monson.

Argued for the Crown;—The evidence led established that the direct evidence of Davis in the matter was entirely beyond the power of the prosecution. Every possible effort had been made in vain in order to find him. There were then only two alternatives—either the evidence of what Davis said must be lost altogether, or it must be taken from some person to whom Davis made the statement. The rules of evidence admitted hearsay or secondary evidence in the cases of dead persons, insane persons, and persons imprisoned as captives of war in a foreign country.¹ The principle of this rule was just that such evidence was the best evidence available under the circumstances, and that it was better to take it than none at all. Such evidence had been admitted in the case of Robina Burnet,² which was directly in point, the question being there, as here, whether a person known by a certain name was in reality the same as a person known by another name.

Argued for the panel;—It was not proved that the man Sweeney or Davis was the man who was at Ardlamont, and it was not proved that Davis was dead; on the contrary, the witnesses examined on the point deposed that to the best of their belief the man was alive, and had started on a voyage to Australia for his health. In these circumstances, the case did not fall within the well-known exceptions in which hearsay evidence was admitted. Until a person was proved to be dead or permanently insane, the Crown was not producing the best evidence. The best evidence did not mean the best evidence which happened to be available. In Burnet's case it was a letter and not a hearsay statement which was admitted. In any event, what Davis said in the absence of the panel was not evidence against the latter.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is quite plain that if this man Scott, Sweeney, or Davis, had been at the bar, it would have been competent to ask this question, and it is equally plain that if the question had been asked and answered, it would have been my duty, as protecting the interests of the prisoner now at the bar, to tell the jury that they could not give any weight to what another prisoner might have said outwith his presence, and that it could only be evidence against that other prisoner himself.

Therefore, taking the case on the footing that Sweeney, Davis, or Scott was at the bar there could be no doubt of the law applicable to the case. Neither the question asked nor the answer given in the conversation between the witness and Sweeney could be evidence against Monson.

The only remaining question is whether, in view of the fact that this man Sweeney might have been a competent witness in this case, if the Crown had chosen to use him, they can, in the circumstances in which they are now placed, prove a statement that he has made. It is a well-established rule of law that you are not entitled to ask a witness to state what was said by another person, if that person is alive and may speak for himself. There is a relaxation of this

No. 2. rule in the case of persons who are dead, and there is apparently—I do not know on what authority—a relaxation also in the case of a person who is hopelessly insane. From a person in this position it is as impossible to get evidence as it is from a dead person; and therefore it is held that if you can prove what the person said, it may be admitted as evidence, subject of course to the observation that it is evidence at second hand. Another case has been referred to. That is the case of a prisoner of war confined in a foreign country, whom it is impossible for the litigant requiring his evidence to examine. This was decided in a civil case, and, of course, the same absolute strictness may not always be applied in civil proceedings as is observed in protecting the interests of a prisoner charged with crime. But as regards these two cases—the case of an insane witness and the case of one who is a prisoner of war—it is quite plain that the difficulty of the prosecutor does not consist just in this, that he cannot find the witness. He knows where the witness is in both cases, and is able to prove in the case of the insane person that if he were put into the witness-box he could not give any trustworthy testimony; and in the case of the prisoner of war, that owing to the absence of intercourse between the two states, the war prisoner could not be got at to give evidence. The place where the witness was, was known, and the reason why he could not be examined was known in both these cases.

But here the reason given by the Crown for their failure to produce Sweeney as a witness is that they have not been able to find him. Now, it is a new idea to me, as a principle of law, that you are entitled to take secondary evidence of a witness whom you cannot find, and I certainly would not decide that any such secondary evidence should be led unless there was very strong authority laid down by my predecessors in this Court for such a course. It seems to me, on the face of it, that it would be a most dangerous principle. If parties are unable to find a witness, that is a misfortune to the litigant, and a misfortune to which he must just submit. To say that if Sweeney had been found he might have been a competent witness is to state no ground for allowing hearsay evidence of what he said. If the Crown had him and made him a witness his credibility could be tested by cross-examination, and by the observation of the jury of his way and manner in giving his evidence. It is the failure of the prosecutor to find him that makes all this impossible.

I have been referred to the case of Burnet and Masterton. That case was certainly a very peculiar one, and the point to be brought out was an incidental one only. Here it is a crucial point, viz., the identification of the absent accused person with the person who was at Ardlamont on the occasion in question. I do not therefore think the cases parallel. But if they were, I am bound to say that I have heard the volume of the reports in which this particular report of the case of Burnet appears spoken of by those who knew its history as not being the best authority in law reporting, and I should have liked to have had a much fuller report, and one on which I could go with greater confidence. I cannot be sure that on such a report I would be safe to act. It certainly seems to me that in that case the Court went very far indeed outside of the ordinary rule, although there may have been good grounds for so doing. On the whole matter, I have come to the conclusion that I ought not to allow this question to be put.

4. Professor Matthew Hay, of Aberdeen University, was examined as a skilled medical witness for the defence, and in cross-examination admitted that by the express direction of the panel's legal advisers he had refused to give any information to the Crown.

The Solicitor-General complained that in refusing to allow the Crown to precognosce the witnesses for the panel, the legal advisers of the panel had acted contrary to the usual practice in such cases. A ruling was asked for future guidance.

Counsel for the panel stated that they had not desired to precognosce the Crown witnesses.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It seems to me that nothing could be done more prejudicial to either side, than that in a criminal case before a jury, the advisers of a party should direct their witnesses not to allow themselves to be precognosced. I think it is a grievous mistake. I consider it to be the duty of every true citizen to give such information to the Crown as he may be asked to give in reference to the case in which he is to be called; and also that every witness who is to be called for the Crown should give similar information to the prisoner's legal advisers, if he is called upon and asked what he is going to say. I do not say there is any blame attaching to anyone connected with this case, and the witness was quite right to do as he was told. I have no doubt that the legal advisers of the prisoner acted conscientiously. But I have been asked to express my view, and it is that every good citizen should give his aid, either to the Crown or to the defence, in every case where the interests of the public in the punishment of crime, or the interests of a prisoner charged with crime, call for ascertainment of facts.

Thereafter the cottages having been vacated, the petitioners restricted their petition by minute to a conclusion for expenses, and were allowed a proof that the respondent had been the author of a nuisance. Thereafter the respondent allowed decree for expenses to go by default.*

Having been refused a case for the opinion of the High Court, he presented a note of appeal praying that the Sheriff should be called upon to shew cause why he should not state a case.

Held that the cause was not criminal, and that therefore the Sheriff was right in refusing to state a case for appeal against his decision.

THE SUBURBAN DISTRICT COMMITTEE OF THE COUNTY COUNCIL OF THE COUNTY OF MIDLOTHIAN, being the Local Authority of the parish of Cramond, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles, at Edinburgh, against Sir James R. G. Maitland, Baronet, of Barnton, under the 16th and 18th sections of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 101), and the 32d section and 3d schedule, vide Scotland, of the Housing of the Working-Classes Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. c. 70),* in which they prayed the Court to find that the respondent had, on or about 11th February 1893, been the author of a nuisance within the meaning of the first of these enactments, in respect that he had allowed seven dwelling-houses belonging to him at Longrow, in the parish of Cramond, and at that date all inhabited, to be in an insanitary condition and unfit for human habitation, and to ordain him to discontinue the nuisance, and also to grant an order closing the premises under the second of the enactments. Thereafter the respondent warned the tenants of the dwelling-houses to quit them at Whitsunday 1893, and they were vacated at that term.

After sundry procedure the petitioners, on 6th July 1893, restricted their petition by minute to a simple conclusion for the expenses of the process, and on their motion the Sheriff-substitute (Hamilton) allowed proof that at the date of the presentation of the petition the respondent had been the author of a nuisance.

The respondent thereupon, on 24th July 1893, lodged a minute desiring to be allowed to depart from the proof, which had been fixed for 25th July, and requesting the Sheriff-substitute to dispose of the question of expenses, to which the prayer of the petition had been restricted, upon the statements in the records and the debates for the parties.

On 25th July the respondent, in consequence of these minutes, objected to the petitioners being allowed to lead proof, and his objection being repelled, withdrew from the diet.

The Sheriff-substitute thereafter, in respect of his nonappearance, discerned against him for the expenses of process.

The Sheriff-substitute having refused the respondent's application for a case, he presented this note of appeal to the High Court, under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, praying for an order upon the Sheriff-substitute to shew cause why a case should not be stated in terms of that statute.

It is unnecessary to refer to the reasons stated for the note of appeal.

The respondents objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued;—Under the Public Health Act, 1867, sec. 108, appeal was expressly excluded, and it had been recently decided¹ that such a proceeding as the present was not a "cause" within the meaning of section other summary proceeding for the prosecution of an offence or recovery of a penalty competent to be taken before an inferior Judge."

Sec. 3.—"On an inferior Judge hearing and determining any cause, either party to the cause may, if dissatisfied with the Judge's determination as erroneous in point of law, appeal thereagainst notwithstanding any provision contained in the Act under which such cause shall have been brought excluding appeals against or review in any manner of way of any determination, judgment, or conviction, or complaint under such Act. . . ."

* The various sections of these two enactments, so far as applicable to the case, are referred to in Lord Wellwood's opinion.

Maitland. the second half of the definition of the Act of 1875, and therefore appealable under section 3 of the Act. That a “penalty” might be inflicted and recovered where a nuisance of the class in question was shewn to exist appeared plain from the language of sections 103 and 105 of the Public Health Act, and particularly from section 105, which authorised imprisonment in default of payment. Further, although the prayer of the petition had been restricted to a question of expenses under section 105 of the Act of 1867, taken along with section 28 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, expenses were to be regarded as a penalty.¹

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—I am of opinion that this note should be refused on the simple ground that the Sheriff’s interlocutor or judgment which is complained of is not appealable, or at least is not appealable to the High Court of Justiciary.

Under section 108 of the Public Health Act, 1867, appeal is undoubtedly excluded. But the appellant maintains that an appeal is competent in respect that the process is a cause in the sense of the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875.

I doubt, for reasons which I shall state afterwards, whether it can be regarded as a “cause” in the sense of that statute; but I am satisfied, and that is sufficient for our decision, that it is certainly not a “cause” which is criminal quoad review.

The process, so far as it has gone, and I believe it is at an end, is purely civil. It originated in a petition presented under the 16th and 18th sections of the Public Health Act, 1867, and the Housing of the Working-Classes Act, 1890, section 32, and third schedule, vide Scotland. The 16th section of the Public Health Act describes a variety of matters which shall be held to be a “nuisance” in the sense of the Act; and section 18 empowers the Local Authority to present a petition for the purpose of establishing the existence of the nuisance and having it removed or discontinued, and if necessary, for the purpose of obtaining interdict against the recurrence. So far there is nothing to indicate anything of a criminal nature in the procedure; nothing which might not equally be found in any civil process brought for the purpose of interdicting what is alleged to be a nuisance. As tending to shew the civil character of the process, I may refer to the provisions made in sections 106 and 107 for procedure under the heads (h), (i), and (j) of section 16, which are all nuisances, and perhaps greater nuisances than those described in the earlier heads of section 16, and which may equally be interdicted under sanction of penalties and imprisonment. Under section 106 the Sheriff “is to take notes of the evidence in like manner as in civil proofs,” and under section 107 appeal is given under the heads (h), (i), and (j) to the Sheriff, and if the value of the cause exceeds £50 there is a further appeal to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and a further appeal to the Inner-House if the Lord Ordinary allows it.

If the party proceeded against is finally held to be the author of the nuisance, and is ordered to discontinue or remove it, and refuses or neglects to do so, other provisions of the statute are brought into play. The 20th section of the Public Health Act provides that in such a case the author of the nuisance or the owner, as the case may be, shall be liable in certain penalties per day during his failure to comply with the order of Court.

At that stage, and not till then, the process assumes a criminal or quasi-criminal aspect. Up to that point the person proceeded against may have been guilty of a civil wrong, but it is not until he refuses or neglects to obey the order made upon him by the Court that he incurs penal responsibility. Further, in order to obtain an imposition of penalties a separate petition or complaint must be presented setting forth the respondent's failure to comply with the order of the Court, and praying for the imposition of the statutory penalties. I think it is immaterial whether such a complaint is regarded as incidental to the original petition or not. In substance it is an entirely different process, in which the only matter submitted for the decision of the magistrate is whether the order made in the original petition has been obeyed or not. And although a judgment pronounced by the magistrate in a suit for penalties might be appealable on a point of law, it does not follow that such an appeal would entitle the Court to review the magistrate's determination on the original petition.

But it is unnecessary that I should say more, because this case is ruled by the decision of a full bench in Lee v. Local Authority of Lasswade, 5 Coup. 329, 11 R. (Just. Cases) 1. Indeed this is a stronger case, because while in Lee's case a penalty might have been sued for and imposed if the Sheriff's interlocutor which was complained of were not obeyed, in the present case that could not be done, because the cottages having been vacated the petitioners by minute departed from the prayer of the petition except as regarded the question of expenses.

Lastly, it seems to me that on the merits there is nothing to appeal, because the appellant, instead of leading evidence, deliberately allowed decree for expenses to go by default.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK and LORD M'LAREN concurred.

THE COURT refused the note.

M'Ewen v.
Lord Abinger.

ALEXANDER M'EWEN, Complainer.—Greenlees.

Complaint—Penalty—Summary Procedure Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 4, schedule A—Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 6—Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68), sec. 1.—Section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, enacts that "in all proceedings under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts . . . (b) . . . when the amount adjudged to be paid . . . exceeds £1 but does not exceed £5, the period of imprisonment shall not exceed one month."

In a complaint which bore the heading "Under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887," the accused was charged with a contravention of the 1st section of the Day Trespass Act, "whereby" he "is liable to forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding £2," and in default of payment thereof "to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding two calendar months." In the prayer the Sheriff was asked to "convict him of the aforesaid contravention, and to adjudge him to suffer the penalties provided by the said Act." The Sheriff-substitute convicted the accused, imposed a modified penalty of £1, and in default of immediate payment sentenced him to imprisonment for ten days. The accused brought a suspension on the ground that the complaint contained no statement that the term of imprisonment which the accused might be adjudged to suffer in default of paying the fine of £2 fell in terms of section 6 of the Act of 1881 to be restricted to one month.

The Court refused the suspension, holding that the Sheriff-substitute's attention had been sufficiently called to the restriction of the penalty by the Act of 1881 in the reference to that Act in the heading of the complaint.

M'Leod v. Tarras, Oct. 24, 1892, 3 White, 339, 20 R. (Just. Cases) 6, followed.

Observations on the form of complaints in regard to the notice to be given to the magistrate of his powers of punishment.

ALEXANDER M'EWEN, plasterer, Fort-William, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Inverness-shire upon a complaint bearing the heading "Under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887," which set forth that he had been guilty of a contravention of the Day Trespass Act, in so far as on 25th February 1893 he did "in the day-time . . . trespass by entering or being without leave of the proprietor, the said Lord Abinger, upon the lands commonly known as the estate of Inverlochry, . . . in pursuit of game, . . . whereby the said Alexander M'Ewen is liable to forfeit and pay a sum of money not exceeding £2, and costs of conviction, and in default of payment thereof . . . to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding two calendar months."

In the prayer the Sheriff was asked to convict the accused, "and to adjudge him to suffer the penalties provided by the said Act."

The accused pleaded not guilty, and after evidence led the Sheriff-substitute (Simpson) convicted him, and adjudged him to pay the sum of £1 of modified penalty, with £1, 5s. of expenses, and in default of immediate payment sentenced him to be imprisoned for ten days.

M'Ewen brought a bill of suspension of the sentence. He averred,—“(2) The penalty craved is erroneously set forth in the complaint, in so far as it craves that the complainer should be liable to forfeit and pay a sum of money not exceeding £2 and costs of conviction, and in default of payment thereof at the time appointed be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding two calendar months, unless payment be sooner made. The respondent failed to give effect to section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act, 1881, which provides that the period of imprisonment shall not exceed one month where the fine imposed exceeds £1, but does not exceed £5. This statement of the alternative open to the Judge was incorrect and misleading, and did not bring under his notice that he was bound by the above Act to restrict the alternative of imprisonment to one month, to the great prejudice of the complainer.”

He pleaded ;—The conviction complained of should be suspended, with expenses as craved, in respect that the penalty craved by the complaint is excessive, illegal, and misleading.

Argued for the complainer ;—The complaint omitted all reference to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, and concluded for a greater penalty than the Sheriff was entitled under section 6 of that Act to impose.¹ The complaint must also specify what penalties could competently follow conviction. If it did not the Sheriff might be misled.¹ If *M'Leod v. Tarras*² was well decided then it was competent for a prosecutor to pray for the imposition of a penalty which could not legally be imposed.

Argued for the respondent;—It was unnecessary (vide section 4 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, 27 and 28 Vict. c. 53) for the prosecutor to refer in the complaint to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881, but, in any view, the matter was foreclosed by the decision in M'Leod v. Tarras. The Sheriff was bound to know his own powers under that Act, and the prosecutor had sufficiently indicated the limit of the imprisonment which he asked the Sheriff to impose by proceeding under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts.³ The complainer had suffered no prejudice, and the matter had been brought to the Sheriff-substitute's notice.

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—This appeal arises out of a prosecution under the Day Trespass Act (2 and 3 Will. IV. c. 68), which was brought before the Sheriff at Fort-William. The complaint bears to be brought under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887.

In the body of the complaint the prosecutor, after setting forth the trespass complained of, concludes thus,—“Whereby the said Alexander M'Ewen is liable to forfeit and pay a sum of money not exceeding £2 and costs of conviction, and in default of payment thereof at the time appointed, to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding two calendar months unless payment be sooner made.” And in the prayer he prays the Sheriff to convict the appellant, and adjudge him to “suffer the penalties provided by the Act.”

The Sheriff convicted and imposed a modified penalty of £1, and £1, 5s. of expenses, and in default of immediate payment sentenced the appellant to be imprisoned for ten days.

The appellant does not maintain that the term of imprisonment thus alternatively imposed was not within the Sheriff's powers, but he maintains that the conviction must be set aside, because in the complaint the prosecutor names a maximum term of imprisonment of two calendar months, which could not be competently imposed having regard to the provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881, under which the maximum period of imprisonment which can now be imposed where the fine imposed exceeds £1 but does not exceed £5 is one month and not two.

The same objection was stated in the recent case of M'Leod v. Tarras, decided in this Court on 24th October 1892, the Court being composed of Lord Young, Lord M'Laren, and myself. We held that the objection was not well founded, our view being that the Act of 1881 being a general Act applicable indiscriminately to all summary prosecutions brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, it was not necessary that its provisions should be specially set forth in the complaint, and that if any reference to it were necessary it was sufficient that the magistrate's attention should be drawn to it by the heading to the complaint, which apprised him that in passing sentence he must have regard to the provisions of that statute modifying the sentence of imprisonment in proportion to the amount of the fine imposed.

I am of opinion that sufficient grounds have not been shewn for going back upon our decision in MacLeod v. Tarrae, which is directly in point. But in view of the doubts expressed during the discussion I cannot say that I hold to my former opinion without some hesitation.

M'Ewen v.
Lord Abinger.

The objection is technical; the Sheriff has not been misled; he has imposed a competent sentence of imprisonment. The objection, however, is not the less important and difficult on that account. If it is well-founded the conviction must be quashed; but in the absence of any prejudice to the appellant this is not a result to be readily arrived at.

The question is not whether the form of complaint adopted is the best, but whether it is so radically defective that the accused, who has suffered no prejudice, and who took no objection in the Court below, is entitled to go free.

It must be admitted that on first statement it seems a startling proposition that it is competent for a prosecutor to pray for the imposition of a penalty which cannot legally be imposed; but a little consideration shews that the difficulty is more apparent than real.

The form of complaint in schedule A of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, applicable to statutory complaints, is framed on the footing that the penalty and alternative to be set forth in a statutory complaint are those prescribed by the statute said to have been contravened. Here that was correctly done. The Day Trespass Act has not been repealed. But the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881 provides that when, in enforcing a statute such as the Day Trespass Act the prosecution is brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and a warrant of imprisonment is granted in default of payment of a penalty, a certain scale of periods of imprisonment shall be observed proportioned to the penalty inflicted, and the maximum period of imprisonment competent for a £2 fine under the Act of 1881 is one month and not two.

Before condemning the mode of libelling here adopted it is necessary to consider what is the alternative, and what would be the logical results of our entertaining the objection. Is it proposed to insert ad longum in the body of the complaint all the alternatives which are open to the magistrate? I hardly think that this course will be seriously suggested. But a partial insertion would be worse than none. Suppose the prosecutor had here inserted the maximum period of imprisonment (one month) authorised by the Act of 1881 for a £2 fine, the complaint would at once have been objected to as misleading, on the ground that that might lead the Sheriff to think that whatever penalty he imposed he might in default of payment give a sentence of imprisonment of one month, whereas according to the scale of the Act of 1881 he is bound to reduce the sentence of imprisonment in proportion to the fine imposed.

If insertion ad longum is impracticable and partial insertion is insufficient, the only other course is to make a general reference to the periods of imprisonment competent under the Act of 1881. Such a reference would no doubt draw the magistrate's attention to that statute; but that is already done sufficiently, I think I shall shew according to practice, by the heading to the complaint.

According to the decisions, it is as essential to the soundness of a statutory complaint that all the alternative punishments open to the magistrate should be set forth in the complaint, as that those specified should be correctly stated and competent. But where an alternative punishment or modification is introduced by a general statute, and not by the statute said to have been contravened, it

No. 4. has not, so far as I know, been the practice to specify the alternative or modification in the body or prayer of the complaint.

Jan. 19, 1894.
M'Ewen v.
Lord Abinger.

An examination of sections 18 and 19 and schedule K of the Summary Procedure Act of 1864, and the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881, furnishes a number of examples. For instance, some statutes authorise the imposition of penalties, but do not expressly authorise imprisonment in default of payment, while at the same time they do not exclude it. But section 18, subdivision 6, of the Act of 1864, and schedule K, subdivision 6, provide that the Judge, if he considers it inexpedient to order execution by pointing and sale, may order immediate imprisonment. Again, section 19 authorises immediate imprisonment, although the special statute allows time within which to pay the penalty, or only directs imprisonment in default of recovery by execution—Macdonell v. Davidson, 1 Coup. 9.

Again, some statutes authorise imprisonment without the option of a fine, and yet by section 6, subdivision 1, of the Act of 1881, a fine may be substituted for imprisonment.

And by section 8, subdivision 1, of the same Act, where warrant of pointing and sale is competent, a warrant of imprisonment for a fixed period may be granted in default of recovery.

Now, the only notice to magistrate or accused of these important alternatives introduced by general Acts is in practice the heading to the effect that the complaint is brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. That is held to be sufficient notice that these and other important variations, not only as to procedure, but as to the punishment to be awarded, may be given effect to notwithstanding the terms of the statute said to have been contravened. In substance the accused is informed that he is liable to the penalties imposed by the statute as modified or varied by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. I think that if it is said that the present complaint is misleading because it specifies a punishment imposed by the special statute which no longer can be imposed in prosecutions brought under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, it may with equal justice be said that complaints which fail to specify the alternatives which have been introduced by general Acts are also misleading, and yet such an objection has never been taken.

In the course of the discussion an illustration was given, I think by Lord M'Laren, which seems to me to be very much in point. Before the punishment of penal servitude was substituted for transportation, many statutes were passed for the repression of crime, in which one penalty was stated to be transportation. Under the old form of indictment it was necessary, in the case of a statutory charge, to quote the section of the statute founded on, and after transportation was abolished it was still customary to quote statutes which, on their face, stated that the punishment of the crime charged was transportation. No doubt the indictment concluded that the accused, on being convicted, should suffer "the pains of law," and this general expression necessarily would cover penalties which could competently be imposed at the time of the trial. But any uninstructed person looking at such an indictment would gather that transportation was still a competent punishment for the offence. Thus in cases before the Supreme Court, at least, it is clear that it was not thought necessary that special notice should be given in the body of the indictment of the alteration or modification as to punishment which had been effected by the general Act. It may be said that the Supreme Court must be presumed to know the current law, while it would not be safe to count on all inferior Judges being equally familiar with it; but even if that be so, it does not materially deprive the illustration of its force, as shewing the province of a general statute in connection with statutory charges, whether made in a complaint or an indictment. No. 4.

M'Ewen v.
Lord Abinger.

I believe the truth to be that there is no appreciable risk of mistake. We have been referred to no instance in which a Sheriff or magistrate has gone wrong in this matter. The general Acts are few in number, and form the elementary education of all magistrates. The Judge in this case was a Sheriff-substitute, who, of course, was familiar with their contents. But I venture to think that one of the first things brought under the notice of any magistrate is the scale introduced by the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881, and I do not think there is any risk of a sentence of imprisonment being pronounced without reference being made to that table.

While those are my views I do not wish to be understood as disapproving of the form adopted in some counties of referring specially in the body of the complaint to the scale of imprisonment prescribed by the Act of 1881. Such a form removes at least one possible cause of mistake. But, as I have endeavoured to shew, it is not complete or free from objection, and I am not prepared to hold that such a reference is indispensable.

While I fully recognise the difficulty of the question, I am for refusing the appeal.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur in all that has been said by Lord Wellwood. I shall only refer to one point, which was, I think, not brought out in his Lordship's opinion. At the discussion an argument was founded on the words of the fourth section of the Act of 1864, which says, "It shall not be necessary to mention in any complaint any Act of Parliament other than the Act declaring the offence for which the conviction is sought, or imposing the penalty or forfeiture which is claimed."

Now, I read these words as expressing an alternative. In the first case if the prosecution is for what may properly be called a crime or offence the indictment must set forth the Act of Parliament which declares the act prohibited to be an offence; and if the prosecution is in respect of what may be called a fiscal offence for the recovery of a fine or penalty, the Act of Parliament which imposes the penalty is to be set out. It is not necessary in cases of the first class to quote the sections of the Act of Parliament which relate to the punishment to be awarded or the penalty to be exacted.

This construction is in harmony with the theory upon which the old indictments were framed, in which it was not necessary, in indictments founded on statute law, to set out what was the punishment of the crime charged, unless, of course, where in the statute the description of the punishment was so related to the offence charged that the one could not be quoted without the other.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I do not think that the form used in this complaint is a good one for stating the offence with which the appellant was charged, and the penalty which could be exacted or the alternative punishment. I also wish to say that I think that in cases of this kind the rule should be recognised which makes it the duty of the prosecutor to so state his complaint that the magistrate shall have before him a statement of what are his powers in regard to punishment of the offence. There is, however, a decision in the books, in which the result arrived at by the Court is of the same nature as that expressed by your Lordships, and I am not prepared to dissent from the judgment in this particular case. At the same time I must say that the question of what was done in the case of the old indictments before the Act of 1887 is not quite applicable here. I think that in complaints in the inferior Courts the practice should be kept up of the prosecutor correctly putting before the magistrate—who is often uninstructed in law—what powers he has in the case.

I notice also in this complaint that the section of the Act under which the prosecution was brought is not stated, but only the Act. I know that it has been held in previous decisions that it is not necessary to quote the section of the Act, if it is quite plain what is the offence charged, and the accused could be under no mistake. I am not prepared to go back on those decisions, provided they are not held to decide that in every case the prosecutor may omit reference to the section. In one case a conviction was quashed where the Merchant Shipping Act—an Act of many clauses—was referred to without any mention of the section founded on. But although there may be cases where the information is sufficient without the section being given, I think it would be more advisable that the section which describes the offence should be referred to. Of course in some statutes there are only two sections, a formal and an operative clause, and in those cases it may not be necessary; but in statutes where there are several clauses I think it right that the section should be referred to. This is now the rule under the Act of 1887, and the rule is made to apply to summary prosecutions.

THE COURT refused the bill.

DOMINICK PIANTA, an ice-cream manufacturer, residing at 105 Eglinton Street, Glasgow, was charged upon a complaint at the instance of John Lang, clerk to the Glasgow Police Commissioners, which set forth that he “did, on Friday, the 15th September 1893, and for some time prior thereto, in his shop or premises . . . within the district of the said local authority, carry on the trade of purveyor of milk without being registered as such in said district, contrary to ‘The Dairies, Cow-sheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885,’ section 6 (1), issued under the Contagious Diseases Animals Acts 1878 to 1886,” whereby he was liable to a penalty.

The Sheriff-substitute (Birnie) convicted the accused but dismissed him with an admonition, because no similar prosecution had previously been brought in Glasgow.

The accused obtained a case, in which the Sheriff-substitute stated the following facts as admitted or proved :—"That the said appellant, at the time and place libelled, did carry on the trade of an ice-cream manufacturer and merchant, and was not registered as a purveyor of milk. That the said ice cream is composed of milk, mixed with sugar, corn flour, eggs, and a drop or two of colouring matter, generally annatto. . . . The compound consists of, at least, two-thirds of milk. . . . The appellant uses in his business about 32 gallons of milk per week. The boiling destroys infection, but the frozen mixture carries infection. The appellant does not reside in his shop, but the vendors of ice cream frequently sleep in their shops, or in rooms opening off them."

Lang v.
Pianta.

The question of law for the opinion of the Court was :—"Whether the appellant is a purveyor of milk within the meaning of the statutes and Order founded on, and required to be registered as such?"

Argued for the appellant ;—The appellant came under none of the three classes of persons who were to be registered under the enactment in question. A "purveyor of milk" was just a person who sold "milk." It could not be maintained that a hotel-keeper who, in a sense, dealt in milk, was a "purveyor of milk," and it was equally clear that the appellant, who mixed certain ingredients with milk, was not intended to be included in that expression.

Argued for the prosecutor ;—The ice-cream here in question, consisting as it did of milk to the extent of two-thirds, was substantially frozen milk. Milk, although it had been boiled and afterwards frozen, was liable when standing in the ice-cream manufacturer's premises to carry infection. The Act was intended to strike at such a case. Hotel-keepers were purveyors of milk in the sense of the Act.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I must say that what the authorities desire to do in this case seems most laudable, and the consequences of our decision may have the most far-reaching results. It may be of the greatest importance that manufacturers of ice cream should be brought under registration, and their premises be submitted to the inspection and regulation which that implies, just as it may be argued that hotel-keepers and temperance refreshment-room keepers should be registered under the Public Health Act, as they in a sense deal in milk and cream ; and indeed counsel for the prosecutor was prepared to state his case so high, and to ask us to hold that hotels and refreshment-rooms did come within the terms of the Privy Council Order, in so far as they undertook the business of purveying milk.

Such registration may or may not be expedient, but the question before us here is, whether under the terms of the Privy Council Order, the authorities are entitled to enforce the registration of manufacturers of ice cream as being purveyors of milk in the sense of the statute.

Now, the Order founded on is called the Dairies, Cow-sheds, and Milkshops Order of 1885, and section 6, subsection (1), on which especially the case rests, speaks of three classes of people who are to be registered, namely, cow-keepers, dairymen, and purveyors of milk.

As regards what persons are included in the first two classes, there can be no doubt whatever. These names both refer to persons engaged in well-known lines of business. And as regards the third class, I should have thought it equally clear, but for the decision in this case. A purveyor of milk sells a well-known article, namely, milk. If it meant, as is suggested, everyone who sold any article in the manufacture of which milk was employed, we should have to order the registration of bakers, because they mix their flour with milk.

Surely no more extraordinary or extravagant interpretation of an ordinary word could be suggested. I do not think we could hold that the Legislature, in employing the word, intended it to have any but its plain and usual meaning. It may be that the Legislature may hereafter see fit to give such a wide and unusual meaning to the word, but I have no hesitation in holding that, as the Act stands at present, that meaning does not attach to the phrase "purveyor of milk."

But for the prosecutor it was argued, you may mix substances with the milk, and still be liable to registration; a purveyor of milk cannot escape registration merely by proving that he adds water, chalk, or flour to the milk before he sells it. I would point out that in so adulterating the milk, and still selling it as milk, he would commit a fraud on his customers, besides being liable under other parts of the statute, and under other statutes, to prosecution for the adulteration, and certainly if proceeded against under this Order for failing to register himself as a purveyor of milk, he would not be allowed in defence to take advantage of his own crime, and say "I am not purveying milk." Holding himself out as a purveyor of milk, and selling an article to the public as milk, he is of course liable to fulfil any legal obligation resting upon a purveyor of milk. Here the case is quite different, and I have no hesitation in holding that this conviction must be set aside.

LORD KINCAIRNEY and LORD STORMONTH-DARLING concurred.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative, sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction appealed against.

Public-Health—Public conveyance used for removal of infectious patient—Proper precautions to prevent infection—Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), secs. 48 and 49.—The Public Health Act, 1867, section 49, enacts,—“Any person suffering from any infectious disorder who wilfully exposes himself without proper precaution against spreading the said disorder, in any street, public place, or public conveyance, and any person in charge of one so suffering, who so exposes the sufferer,” shall be liable to a penalty.

A medical practitioner was charged with a contravention of section 49, “in so far as” “he being the person in charge of A B,” a person suffering from enteric fever, being an infectious disorder, “did wilfully expose him while he was suffering as aforesaid from an infectious disorder, by placing him in a cab or hackney carriage, being a public conveyance,” and conveying him from his lodgings to a hospital, “without taking proper precautions against spreading the said disorder.”

It was proved that the accused had taken A B, while suffering from enteric fever, to a hospital in a cab, being a public conveyance, that the cab was furnished with leather fittings, but there was no evidence as to what other precautions against spreading the disorder were necessary.

The magistrate convicted the accused.

In an appeal, held (1) that there was no offence committed under section 49 of the Act, unless the patient was conveyed without proper precaution being taken against endangering the public safety by spreading infection; (2) that the onus lay upon the prosecutor to prove what precautions were necessary, and that they had not been used ; and (3) that as the prosecutor had failed to discharge this onus the conviction fell to be quashed. No. 6.

GEORGE HUNTER, medical practitioner, residing in Bellahouston Terrace, Govan, was served with a complaint in the Burgh Court at Govan, at the instance of the Burgh Prosecutor, which charged him (first) with a contravention of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867, particularly section 48 * thereof, "in so far as on 28th August 1893, at No. 1 Nithsdale Place, in the burgh of Govan, he being the person in charge of Arthur Robertson Taylor, apprentice engineer, then residing at No. 1 Nithsdale Place aforesaid, and now an inmate of the Combination Fever Hospital at Shieldhall, near Govan, did place the said Arthur Robertson Taylor, who was then suffering from enteric fever, being an infectious disorder, in a cab or hackney carriage without previously notifying the owner or person in charge of said cab or hackney carriage that the said Arthur Robertson Taylor was so suffering, whereby he is liable on conviction to a penalty ; likeas (second) the said George Hunter has contravened the said Act, particularly section 49 thereof, in so far as, time above libelled, he, being the person in charge of the said Arthur Robertson Taylor, did wilfully expose him while he was suffering as aforesaid from an infectious disorder by placing him in a cab or hackney carriage, being a public conveyance, and conveying him from Nithsdale Place aforesaid to said hospital by way of Paisley Road, in the burgh of Govan, without taking proper precautions against spreading the said disorder," whereby he was liable on conviction to a penalty.

The accused pleaded not guilty, and, after evidence led, the magistrate found him not guilty of the first offence charged, but guilty of the second.

The accused obtained a case, in which the magistrate made the following statements :—"It was proved to my satisfaction that on the date libelled the said Arthur Robertson Taylor was suffering from enteric fever, being an infectious disorder, which was in the second week of incubation ; that the appellant was the person in charge of him . . . that the appellant on said date sent for and placed him in a cab, being a public conveyance taken from a stand in Govan Road, which was furnished with leather fittings, the appellant's private carriage being lined with plush, in which public conveyance on the date mentioned the appellant, along with the patient, was driven by his own coachman by way of Paisley Road from Taylor's lodgings in Nithsdale Place, Govan, to the Shieldhall Fever

* The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 101), section 48, provides,—“If any person suffering from an infectious disorder shall enter, or any person in charge of a person so suffering shall place such person in any steamboat, sailing vessel, railway carriage, stage coach, hackney carriage, or other public conveyance, without previously notifying to the owner or person in charge thereof that such person is so suffering, the person so contravening this provision shall, on conviction thereof before any Sheriff, Magistrate, or Justice, be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds, and no owner or person in charge of any public conveyance shall be bound to convey any person so suffering.” By section 49, it is provided that,—“Any person suffering from any infectious disorder who wilfully exposes himself without proper precaution against spreading the said disorder, in any street, public place, or public conveyance, and any person in charge of one so suffering, who so exposes the sufferer, or any owner or person in charge of a public conveyance who does not immediately provide for the disinfection of his conveyance after it has with the knowledge of such owner or person in charge conveyed any such sufferer . . . shall be similarly liable on conviction to a penalty not exceeding five pounds.”

Hospital, which is situated at a considerable distance therefrom. The point as to whether or not the appellant had previously failed to notify to the owner or person in charge of the said conveyance that the patient was suffering from an infectious disorder was not satisfactorily elucidated by the evidence, and therefore I found the first charge of the complaint not proved.

"It was proved to my satisfaction, under the second charge, that the appellant upon the date libelled, as the person in charge of the said Arthur Robertson Taylor, wilfully exposed him in said public conveyance without proper precaution against spreading the said disorder. The witness called for the defence, Dr Middleton, M.D., F.F.P.S.G., Physician and Lecturer on Medicine to the Glasgow Royal Infirmary . . . gave it as his opinion that enteric fever is not infectious from personal contact, if the patient were clean in person and clothing and diarrhoea had not set in; but there was no evidence submitted by the appellant as to the state or condition of the patient at the time he removed him to the hospital, nor as to any precaution having been taken against the spreading of the disorder, beyond the conveyance of the patient to the fever hospital in a cab with leather fittings.

"Upon this state of the facts of the case, I found the second charge proved, and imposed upon the appellant a penalty," &c.

The questions of law for the opinion of the High Court were, inter alia, these,—“(2) Whether on the evidence, and on a sound construction of the 49th section, the appellant wilfully exposed the patient in the streets or in a public conveyance? (4) Whether the magistrate was warranted in convicting the appellant in the absence of evidence as to precautions which ought to have been taken but which were neglected?”

Argued for the appellant;—Under section 49 of the Act the offence consisted (1) in exposing the patient by bringing him into actual contact with others; and (2) by failing to take proper precautions to prevent the spread of infection. Now, the prosecutor had failed to prove either of these things. There was no evidence of the first, and it must be assumed that he had failed to prove the second also; for the magistrate had found the accused not guilty of the charge under section 48 of failure to notify the owner of the carriage that he had an infectious patient, and there was no evidence to shew what precautions other than notification should have been taken.

Argued for the prosecutor;—The magistrate had stated that it was proved to his satisfaction that the appellant as the person in charge of the infected patient had wilfully exposed him in a public conveyance without taking proper precautions against spreading infection. This was a finding in fact, and no question of law could be raised upon it. But in any view the complaint was well founded. It was plain that the appellant had acted wilfully in what he had done; a hackney carriage was a public conveyance; the carriage was not disinfected, and the public who might subsequently use it were exposed to infection. The only precaution proved to have been taken was to use a leather-lined carriage, and that, the magistrate was of opinion, was no sufficient precaution. One precaution the accused might have taken was to notify, in terms of section 48, to the owner of the carriage that the accused was in charge of an infected patient. But then the magistrate stated that this had not been properly elucidated at the proof. In short, the accused had failed to shew, as he was bound to do under section 49, that he had taken proper precautions to prevent infection spreading to the danger of the public.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this complaint the appellant is charged with two offences under the Public Health Act. The first offence is charged under section 48, and is that he placed a patient in a hackney-carriage or conveyance while the patient was suffering from an infectious disorder, without giving notice of his condition to the owner or other person in charge of the conveyance. Of this offence the appellant has been found not guilty, and we have therefore only to deal with the offence charged under the 49th section. No. 6.

Jan. 22, 1894.
Malloch v. Hunter.

Under this section the charge is that the accused exposed the patient in a public conveyance without taking proper precautions against the spreading of the disease from which he was suffering. As far as I can see the only evidence of exposure consists in this—that the patient was brought out of his lodgings, put into a cab, and taken to the hospital. The only time, therefore, during which he could have been exposed was while he was being removed from the house and being driven along the streets, and when he was taken into the hospital; because he certainly was not exposed in his lodgings, and he certainly was not exposed at the hospital.

I cannot hold that the mere fact of driving the patient in a cab from his lodgings to the hospital is an exposure without proper precautions, or an offence under the 49th section. Both this section and the 48th recognise as permissible the use of a public conveyance for the removal of a patient although suffering from an infectious disorder. It lies on the prosecutor to prove something more than the mere transit; either that there was no notice to the owner or person in charge of the conveyance, or that certain precautions which ought to have been taken were not taken. If this conviction were to be sustained, then it would only be necessary to prove that a person in charge of a patient put him into a cab and drove him from one place to another. But that is plainly not an offence under the statute, for if the consent of the owner of a cab is obtained, it is a legal and proper way of removing a patient, the duty of disinfecting the cab afterwards being upon the cab-owner. In this case not only is it not proved that the appellant failed in his duty of informing the cab-owner, but he has been held not guilty of such failure.

I therefore think that this conviction was not justified by what is stated in the case, and that we should answer the second and fourth question in the negative, and quash the conviction.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur. I think the offence under the 49th section consists in the exposure of the patient and neglecting proper precautions. Now, not only is there no proof that any precaution was neglected, but no precaution which ought to have been taken has been suggested from the bar or occurs to myself. I am therefore unable to say that the appellant has neglected any precaution, and therefore unable to say that he has committed a breach of the 49th section.

I do not think it necessary to affirm absolutely that there might not be exposure in a public conveyance without proper precautions even if the patient were conveyed by himself, and not brought into actual contact with other members of the public, if it were proved that there was some precaution appropriate in the circumstances of which the person accused had neglected to make use.

LORD STORMONT-DARLING.—I concur with your Lordships. The “exposure” referred to in the 49th section is an exposure endangering the public safety, not the safety of the patient. The facts found proved in the case do not establish

No. 6. that there was exposure in this sense, or that any specified precautions were neglected.

Jan. 22, 1894.
Malloch v.
Hunter.

If it be said that the danger was to subsequent occupants of the conveyance, that would be obviated by disinfection; but this duty is placed by the statute upon the owner of the conveyance and not on the patient, or on the person in charge of the patient.

THE COURT answered the second and fourth questions in the negative, found it unnecessary to answer the remaining questions, sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

Reset of theft—Proof—Previous conviction—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 19.—The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, sec. 19, enacts that where proceedings are taken against any person for having received goods knowing them to be stolen, or for having in his possession stolen property, and "evidence has been given that the stolen property has been found in his possession," then evidence of previous convictions within five years against the accused of any offence involving fraud or dishonesty may be given at any stage of the proceedings, in order to prove guilty knowledge.

Held that under this enactment previous convictions may be proved if evidence has been given that the accused had the stolen goods in his possession, actually or constructively, at any time after they had been stolen.

HIGH COURT.

Ld. Kyllachy.

AT the trial of Richard Watson, in the Sheriff Court, Glasgow, before the Sheriff-substitute (Murray) and a jury, on a libel at the instance of the Lord Advocate charging the accused with reset of theft, the procurator-fiscal tendered evidence of a previous conviction of reset against the accused.* Counsel for the accused objected on the ground (as stated in the Sheriff-substitute's notes) "(first) that no evidence had been given that the stolen property had been found in the pursuer's possession at the time when proceedings were taken against him; (second), alternatively, the property had never been proved to be at any time actually in his possession, but only constructively. Objection repelled (first), because the possession required under the Act did not need to continue till the date of proceedings; (second), that constructive must be held as equivalent for the purposes of the Act to actual possession."

The accused was found guilty, and sentenced to four months' imprisonment.

He brought a bill of suspension and liberation against the Lord Advocate.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This appears to me to be a very clear case. I take

* The Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 19, enacts, " . . . Where proceedings are taken against any person for having received goods knowing them to be stolen, or for having in his possession stolen property, and evidence has been given that the stolen property has been found in his possession, then if such person has within five years immediately preceding been convicted of any offence involving fraud or dishonesty, evidence of such previous conviction may be given at any stage of the proceedings, and may be taken into consideration for the purpose of proving that the person accused knew the property which was proved to be in his possession to have been stolen."

the second branch of section 19 of the Prevention of Crimes Act to mean this, that if the Judge who tries the case is satisfied that the prosecutor has adduced evidence to go to the jury to shew that the stolen property has been in the possession of the accused at any time after it has been stolen, then it is competent for the Judge to admit evidence of previous convictions for the purpose of proving guilty knowledge. That is what happened here, and accordingly I think that the Sheriff-substitute acted quite competently, and that the suspension ought to be refused.

No. 7.

Watson v.
Her Majesty's
Advocate.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree. Under the statute the previous conviction may be given in evidence in order to prove guilty knowledge, and it may be used for that purpose at any stage of the proceedings, provided only that evidence has been given that the stolen property has been found in the possession of the accused, or, in other words, that evidence has been given to shew that he had been in possession of the stolen property. It is immaterial at what time the stolen property shall have been traced to his possession, if his possession, when coupled with guilty knowledge, is sufficient to support the charge of reset, and the possession may be either actual or constructive.

As the conviction must be tendered in the course of the trial, it is for the Judge to say whether the conditions of the statute have been satisfied. He has to decide whether "evidence has been given" of possession, and if, in his opinion, such evidence has been given, he is bound to admit the conviction.

Jan. 23, 1894.
Patrick v.
Kirkhope.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted of the contraventions charged, and fined 25s., with the alternative of ten days' imprisonment.

He obtained a case. The case stated,—“The appellant is resident in Glasgow, and while his practice was to visit his licensed premises in Saltcoats two or three times a-week, the business was locally under the charge of James Cherry, spirit-salesman, who divided his time between the appellant's shop and another spirit-dealer's shop in Saltcoats, belonging to the appellant's brother, who also resided in Glasgow. In the absence of both the appellant and James Cherry, a barman named Archibald Philip looked after the shop, and he was in charge of it during the occasion of the alleged contraventions.

“About ten minutes before twelve o'clock, on the night of 7th September 1893,” two constables entered the premises by a back door, and found the barman and the three men mentioned in the charge, with one of whom the barman lodged, in a room leading off the bar. “A fight was proceeding between the barman and two of his companions, the barman and one of the men being bleeding. . . . The three men had been drinking together in the appellant's bar from nine o'clock in the evening till ten o'clock, and at ten o'clock they purchased a bottle of whisky, and were put into the back room by the barman. The other customers on the premises were ordered out, and the front premises closed. The barman and the three men remained in the back room until the quarrel arose, drinking. . . .

“There was produced by the appellant a copy of printed rules to be strictly attended to by shopmen, which the appellant hands to his employees for their guidance and instruction, and to which he had obtained the signature of the barman, Archibald Philip, when he took him into his employment.” The first of these rules was as follows:—“Rule 1. Shop on no account to be opened before eight o'clock A.M., and to be shut promptly at ten P.M. No person to be supplied with drink before or after these hours.” The appellant, on being made aware of what had taken place, dismissed the barman.

The following was the question of law stated for the opinion of the Court:—“Whether, in the circumstances, the appellant is or is not responsible for the acts and conduct of his servant; and whether the facts proved are sufficient to constitute contraventions within the meaning of the Acts libelled on, and to warrant a conviction against the appellant?”

At the hearing the authorities quoted below were referred to.¹

LORD KYLLACHY.—My opinion is in favour of the appellant upon both charges.

The first charge is that the appellant, on the occasion libelled, kept open house, and permitted drinking within his licensed premises after the prescribed hour. It is not disputed that the drinking took place, but it is admitted that the appellant was at the time absent, and that the offence was committed by his barman in his absence and against his orders. The question is, whether, in the

Now, I do not at all doubt that for the purposes of this statutory charge the servant is in general to be held identified with his master. He is always when he has acted on his master's behalf and within the scope of his employment. And on the question whether in any particular case he has so acted, I do not consider that it is at all conclusive that the servant acted in disobedience of his master's orders. The question is not whether he has acted according to or against his duty, but whether he was acting within the scope of his employment.

But the facts found in this case appear to me to make it plain that on the occasion charged the appellant's barman was acting, not for the appellant and within the scope of his employment, but for himself, and for purposes of his own. Desiring, apparently, to drink after hours with three of his friends, he put them, when the shop closed, into a back room, having before closing time sold them a bottle of whisky, which he himself joined in consuming. In my opinion this is a kind of case which falls within the principle of the case of Greenhill, 12 R. (Just. Cases) 37, 5 Coup. 602, as explained in the recent case of Linton, 20 R. (Just. Cases) 71, 1 Adam, 61, and not within the principle of the latter case, with the judgment in which I entirely agree.

With respect to the second charge, I am prepared to decide it on substantially the same ground. The charge here is that the appellant did on the same occasion "knowingly permit" riotous and disorderly conduct within his licensed premises, the species facti being that the barman and his three friends to whom I have before referred quarrelled over their cups and fought, the fight taking place, as the case states, "between the barman and two of his companions."

It was argued to us that the second charge was in a different position from the first, inasmuch as it is a charge of "knowingly permitting," and therefore, as it is said, one which requires proof of personal knowledge on the part of the accused. I have not found it necessary to decide whether this is so or not. It is, I think, enough that, as I have already said, the barman was on the occasion in question not acting within the scope of his employment. He was, it is clear, making or joining in a disturbance on his own account, and that being so, it is, I think, impossible to identify him with his master, the appellant, either by imputing to the appellant his knowledge, or by holding the appellant responsible for his act or default.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

ON 7th November 1893 Thomas Carr was convicted in the Police Court, Glasgow, upon a complaint charging him with "an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, in so far as, upon Wednesday, the 25th day of October 1893 years, he, the said Thomas Carr, did, with William Galbraith, of 448 Argyle Street, and Frank Lambert, of 60 Oran Street, both in Glasgow, traffic in whisky or other exciseable liquors, within the premises occupied, rented, or possessed by the Glasgow St Andrew Club, Limited, situated at No. 460 Sauchiehall Street, Glasgow, without having obtained a certificate in that behalf," in contravention particularly of the Public-Houses Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, section 17.

Carr obtained a case. The case set forth that Carr had objected to the relevancy of the complaint on the ground of want of specification, but did not set forth that he had objected on the ground of ambiguity. The magistrate repelled the objection stated.

From the case it further appeared that Carr was clubmaster of the club mentioned in the complaint; that on the evening of 25th October 1893 he on several occasions in the club supplied Galbraith and Lambert, mentioned in the complaint, on their orders, with exciseable liquors; that Galbraith on each occasion paid Carr for the liquors so supplied, which were consumed by Galbraith and Lambert; and that Galbraith and Lambert were visitors at the club, not members.

The questions of law stated by the magistrate were,—“(1) Whether I was right in repelling the objection to the relevancy of the complaint on the ground of the want of specification in the charge as above narrated? and (2) Whether, on the facts held by me as proved, I was right in convicting the said Thomas Carr of the offence charged?”

Argued for the appellant;—The complaint was irrelevant from want of specification. The bare use of the word "traffic" was not sufficient. Under section 37 of the Act of 1862 "traffic" had several meanings, and the accused was entitled to know of which of these he was accused. Further, the complaint was irrelevant from ambiguity, for it meant either that the accused had trafficked with the assistance of Galbraith and Lambert, or that the traffic consisted in the accused selling to them.

Argued for the respondent;—"Traffic" in exciseable liquors denoted one offence and was the statutory word. The complaint therefore was not wanting in specification. As regarded the objection that the complaint was irrelevant from ambiguity, it was too late to urge that now, as the objection had not been taken before the magistrate.¹ But on the merits the objection was ill founded. It merely came to this, that the word "traffic" should have come immediately after "did." Admitting, however, that there was an ambiguity, it was not of a character to make the complaint irrelevant. It was equally an offence as regarded the accused whether the traffic was caused with the assistance of Galbraith and Lambert, or by selling to them. No. 9.

Carr v.
Neilson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The complaint in this case is somewhat curiously worded. There is no fuller specification of the offence charged than what is contained in the word “traffic.” As to whether that is a sufficient specification I give no decision, but it appears to me a strong thing to say that it is sufficient, and I should require further consideration before reaching such a conclusion. The accused is charged with an offence against “the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, in so far as upon Wednesday, the 25th day of October 1893, he, the said Thomas Carr, did, with William Galbraith, of 448 Argyle Street, and Frank Lambert, of 60 Oran Street, both in Glasgow, traffic in whisky,” in a club named, “without having obtained a certificate in that behalf.” Now, it is quite plain that that charge is capable of two totally different meanings. It may mean—and this is perhaps the more natural meaning—that the accused carried on the traffic with the assistance of the two persons named, but not themselves cited and charged with the offence. The prosecutor, however, says that that is not the meaning to be put upon the complaint—that it is not the offence which he meant to charge, and it certainly is not the offence which he has proved,—for he says that by “did with A and B traffic” he meant that the accused dealt with A and B in the sense of supplying them with whisky. But if that be so, the complaint is plainly irrelevant on the ground of ambiguity, and ought not to be sustained, for it is susceptible of two totally inconsistent readings each of which sets forth an offence, and it is trite law that a complaint must unambiguously set forth the offence which is charged. I think therefore that this conviction cannot stand.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. Upon the question whether the word “traffic” is sufficiently specific I express no opinion, but I think that it is worthy of the consideration of prosecutors whether they should not give a fuller specification. I agree with your Lordship in thinking that this complaint is ambiguous. One meaning is that the accused had the aid of these men in carrying on the traffic. That is not what the prosecutor says he meant to charge, and it is not what he has proved. The complaint may also mean, and the prosecutor says it does mean, that the accused sold the whisky to the men. That is such an ambiguity as, in my opinion, ought not to be found in a criminal complaint, and accordingly I think that this conviction should be set aside.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I concur, and on the same grounds.

THE COURT sustained the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Ruther-
furd Clark.
Ld. Kyllachy.

ON 16th September 1893 William Cameron, labourer, Fort-William, was charged in the Sheriff Court at Fort-William, upon a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal for the Fort-William district of the county of Inverness, setting forth that the accused "did, on the 21st day of August 1893, within the stable or byre situated in Viewforth Lane, Fort-William aforesaid, belonging to Messrs James Young & Sons, merchants, Fort-William aforesaid, cruelly beat and abuse a mare belonging to," &c., "contrary to the Act 55 and 56 Vict. cap. 55, entitled the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and particularly section 380, and subsection 7 thereof."

The accused was convicted and fined £1, with the alternative of seven days' imprisonment.

He brought a bill of suspension, inter alia, on the ground that under the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892,* the Procurator-fiscal of the county had no title to prosecute for, and the Sheriff no jurisdiction to try, the offence alleged in the complaint.

Argued for the complainer;—The Sheriff of the county had no jurisdiction to try offences occurring within a burgh, when the offences were created by the Burgh Police Act, 1892, except in the case provided for by section 454. The effect of sections 508 and 509 was merely to preserve the Sheriff's jurisdiction in regard to common law offences, or in regard to statutory offences created prior to the Act of 1892.

Argued for the respondent;—The Sheriff's jurisdiction was not to be held as excluded, unless the exclusion was express or clearly to be implied.¹ Here the Act could not be construed to mean exclusion. On the contrary, the jurisdiction was by sections 447 and 508 preserved. Section 509 meant no more than that where a prosecution had been instituted in the Burgh Court, the Sheriff could not exercise his jurisdiction in relation to the particular offence.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is a fixed rule of our law that the Sheriff of a

* The following clauses of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict. c. 55), were referred to :—

Section 447 enacts,—“Without prejudice to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, Justice of the Peace, Burgh, or Dean of Guild Courts, as hereinafter provided for, all prosecutions, actions, and proceedings, for crime and offence, or contraventions of this Act, or any bye-laws, orders, rules, or regulation made thereunder, committed within the burgh, or for the recovery of fine, penalties, forfeitures, or expenses under the provisions of this Act, or any other Act under which the magistrate has jurisdiction (the mode of recovery which is not herein otherwise provided for), shall be instituted, sued for, or carried on before the Magistrates of Police, or any of them, in the Police Court, at the instance of the burgh prosecutor, to be appointed as herein authorised. . . .”

Section 454 enacts,—“ . . . The Sheriff shall have power to sit in the Police Court, with consent of the magistrates, on any special occasion, or under any continuing arrangement. . . .”

Section 508 enacts,—“The prosecution authorised by this Act, under complaint by the burgh prosecutor, shall be without prejudice to complaints at the instance of any party or parties who are at present entitled to make the same.”

Section 509 enacts,—“No jurisdiction conferred by this Act shall be held to exclude the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, Justices of the Peace, Burgh or Dean of Guild Court, where the case shall in the first instance have been before, or taken up by such Sheriff, Justices of the Peace, Burgh or Dean of Guild Court.”

county has jurisdiction at common law in all manner of offences, whether at common law or created by statute, provided the maximum punishment involved does not exceed that which the Sheriff is entitled to impose, and lately his jurisdiction has been extended to what used to be called the pleas of the Crown, but which are no longer capital. To deprive the Sheriff of this inherent jurisdiction over any new crime created by statute, his jurisdiction must be distinctly excluded by the Act of Parliament creating the new offence. I do not say it must be expressly excluded; the exclusion may be merely by implication, but to be valid it must be distinct and unambiguous.

Now, the offence libelled here is created by sec. 380 (7) of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. I find that by clause 477 of the Act jurisdiction to try the offence is conferred on the Burgh Police Court appointed to be created in terms of the Act. I also find that the jurisdiction so conferred is "without prejudice to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, Justice of the Peace, Burgh, or Dean of Guild Courts, as hereinafter provided for." "Hereinafter" in this clause refers us on to clauses 508 and 509, and these recognise that complaints under the statute may be tried at the instance of other parties than the burgh prosecutor, and in other Courts than the Burgh Police Court. Section 508 expressly declares that prosecutions authorised by the Act at the instance of the burgh prosecutor are to be without prejudice to complaints at the instance of any party who at the passing of the Act had the right to make the same. Now, section 509 expressly reserves the jurisdiction inherent in the Sheriff, and states that it shall not be excluded by any jurisdiction created by the Act. I take the section to mean that the Sheriff can take up such cases provided they are raised in his Court before any proceedings are taken in the Burgh Police Court. It therefore seems to me that the purpose of section 509 is to prevent one complaint being raised in the Burgh Police Court and another in the Sheriff Court against the accused in reference to the same offence, and to prevent not only the oppression of a man by being tried twice, which is met by the common law, but the oppression of having two complaints served on him for the same offence, and his being made the shuttlecock of competing jurisdictions.

But here that question cannot arise, for we are told that, although the Act has been adopted in Fort-William, no Burgh Police Court had been instituted at the time of the offence libelled, and therefore if the case was to be tried at all, it must be before the Sheriff, and I hold that his jurisdiction is not excluded in such a case as this. The Sheriff's jurisdiction remaining intact, it follows that the right of the Procurator-fiscal to prosecute is reserved in terms by section 508. The suspension therefore falls to be dismissed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD KYLLACHY concurred.

 ON 22d August 1893 John Lundie, hawker, Fort-William, was served with a complaint to the Sheriff of Inverness-shire, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, at the instance of David MacBrayne, shipowner, Glasgow, charging the accused with having been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862, and particularly section 36 thereof, in so far as having travelled as a steerage passenger by the steamer "Chevalier," belonging to the complainant, from Oban to Fort-William, he refused to pay the fare or to exhibit a ticket for the fare.

On the case being called in Court on August 24th the agent for the accused objected to the instance in respect that there was no concurrence by the procurator-fiscal.* The Sheriff-substitute (Menzie) sustained the objection, but allowed the procurator-fiscal to add his concurrence to the complaint.

The accused pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined 5s.

He brought a bill of suspension, pleading, inter alia, that the complaint having been presented without the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, the proceedings were ab initio null; and further, that the amendment, not being an amendment within the meaning of the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, was incompetent.†

Argued for the complainant;—It was incompetent to amend the complaint by adding the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal after service on the accused. Without the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal there was no instance, and consequently no complaint. There was no room, therefore, for amendment, there being no complaint to amend.¹

Argued for the respondent;—Looking to the terms of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, section 5, and of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, section 342, the amendment was competent, the accused having appeared to plead, and having suffered no injustice.² The concurrence of the procurator-fiscal was required merely to shew that there was a fair case for

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case the complaint upon which the conviction proceeded required the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal, and the instance was found by the Sheriff-substitute to be bad because that concurrence had not been given. The accused had been cited to appear, and had appeared, on this defective complaint, but at the trial the Sheriff-substitute allowed the complaint to be rectified by the procurator-fiscal appending his concurrence in a minute. That, in my opinion, was not a competent proceeding. There is no proper instance, and that was a fatal defect. That is a defect in substance and not in form merely, and therefore it does not fall within the power of amendment conferred by section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1864. Where the concurrence of the procurator-fiscal is necessary it must be given before the warrant for service is granted. This conviction must be set aside.

The accused pleaded not guilty, and after evidence led the Magistrate held the following facts proved:—That the Aulton Market was held within the burgh of Aberdeen, in the parish of Old Machar, which was a parish immediately adjoining that in which the licensed premises of the accused were situated; and that the tent from which the alleged sale took place was within the limits of the market stance.

The complaint was dismissed by the Magistrate, on the ground that the accused was entitled under section 8* of the Home Drummond Act (9 Geo. IV. c. 58) to sell liquor at the fair referred to without a special permission obtained in that behalf from the magistrates under section 6 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862.

The Procurator-fiscal took a case, in which the above facts were stated and the following question of law submitted for the opinion of the High Court:—"Whether the respondent, as holder of a certificate to sell exciseable liquors at premises situated in the parish of Newhills aforesaid, was entitled to sell such liquors at St Luke's Fair, being a lawful fair in the parish of Old Machar immediately adjoining thereto, and that without having obtained special permission in the manner required by section 6 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862?"

Argued for the appellant;—The "entertainment" referred to in section 6 of the Act of 1862 was the entertainment supplied by a publican upon the public or special occasion. A fair was a public or special occasion. A public fair was in the same position as a trade society's picnic, in which case a special permission was necessary.¹ The 6th section of the Act of 1862 must be held to have repealed by implica-

Counsel for the respondent was not called upon.

Mar. 5, 1894.
Lamb v.
Brown.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question which is raised by the appellant in this case is whether or not the magistrate who tried the case was wrong in law in acquitting the accused of the offence charged, that acquittal being founded upon the respondent's plea based upon section 8 of the Home Drummond Act of 1828.

It is admitted that there is no direct statutory repeal of that section, and if it had been repealed by implication, one would have expected that in ordinary course notice of such repeal would have been taken by the Statute Law Revision Committee. That might or might not be the case, but their not having recognised that there was such repeal is at least consistent with the contention of the respondent. By section 6 of the Public-Houses Act of 1862 magistrates are empowered to grant to a person who already holds a certificate a special permission for the sale of exciseable liquors if it be represented that a public or special entertainment is about to be held at a particular place and time, and if the magistrate is satisfied that the premises proposed to be used are suitable. Now, the appellant maintains that this clause by implication repealed the provision of clause 8 of the Home Drummond Act. I can see no grounds for so holding. Clause 6 of the 1862 Act only applies where a public or special entertainment, not originating directly or indirectly with the publican, is about to be held in certain premises and at a particular time. How that can repeal the right given to a publican by the Home Drummond Act to sell exciseable liquors at a public fair held in the parish or adjoining parish, I am at a loss to see. Counsel for the appellant submitted a very ingenious argument in which he maintained that the public entertainment referred to in section 6 of the 1862 Act was the entertainment supplied by the publican on the public or special occasion. It is plain that this is not the meaning of the Act. The "entertainment" referred to is an entertainment in the sense of a gathering of persons for entertainment, and it is in respect that such is proposed to be held that the publican is entitled to apply for an exceptional licence. But the Act of 1828 specifically allows him to sell liquor at fairs under his certificate without obtaining any special permission. I am quite clear that the clause of the Act of 1862 will not bear the interpretation which the appellant desires to put upon it, and that it cannot be held to repeal by implication the express provision of the previous Acts in respect to the sale of liquor at public fairs.

LORD M'LAREN.—The question is, whether a provision of the Home Drummond Act has been repealed by implication by section 6 of the Public-Houses Statute of 1862? Now, there are two cases—and only two so far as I am able to see—in which one statutory enactment is held by implication to repeal a prior enactment. The first is where there is an exact identity between the two provisions, as to the subject-matter and as to the mode of dealing with it, and the only difference is as to the language employed. The second case is where there is such repugnancy in the modes in which the two statutes deal with the same matter that the provisions cannot stand together. Between those extremes we have many instances where subsequent legislation only modifies or varies the effect of the provision made in the earlier statute.

No. 12. Now, the scope of the enactments before us is very different. One enactment deals with the sale of liquors in boats and vessels, in rivers or harbours, and at fairs or markets; while the other is not limited as to place or time, but gives power to the magistrate to grant a special permission when the application has reference to a public entertainment about to be given, and when he is satisfied that the entertainment is of a legitimate and proper character.

Lamb v.
Brown.

Such enactments are not identical, and it is also plain that they are not contradictory. The enactments can perfectly well stand together, and therefore there is no case of implied repeal.

Held in an appeal by him upon a case stated under the Summary Prosecutions Appeals Act, 1875, that the complaint was irrelevant in respect that the words “or about that time” must be taken as including the days immediately before and after the Sunday specified, and therefore as including hours on Saturday and Monday, when the sale would not have been an offence.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-

JOHN PATTERSON, hotel-keeper, Hawick, was charged in the Police Court of the burgh of Hawick at the instance of the Burgh Prosecutor, John Macdonald, upon a complaint that he had been “guilty of an offence against the laws for the regulation of public-houses in Scotland, in so far as, upon Sunday the 31st day of December 1893 years, or about that time,” he did open his hotel and sell one bottle of whisky to a person named, “contrary to the terms and conditions of his certificate.”

The accused pleaded not guilty, and after evidence led the Magistrates convicted him of the offence charged.

The accused took a case, in which the following question of law was submitted for the opinion of the Court:—“Is a relevant offence under the statute libelled in the complaint?”

Argued for the appellant;—The complaint libelled a sale of liquor on “Sunday, or about that time,” and it therefore included a period of time extending beyond the limits of Sunday. The extension could only be to Saturday and Monday immediately preceding and following, and as the sale might have been during the lawful hours on those days the complaint did not necessarily set forth any offence.¹

Argued for the respondent;—The words “or about that time” must be considered as mere surplusage. But in any view if the complaint had merely libelled the sale of liquor “on Sunday 31st,” the subsequent words “or about that time” would by the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, have been implied. Now the express insertion of what was by statute implied could not have the effect of vitiating a complaint. The words must be read as referring to the prohibited hours on Saturday night or Monday morning.¹ Selling during unlawful hours was the substance of the charge, and the particular day was not essential. The time of selling the liquor was limited by the words "contrary to the terms and conditions of his certificate." Where there was in the complaint a reference to the certificate it was unnecessary to set forth specifically that the person to whom the liquor was sold was not a bona fide traveller or resident in the house, and on the same principle the reference to the certificate must be held as limiting the time to prohibited hours.

Patterson.

LORD M'LAREN.—The point argued is short and simple, and there is really not much to be said about it. The question is whether in a charge for a contravention of certificate in respect that the accused on "Sunday the 31st December, 1893" opened his hotel for the sale of exciseable liquors, the relevancy of the libel is affected by the addition of the words "or about that time."

It is objected that the libel is irrelevant because it charged not the precise offence of selling spirits on Sunday, but on that day "or about that time."

If the latter words are omitted, it is said that under the Criminal Procedure Act of 1887 the words or expression would be implied, and that the expression of what is by statute implied ought not to have any destructive effect on the complaint.

No doubt under the statute it might be competent to prove, under a charge of selling liquor upon a particular Sunday, that the offence was committed upon some other Sunday within the latitude allowed by law to the prosecutor. But I cannot take that to be the effect of the words as expressed in this libel. They must mean that the accused sold the liquor on the Sunday in question, or on some part of the Saturday preceding, or Monday following, without defining what part of Saturday or Monday.

Now it is not an offence to sell liquor at any time on Saturday or Monday. Had the prosecutor charged a sale within the prohibited hours on Saturday or Monday it may be that in that case the words "or about that time" would have included the prohibited hours of Sunday. But the converse does not hold good. As the words stand, the extension of time must necessarily apply to any hours on the days nearest, and thus includes hours when it is no offence to sell liquor.

The objection is certainly technical, and if it had come before us by way of suspension I should have hesitated to sustain it unless it had appeared that the objection had been stated at the time and repelled.

But here we are called upon to deal with it in answer to a specific question of law put to us on a case stated for our opinion, and accordingly I am of opinion that the conviction must be quashed.

LORD RUTHERFORD CLARK.—The complaint states that the offence was committed "on Sunday or about that time."

I cannot doubt that the time libelled includes other days than Sunday. It is impossible to read it as referring to other Sundays.

Therefore, in my opinion, the libel is irrelevant unless it is competent to charge an offence under the statute without setting forth that the act was committed within certain hours prohibited by statute. I do not think that this is competent, and therefore I am of opinion that the complaint is irrelevant.

No. 13. I refer to my opinion in the case of Dingwall v. Stevenson (Nov. 2, 1892, 3 White, 362, 20 R. (Just. Cases) 16), where I had occasion to express my views as to the necessity for a specific averment of the thing which the Act prohibits and declares to be an offence.

Mar. 5, 1894.
Macdonald v.
Patterson.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am of the same opinion, and I think that in a case where the prosecutor is libelling an offence which cannot be committed except within a certain time, he is bound to state that it was committed within that time. That doctrine has always been applied in cases brought under the Poaching Acts, and I do not know of any case under the Public-Houses Acts in which in a complaint for selling liquor on week days during prohibited hours it has not been stated that the sale was within those hours.

It is plain that the libel would include here more than Sunday the 31st December—not only the day before but the day after the 31st. It would include therefore hours when there might be no offence committed.

I do not feel the same difficulty in giving effect to this plea—critical though it be—which Lord M'Laren has. Had the plea been based merely on the absence of specific detail, I do not think we could have listened to it. But where there has been an essential blunder committed—even though technical—in a material part of the libel going to the essence of the case, I do not think that the prosecutor is entitled to say that if the blunder had been pointed out the libel might have been amended. It is not the duty of the prisoner to take care of the prosecutor and get his libel amended; and where a libel is essentially bad the prosecutor must take the responsibility of pressing it to a conviction, for a conviction following on it must be bad also.

THE COURT answered the question in the case in the negative, and quashed the conviction and sentence appealed against simpliciter.

M'Lean.

Public-House—Club—Bona fides—Excise.—By one of the rules of admission to a working-men's club it was provided that intending members should only be admitted to the club by enrolment in a register (subject to the power of rejection by the committee), and upon payment of entry-money of 6d. and subscription of 3d. quarterly. This rule was habitually disregarded, and the bar-keeper was authorised by the committee to admit any person whose appearance he considered respectable on payment of the club subscription of 3d. for three months without enrolment or payment of entry-money or consideration of the case by the committee.

Held that whatever character the club might have possessed according to its written constitution, it was not, by reason of its permitting such a system of admission, a bona fide club, and that a sale of spirits to a member so admitted was a sale for which an Excise licence to retail spirits was required.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-

JAMES M'LEAN, James Neill, and David Nairn, the chairman, secretary, and treasurer respectively of the committee of management of a club known as the Montrose Working-Men's Club, and occupying premises at 38 Wharf Street, Montrose, were charged at the instance of Charles Madin, officer of Inland Revenue, in the Justice of Peace Court of Forfarshire, upon a complaint which set forth that they had contravened the 26th section of the Excise Licences Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. c. 81), as amended and altered by the 43d section of the Inland Revenue Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 20), by selling to one John Mitchell, supervisor of Inland Revenue, and that without having taken out a licence, a quarter of a gill of spirits. The accused pleaded not guilty, and after evidence led the Justices dismissed the complaint. No. 14.

Madin v.
M'Lean.

The complainant craved a case, in which the Justices stated the following facts as proved :—The accused were members of the committee of management of the club, and along with the other members of committee, which consisted of seven members, had power to conduct its affairs in conformity with the constitution and bye-laws of the club. This committee took on let the premises at No. 38 Wharf Street, Montrose, from Alexander Langlands, the proprietor thereof, and David Nairn, the treasurer, paid the rent. Alexander Cathro, a member, was clubkeeper, and was also engaged to act as barkeeper, and was responsible to the committee. On 28th July 1893 John Mitchell, supervisor of Inland Revenue at Stonehaven, who was then a stranger to Cathro, visited the premises, and requested to be supplied with drink. He was refused, not being a member. He then asked Cathro how he could become a member, and being told was, at his own request, admitted a member of the club and supplied with a ticket of membership (for which he paid 3d. for three months) by Cathro, who had authority to admit those whom he knew or from whose appearance he could gather would be decent respectable members. Members were admitted for a year upon payment of 1s. for a ticket, for half a year upon payment of 6d., and for three months upon payment of 3d. Cathro considered that Mitchell would make a suitable member and supplied him with a ticket, on which was printed "Bye-laws of the Club." The bye-laws, which were produced, shewed that the club took in magazines and newspapers, and that games might be played on the premises. The following were among the bye-laws :—"(4) Games of hazard, and the use of dice for gambling purposes, and betting or wagering on the games are prohibited under penalty of expulsion. (5) The bar for the supply of beer, whisky, aerated waters, cigars, and tobacco, will open at 8 o'clock daily, with the exception of Sunday, and close at 11 P.M. Members may have dinner, tea, coffee, &c., by special arrangement with the clubmaster."

Mitchell, after admission as a member, asked for a nip of spirits, which Cathro supplied, and for which Mitchell paid Cathro 2d. Mitchell was not introduced or proposed for admission as a member of the club. Cathro was the servant of the club committee, and acted in accordance with their instructions in admitting Mitchell a member of the club and supplying him, as a member of the club, with spirits. There was no Excise licence in force for the sale of spirits in the premises. There was put in evidence by the respondents the undernoted excerpt from "Conditions of Membership" of Montrose Working-Men's Club.*

The question of law submitted for the opinion of the Court was :—
"Whether, upon the facts stated, we were justified in holding that the said club was a bona fide club, and that Mitchell was duly admitted a

* "Membership of the club shall be constituted by the payment in advance of 3d. quarterly, 6d. half-yearly, or 1s. annually, and enrolment in the register of members, but only members who are enrolled for a year current at the time of the general meeting shall have a voice in the management of the club.

"After the 1st day of June 1893 each person desirous of becoming a member of the club shall pay the sum of 6d. of entry-money besides the ordinary subscription.

"The committee shall have power to reject persons wishing to become members, or to expel those who may be disorderly, and generally to enforce the rules."

member thereof, and that the sale of spirits to him was not a sale for which an Excise licence to retail spirits was required by the respondents?"

Argued for the appellant;—(1) It was plain that, according to the original constitution of the club, Mitchell was not duly elected a member. All the conditions of membership, except the payment of 3d. for three months, were violated. (2) If it were held that the rules of the club were not in force when he was admitted then it seemed clear that, upon the facts stated, the so-called club was simply a shebeen for the sale of drink to all comers.

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The Justices had found in fact that Mitchell had been duly admitted. (2) As regarded the bona fides of the club, the committee were entitled to delegate, as they did to Cathro, their powers as to admitting or rejecting an intending member. The fact that Mitchell had to pay a subscription, however small, was evidence of the bona fide nature of the club.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There are certain rules of this club which are produced and quoted in full in the case as the conditions of membership of the Montrose Working-Men's Club. All I have to say about them is this, that if these were the conditions of admission that were in operation, then I think that the club was a bona fide club in every sense of the word; a club in which the committee had the selection and the rejection of members; a club in which there was enrolment in a register of members, an entry-money, and an annual subscription; and if anything had been done in the clubhouse which was contrary to these conditions of membership, then whoever did it would be liable for breach, either to the committee if it was a breach of the rules not involving public consequences, or to the law if it was one which did involve public consequences.

But then it is said by the respondents as matter of fact—and I take it as matter of fact—that these were not the rules which were in operation at all. It is a very remarkable thing that rules should be produced by the respondents which they themselves said before the Justices were in operation, and which they at the bar, because of the exigencies of their case, now say may not have been in operation. But I take it that the Justices have found that certain other rules were in operation. Now, what were those rules? They were—that a certain Mr Cathro, who was barkeeper of the club and also a member of the club, had authority to admit those whom he knew, or those who from their appearance he considered, would be decent and respectable members, and that he did admit this Mr Mitchell as a member of the club at his own request; that Cathro received 3d. from him; and that by that payment he became a member of the club for three months, and that he was served with spirits. Now, taking it to be the fact that the club admitted its members in this way, I have no hesitation in holding that the Justices were wrong, for they held that this was a bona fide club, and therefore acquitted the respondents. I think a more plain case of mala fides in the working of a club could not possibly be presented. If you are going to carry on a club at all, and carry it on as a sham, you will have some kind of ceremony that has to be gone through, and what conceivable ceremony more utterly unlike bona fides could there be than that a club should have rules by which admission shall be carried out in a particular way, but that the committee, without the club, should abrogate the rules and give power to the manager to admit anybody off the street as a member of that club, whether he knew him or not?

It is not an easy thing of course in cases of this kind to draw lines and to say exactly where bona fides ends and mala fides begins, but I think it is easy in this case to come to the conclusion that you are very far beyond the line when it is maintained on the part of the club that these are the rules, and that this man was bona fide admitted as a member under them. This case probably may be useful for purposes of instruction. I think it probable that this club began in respectability, and I cannot help suggesting that if it is to go on in respectability it will avoid having such a plan as this for admitting new members, which it could have no object in doing except to sell liquor to them. The result of this case will, I hope, not be to lead to any further prosecution, and I think the respectable members of the club ought to be well satisfied to have it held that their committee have brought them into the position of being held on that occasion—for I put it no further—to have been acting not as a bona fide club, but in mala fide. I am quite certain that when this club was originally formed—containing, as I have no doubt it does, many most respectable members—if it had been proposed in that meeting that members should be admitted to the club in such a way as the respondents now maintain that this man was admitted, every respectable man at that time probably would have refused to have anything to do with its formation. But the question before us is, whether upon the state of facts found proved the Justices were right in the course they took of holding that the club was a bona fide club. I am of opinion that they were not.

No. 14.

Mar. 19, 1894.

Madin v.

M'Lean.

Lord KINCARDINE.—I substantially concur. The first question put is whether the Justices were justified in holding that the club was a bona fide club. Now, when the question is whether a club is a bona fide club or a sham one—a shebeen—I think you are perfectly certain to find that the printed constitution of the club is all quite right, and I think that if regard were had to the printed constitution only, it could not be said that this was not a bona fide club. But then it seems to me that the question is not about the printed constitution of the club, but about the practice, and I take the practice to be as is stated. The committee did not act according to their regulations and constitution, but they acted differently, and I think on the question whether a club is bona fide or not it is an important point that the club did not at all act according to their rules, which are perhaps unobjectionable, but in the loose unguarded manner which is stated in the case, and without any precautions of any kind. I think that the case contains not only a statement as to the manner in which Mitchell was admitted, but also a statement that he was admitted in accordance with the practice of the club, which was not in accordance but at variance with the written constitution. Holding then that the question turns upon the practice of the club, I concur in thinking that that practice was not consistent with the conduct of a bona fide club.

As to the second question, whether Mitchell was duly admitted a member of the club, my view is that that is incompetently put, because the Justices have said that he was admitted a member, and have stated the practice according to which he was admitted. I do not see how it can be denied that Mitchell was admitted a member of the club, and duly admitted, when the Justices in the case have stated the fact to be so. It seems to me that the Justices ask us to say whether they were right in a matter of fact, and I think that that is incompetent, but I am quite prepared to say that the club as carried on was not a bona fide club.

No. 14.

Mar. 19, 1894.
Madin v.
M'Lean.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—There was here a sale of spirits by persons not having an Excise licence, and they can only take themselves out of the operation of the statute by shewing that the sale was not a transaction between vendor and purchaser, but between club and member. Now, I agree with both your Lordships that there is nothing in the facts stated to lead one to the conclusion that this was anything but a bona fide club so long as its rules and regulations were observed. Its purposes were lawful and usual. According to the conditions of membership which are set out in the case, a member could only be admitted by enrolment, subject to a power of rejection by the committee, and payment of entry-money and subscription. It is nothing against the good faith of the institution that the entry-money and subscription are small, but it appears that the rules were, by the act of the respondents, absolutely and habitually disregarded.

In the present case a man was admitted by simply handing 3d. over the counter to the clubkeeper, who knew so little of him that he would not have admitted him if he had known who he was, for he was a supervisor of Inland Revenue. And this was no act of disobedience on the part of the clubkeeper, for the Justices tell us he had authority to admit anybody who presented himself and who was, in his opinion, of respectable appearance, on payment of 3d., 6d., or 1s., according as the period was three months, six months, or a year. In other words, there was to be no consideration of the case by the committee, and no payment of entry-money. I should therefore personally be prepared to hold that Mitchell was not duly admitted a member according to the rules of the club, but I also hold, in agreement with both your Lordships, that whatever may have been the original character of the club, it had, by permitting such a system of admission to exist, ceased to be a bona fide club.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find that the club as carried on was not a bona fide club: Find that the sale to the said John Mitchell was a sale for which an Excise licence to retail spirits was required: Therefore sustain the appeal."

Process—Petition for recall of sentence of outlawry.—A panel against whom sentence of outlawry had been pronounced in consequence of his failure to appear and answer to an indictment charging him with attempt to murder and murder along with another panel against whom the trial had subsequently proceeded, petitioned the Court to recall the sentence on the ground that at the time of the trial he was furth of Scotland, but was now willing to surrender himself for trial. No appearance was made for the Crown, to whom the petition was duly intimated.

The Court recalled the sentence, and reponed the panel thereagainst.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Id. Wellwood.

(SEE H. M. Advocate v. Monson, Dec. 23, 1893, supra, Just. Cases, p. 5.)
Edward Sweeney presented this petition for recall of a sentence of outlawry which had been pronounced against him by the Lord Justice-Clerk on 12th December 1893, upon his failure to appear to answer the diet on an indictment charging him with having along with Alfred John Monson (1) attempted to murder, and (2) murdered Windsor Dudley Cecil Hambrough. The diet had proceeded against Monson alone, and had resulted in a verdict of non-proven.

The petitioner averred,—“The petitioner is not guilty of the charges made against him in the said indictment. He was furth of Scotland at the date of the diet, but he now desires and is prepared to meet the said charges, and for that purpose he will appear in Court at the calling hereof and surrender his person to the end that his trial upon the said charges or either of them may proceed. In order to enable the petitioner to prepare for his defence, and to be relieved from the disabilities consequent upon the foresaid sentence of outlawry, it is necessary that the foresaid sentence should be recalled.”

No. 15.

Sweeney v.
Her Majesty's
Advocate.

The petitioner prayed the Court to appoint “this petition to be intimated to Her Majesty's Advocate for Her Majesty's interest, and thereafter to recall the sentence of outlawry with all that has followed thereon or is competent to follow thereon, and to repon him thereagainst. . . .”

The petition was duly intimated to the Crown, but no answers were lodged and no appearance was made for the Crown, either by minute or at the bar.

Counsel for the petitioner submitted that as the Crown had not appeared to oppose the petition, there was no one interested to oppose it, and moved that the prayer should be granted.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that the Crown representatives here have followed a rather unusual course. I think it is the ordinary and proper course for those representing the Crown, when a petition is presented in which the administration of justice is concerned, to appear and state what is maintained on behalf of the Crown in any such matter. I do not understand the procedure on the part of the representatives of the Crown in making no appearance in a matter of this kind. I think it is their duty, the matter having been duly intimated to them, to appear, and it is not at all satisfactory that the case should be in that position. The actual position before us is this—that a person who has been accused of crime, and been fugitated for non-appearance at the proper diet of the trial, now states that he is within the jurisdiction, and that he is prepared to meet the charge the Crown makes against him, and, as the Crown has not appeared, in the circumstances I think the proper course is that he should be reponed against the sentence of outlawry pronounced against him in respect of his non-appearance.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. According to my ideas of the practice in such matters, I think it is usual for the Crown to put in a minute that they do not mean to oppose the application, or at least to appear at the bar and state so; but they have not chosen to follow that course in this case, and that being so, I think we must assume that they do not intend to oppose this application, and that it is not for the public interests that it should be refused. I therefore agree with your Lordship that the only course for us is to recall the sentence of outlawry.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I am of the same opinion.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Having considered the petition and heard counsel for the petitioner (there being no appearance for the Crown), recall the sentence of fugitation mentioned in the petition, and repon the petitioner thereagainst as craved.”

Public Health—Pharmacy Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 121), secs. 1, 4, 15, and 17—Sale of poisons—Unqualified assistant.—Section 15 of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, enacts that “any person who shall sell or keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons . . . not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist . . . shall, for every such offence be liable to pay a penalty or sum of £5.”

Held (per Lord Justice-General, Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Adam, and dub. Lord Kincairney, diss. Lord Kyllachy and Lord Stormonth-Darling) that upon a construction of the provisions of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, the penalty imposed by the 15th section is incurred by an unqualified assistant of a duly registered and qualified practitioner, where the assistant, in his master's absence and in his shop, sells any of the poisons scheduled in the Act for behoof of his master.

WILLIAM TOMLINSON, residing in Glasgow, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, at the instance of Richard Bremridge, the Registrar under the Pharmacy Acts, 1852 and 1868, in name and by the authority of the Council of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, with concurrence of the Procurator-fiscal, upon a complaint which set forth that he had been guilty of an offence within the meaning of the 1st and 15th sections of the Pharmacy Act, 1868,* in so far as on

* The Pharmacy Act, 1868, enacted,—“Whereas it is expedient for the safety of the public that persons keeping open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding of poisons, and persons known as chemists or druggists should possess a competent practical knowledge of their business, and to that end that from and after ‘the 31st of December 1868’ all persons not already engaged in such business should, before commencing such business, be duly examined as to their practical knowledge, and that a register should be kept as herein provided . . .” Section 1.—“ . . . It shall be unlawful for any person to sell or keep open shop for retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons . . . unless such person shall be a pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of this Act, and be registered under this Act . . .”

Section 15.—“From and after the 31st day of December 1868, any person who shall sell or keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons . . . not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist . . . or shall fail to conform with any regulation as to the keeping or selling of poisons, made in pursuance of this Act . . . shall for every such offence be liable to pay a penalty or sum of £5.”

Section 4 gave facilities for registration as chemists and druggists to persons who before the passing of the Act had been for three years employed in the dispensing and compounding of prescriptions as assistants to a pharmaceutical chemist, subject to their passing such modified examination as the Council of the Pharmaceutical Society might declare to be sufficient evidence of their skill and competency to conduct the business of a chemist and druggist.

Section 17 rendered it unlawful to “sell” any poison unless certain regulations therein prescribed and intended to facilitate the tracing of poisons were observed. It imposed penalties on “any person selling poison otherwise than is herein provided,” and declared that “for the purposes of this section the person on whose behalf any sale is made by any apprentice or servant shall be deemed to be the seller.”

The Act 32 and 33 Vict. c. 117, was passed in 1869 “to amend the Pharmacy Act, 1868,” and enacted,—“(1) Nothing contained in the first fifteen sections of the recited Act shall affect any person who has been registered as a legally qualified medical practitioner before the passing of this Act, and the said clauses two separate occasions, he not being a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist, or a chemist and druggist within the meaning of the said recited Act, had, within the premises occupied by his employer, Dr Hugh Kelly, sold to customers certain of the poisons scheduled in the Act. No. 16.

June 1, 1894.
Bremridge v.
Tomlinson.

The accused pleaded not guilty, and, after evidence led, the Sheriff-substitute (Birnie) convicted him of both offences.

He craved a case for the opinion of the High Court.

The Sheriff-substitute stated the following facts as admitted or proved:—"1st. The whole averments of fact contained in the complaint.

"2d. That the shop, 133 West Scotland Street, where the poisons in question were dispensed, belongs to Dr Hugh Kelly, who is a properly qualified and registered medical practitioner, and also a properly qualified and registered chemist and druggist.

"3d. That the appellant is not a duly registered pharmaceutical chemist or chemist and druggist within the meaning of the said Acts.

"That on the two occasions libelled Dr Kelly was not present when the poisons were sold, and the business was being conducted in his absence by the appellant.

"It was before the passing of the Pharmacy Act, 1868, and still is, quite a common thing in Scotland for medical practitioners to keep drug-shops."

The questions of law were,—"(1) Whether in the shop of a duly qualified and registered medical practitioner, his assistant, who is not a duly qualified and registered medical practitioner, nor a registered pharmaceutical chemist, or chemist and druggist, within the meaning of the said Acts, contravenes the 1st and 15th sections of the Act of 1868, if, in the absence of the medical practitioner, he sells any of the poisons included in the schedule annexed to the Act? (2) In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative, whether the employer or his assistant is liable in the penalty? (3) Whether in the whole circumstances of the case the conviction in question was justifiable?"

On 5th March the case was remitted for hearing before a full bench. The case was heard on 19th March.

Argued for the appellant;—From the preamble of the 1868 Act it seemed clear that the object of the Legislature was in the interest of public safety to prevent the keeping open of shops by unqualified persons for the sale of poisons. The Act was silent as to their assistants, and aimed solely at the sale of poisons by the master, who alone had any interest or profit in the transaction. The word "sell" did not occur in the preamble, and the words of the enacting clause must be read so as not to go beyond it. The alternative implied in the words "sell or keep open shop" in sections 1 and 15 was in harmony with the preamble if it were taken to refer to different acts of one person, e.g., the trader who sold whether in open shop or not, or who kept open shop, and sold by the hands of others. It went beyond the preamble if it were taken to refer to the acts of different persons, e.g., the trader who kept open shop and the assistant who sold on his behalf. The former interpretation was the right one.¹ The seller was the principal in the contract, and not the agent or agents who might be employed in preparing the article for sale and handing it to the customer.² *The Pharmaceutical Society v. Bremridge v.

*don*¹ was badly decided, and of no authority in Scotland. The opinions relied upon by the respondent in *The Pharmaceutical Society v. The London and Provincial Supply Association*² were obiter, and not necessary for the decision of the case.

Argued for the respondent ;—The Court would adopt the construction which would most effectually secure the public safety, and that was that the unqualified assistant who handed the poison to the customer must be deemed to have been the seller of the poison. The emphatic declaration in section 17 that for the purposes of that section the person on whose behalf the sale was made by the assistant was to be deemed the seller seemed to shew conclusively that in the other sections the assistant was to be deemed the seller. This interpretation had received judicial effect both in England and Scotland.³

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The conviction which forms the subject of this appeal was pronounced on a complaint which charged the appellant with an offence against sections 1 and 15 of the Pharmacy Act of 1868, in respect that he not being a person qualified according to the requirements of that Act, sold certain poisons and substances to a person named, contrary to that Act, and thereby was liable in the penalty prescribed by it. The first clause makes it unlawful for a person not qualified in the manner set forth to do certain things, and the 15th clause fixes a penalty for the doing of any of these or certain other things. The words in both clauses which require to be considered are the words “any person who shall sell or keep open shop for retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons,” and the question which arises is whether, if it be proved that an individual who is not qualified has de facto sold poison, that is sufficient to justify his conviction under section 1, and his being sentenced to pay a penalty under section 15.

The facts are that the appellant's master is a properly qualified medical practitioner—who is under a later statute declared to be as competent to sell poisonous drugs as if he possessed the qualification set forth in the Act of 1868—and that the appellant, not being himself qualified, sold poison in his master's absence.

The chief argument of the appellant was, that although in point of fact he performed the sale he did not truly sell, that the sale was the sale of his master, who alone had any interest in the transaction, that the statute was not intended to strike against the subordinate, who acted only as a servant, but only against the seller in the sense of the trader in whose interest and to whose profit the sale was made.

When I read the clauses founded on, I find no ground for holding that they do not strike at the person who performs the act of sale. The word “sell” appears to me to apply to the person doing the act of sale in a retail business, whoever may be the person or persons for whose behoof he acts. The words “or keep open shop for the retailing, dispensing, or compounding” set forth an offence by itself, for which the penalty of the Act might be inflicted without proof of an actual sale. But that the word "sell" is intended to strike at the person who does the act of selling I have no doubt. I think that the word must be taken in connection with the statement of non-qualification as applicable to the person who does the act. If it did not, the purpose of the Act, which is declared to be the safety of the public, would be defeated. The purpose is to ensure the public safety in the sale of poisons, and that cannot, as I think, refer to sale in any other sense than the external transaction of giving over by the person carrying out the sale the article which the purchaser demands in the ordinary course of retail business. The meaning of the Act is, in my opinion, that poison shall not reach the hands of members of the public by the transfer of sale, except through the medium of a person possessing a satisfactory qualification, and that any person not possessing that qualification who effects such a sale by giving poison by an act of sale to a member of the public desiring to purchase it offends against the statute.

Bremridge v.
Tomlinson.

Reference was made in the debate to the preamble of the statute in which the word "sell" does not occur, and it was therefore maintained that the word "sell" in the enacting clause should be read so as not to go beyond the preamble. I do not think that such a course can be justified. If the enacting words of a statute are in themselves distinct, I cannot hold that their going beyond the preamble is a reason for setting them aside or endeavouring so to read them as to take away their meaning, particularly if in doing so the main purpose of the Act as expressed in the same preamble would thereby be practically defeated. That it would be so here there can be no doubt, for if the appellant's contention be sound, then if a person qualified under the Act opens a shop, poisons may be daily sold in that shop by persons having no qualification, and no prosecution can be successful, for the shop is not opened and kept by an unqualified person, and it is the qualified person who by the hand of the unqualified assistant sells to the public. And as a doctor, as in this case, is qualified, he may spend his whole day in visiting his patients, while poisons are hourly dispensed on his premises by an unqualified shop boy, yet no penalty can be inflicted, and therefore no deterrent put in force against such dangerous practice, which it was the very purpose of the statute to prevent.

It is noteworthy that where in another clause of the Act it was deemed desirable to make the act done by the servant to be the act of the employer, this was expressly set forth. For in section 17 it is declared that "for the purposes of this section the person on whose behalf the sale is made by an apprentice or servant shall be deemed to be the seller," thus distinguishing sales under that section from sales made under the sections in question.

I am confirmed in the views I have expressed by the decision in England upon this same question in the case of The Pharmaceutical Society v. Wheelton, 24 Q. B. D. 683, and also by what fell from the noble Lords who sat on the appeal case of The Pharmaceutical Society v. The London and Provincial Supply Association, 5 App. Cas. 857, and I have therefore come to the conclusion that the first question stated in the case should be answered in the affirmative. As regards the second question, it is only necessary to say that the sentence to pay the penalty can only be imposed upon the person convicted. The third question is merely formal, and if I am right as regards the first, must be answered in the affirmative.

Bremridge v.
Tomlinson.

LORD ADAM.—The appellant, Tomlinson, was not at the date of the conviction in question a person duly qualified to sell or to keep open shop for retailing, dispensing, or compounding poisons under the Pharmacy Act, 1868. He was at the time an assistant or servant in the shop of a Dr Kelly, who was a duly qualified person under the Act.

On the two occasions libelled the appellant, in the absence of Dr Kelly, sold poison to customers. For so doing he was convicted of a contravention of the 1st and 15th sections of the Act.

The question is whether the conviction is right.

The 1st section provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to sell poisons, unless such person shall have one or other of the qualifications therein specified; and the 15th section provides that any person who shall sell poison not being a person duly qualified under the Act, or shall do certain things or shall fail to do certain other things there enumerated, shall for any such offence be liable in a penalty of £5.

Now, it is not disputed that the appellant did in fact sell poison, and that he was not a person duly qualified to sell in terms of the Act.

Prima facie, therefore, it appears to me that he was guilty of the offence of which he has been convicted. But it was maintained that he was not the "seller" of the poison in the sense of the Act; that the "person" referred to and struck at by the Act was not the shopman or assistant who might have merely handed the poison over the counter, but the owner of the shop or business, being the person on whose behalf the sale was made.

I cannot adopt that view. It appears to me that the prohibition to sell is of universal application and applies to all persons, excepting only those persons who are duly qualified to sell poisons in terms of the Act.

That the "person" referred to in the 1st and 15th sections is not the person only on whose behalf the contract or sale is made, appears to me to be clear from the terms of the 17th section.

That section declares that it shall be unlawful to sell poison unless certain regulations therein specified are observed, and that any person selling poison otherwise than is therein provided shall be liable to a penalty, and that "for the purposes of this section the person on whose behalf any sale is made by any apprentice or servant shall be deemed to be the seller." The inference appears to me to be irresistible, that in the other sections of the Act the master of the apprentice or servant who in fact makes the sale of the poison is not to be deemed the seller; and if he is not to be deemed the seller, there is no other person to whom the Act can possibly apply except the assistant, servant, or apprentice who actually makes the sale. For these reasons I am of opinion that the appellant was properly convicted.

The present question was in terms decided in England in the case of the Pharmaceutical Society v. Wheeldon, 24 Q. B. D. 683, in the same way in which I propose to decide this case; and the same view of the statute was expressed by Lords Selborne and Blackburn in the case of the Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association, 5 App. Cas. 857.

These are not perhaps authorities by which we are technically bound, but I concur in and adopt the reasoning in these cases; and I may say, seeing that this is a question of the construction of a British statute, that if I had doubted as to the proper construction of the Act, I should, without hesitation, have yielded to the authority of these eminent Judges.

LORD KYLLACHY.—I regret that I am not able to concur in your Lordships' judgment. I have, I confess, great difficulty in reading this statute as requiring more than that the seller of these poisons—that is to say, the shopkeeper—the trader—the seller in the ordinary and legal sense as distinguished from the mere salesman—shall possess the requisite qualification. Nor indeed have I been able to see how, if the head of the establishment—the person responsible for its conduct—is duly qualified, it adds anything to the public security that the mere salesman who makes the sale, but may have nothing to do with the compounding of the drug, shall be also qualified.

Bremridge v. Tomlinson.

At the same time I am not sorry that the majority of your Lordships see your way to a different conclusion. It would certainly be inconvenient that this statute should be differently construed in Scotland and in England, and that would, it appears, be the result if your Lordships took the view of the statute to which my judgment inclines.

LORD KINCAIRNEY.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Adam that the appeal should be refused, but I cannot say that I adopt that opinion without considerable hesitation. I have found the Pharmacy Act, 1868, exceedingly difficult to construe. Of course its main object is to secure the safety of the public; but the doubtful point is, whether the scheme of the Act is to attain that object by endeavouring to secure that those who carry on the business of selling poisonous drugs in chemists and druggists' shops shall be men of respectability and of adequate scientific knowledge, or by endeavouring to secure that their assistants also who may sell poison on their account shall be equally qualified and instructed; the whole difficulty apparently arising from the ambiguity or possible ambiguity of the words "sale" and "seller." The latter view has been adopted in England, and has been supported in elaborate judgments by Baron Pollock and Justice Hawkins in the case of Wheeldon, and in a very important judgment by Lord Selborne—concurred in on that point by Lord Blackburn—delivered in the House of Lords in the case of the London and Provincial Supply Association—a case followed in our Courts in Bremridge v. Gray, July 20, 1887, 14 R. (Just. Cases) 60.

These are very important judicial opinions on the construction of a British statute, unskillfully and obscurely expressed, and while I do not adopt everything that is said in them, their reasoning seems to me of great weight and force, and not having been able to form a very confident opinion as to the true construction of the statute, I think myself entitled to defer to such weighty authority.

LORD STORMONTH-DARLING.—My view of the statute is the same as Lord Kyllachy's, but there is no question of principle involved, and I have no desire to detain the Court by stating my reasons at length, especially as I am conscious of some advantages in having the statute interpreted as the majority of your Lordships propose to do.

LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.—My opinion coincides with the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Adam.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Answer the first question in the case in the affirmative: Find, in answer to the second question, that the person convicted is the person liable in the penalty: Answer the third question in the affirmative: Dismiss the appeal."

ROBERT FARQUHARSON, Complainer.—Salvesen.

CLEMENT W. R. GORDON, Respondent.—Comrie Thomson—J. A. Reid.

Process—Complaint—Limitation of time—Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 24—Prevention of Cruelty to and Protection of Children Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. c. 44), sec. 1.—Section 24 of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, enacts that in all cases where no time is specially limited for instituting a complaint for summary conviction for a statutory offence in the Act of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be brought within six months from the time when the matter of such complaint arose.

A person was on 29th March 1894 served with a complaint which charged him with a contravention of the Prevention of Cruelty to and Protection of Children Act, 1889, in that he "did between the 1st August 1893 and the 28th February 1894 . . . wilfully ill-treat, neglect, and expose" A B, a boy under fourteen years of age, "so as to cause unnecessary suffering and injury to his health by beating him, failing to supply him with necessary food and clothing, and otherwise ill-using him." The Sheriff found the accused "guilty of the contravention charged to the extent of wilfully ill-treating A B so as to cause unnecessary suffering by beating him."

In a suspension the Court quashed the conviction, in respect that looking to the terms of the complaint and the terms of the conviction it was impossible to say that the ill-treatment of which the Sheriff had convicted the accused might not have occurred between 1st August 1893 and 29th September 1893, which latter date was six months before the date of the complaint.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Adam.
Ld. Wellwood.

ON 29th March 1894, Robert Farquharson, farmer at Bogarrow, Banffshire, was served with a complaint in the Sheriff Court at Banff, brought at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and which set forth that he "having the custody, control, or charge of Robert James Farquharson M'Lauchlan, a boy under the age of fourteen years, did, between the 1st August 1893 and the 28th February 1894 . . . wilfully ill-treat, neglect, and expose the said . . . M'Lauchlan, so as to cause unnecessary suffering and injury to his health, by beating him, failing to supply him with necessary food and clothing, and otherwise ill-using him, contrary to the Act 52 and 53 Vict. cap. 44, section 1."

The accused pleaded not guilty, and thereafter the Sheriff-substitute (Grant) found the accused "guilty of the contravention charged to the extent of wilfully ill-treating" M'Lauchlan "so as to cause unnecessary suffering by beating him. Quoad ultra, find the said Robert Farquharson not guilty."

Farquharson brought a bill of suspension, in which he stated that the provisions of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864,* had not been complied with, in that the complaint was served upon him upon the 29th March 1894, and the contravention charged extended over a period beginning eight months prior to that date.

The complainer pleaded;—The conviction is bad in law in respect (1) it does not bear to proceed upon any contravention of the statute within six months from the institution of the complaint, being the limit of No. 17.

* The Summary Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1864 (27 and 28 Vict. c. 53), sec. 24, enacts,—“In all cases in which no time is already or shall be hereafter specially limited for instituting any complaint for the recovery of any penalty or sum of money, or for conviction for any statutory offence punishable on summary conviction, in the Act of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be instituted within six months from the time when the matter of such complaint arose.”

time required by the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, sec. 24.

Argued for the complainer;—It might be that had the Sheriff-substitute expressly found the accused guilty of the contravention after 29th September, mentioning specific dates of cruelty, the conviction would have been unassailable. But taking the conviction as it stood it was impossible to say whether it was for contravention of the statute before or after that date. The acts of cruelty might have all been outside the time prescribed by the Summary Procedure Act, or some of them outside that time might have influenced the Sheriff-substitute in pronouncing judgment. It was not the duty of the accused to give the prosecutor an opportunity of amending his libel so as to make it relevant.

Farquharson
v. Gordon.

Argued for the respondent;—The charge was one of continuous ill-treatment of the child. The Act did not contemplate particular acts of cruelty, with which the common law was adequate to deal, but a cumulative course of cruelty which in point of fact extended back beyond six months, and which was accordingly so libelled. It was not to be assumed that the matter of complaint arose beyond the six months merely from the circumstance that latitude had been taken in the date set forth in the libel. No objection was taken to the libel before or at the trial, when the objection might have been obviated by restricting the charge to the period subsequent to 29th September 1893.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts in this case are that the suspender was charged with a contravention of the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act by offending against its provisions between certain dates mentioned, viz., 1st August 1893 and 28th February 1894, and that charge was served on him upon 29th March 1894.

Now, by the 24th section of the Summary Procedure Act, 1864, under which the complaint was brought, it is enacted that no proceedings may be instituted in respect of any statutory offence at a period later than six months from the time when the matter of such complaint arose. If that be so, six months from the time when the complaint was served takes us back to 29th September 1893. The complaint libels acts of cruelty from 1st August 1893, or two months beyond the six months specified in the limiting statute, and we have no explanation of the reason why a period greater than the statute allows has thus been included in the libel. It is unnecessary here for us to decide a question which may afterwards arise,—whether, if a long-continued course of ill-treatment is to be charged as occurring within the statutory six months, it may not be competent to state in the complaint that the ill-treatment was in continuation of a course of ill-treatment lasting more than the six months, and to lead evidence shewing that the condition of the child had been so affected by that treatment prior to the six months as to render the subsequent treatment a contravention of the statute. One can see that the quality of the treatment within the six months' limit might, to some extent, depend upon the treatment prior to that period. What might not be ill-treatment involving penalty under the statute in the case of a healthy well-cared for child, might be such ill-treatment if applied to a child already enfeebled and suffering from previous ill-usage, and it might be only fair to the accused in such a case to give him notice of what was intended to be proved against him, carrying back the history of the case beyond the six months. On that question I give no opinion, as it does not arise in the case now before us.

Farquharson
v. Gordon.

In this case what the prosecutor offered to prove was that between 1st August 1893 and 28th February 1894 the accused had done certain things to this child which amounted to an offence under the statute. Now, I think that this libel is on the face of it irrelevant, because it states, as an offence against the accused for which he is to be convicted, that between 1st August and 29th September, when that offence, if any, was prescribed, as well as between 29th September and 28th February, the contravention had been committed. No objection, however, was taken to the relevancy before the Sheriff. I do not think it is incumbent on the accused to make a libel relevant for the prosecutor; on the contrary, I think that it is the prosecutor's duty to bring a relevant libel. Yet the accused having elected to go to trial upon this charge, I think there was undoubtedly in the charge sufficient to make it competent for the Sheriff, if he had found evidence to satisfy him that between 29th September and 28th February an offence had been committed, to have stated that he so found, provided he had specified the time in his verdict. If he had so worded it, we should have been very slow to disturb the conviction. But what he has done is to convict the accused of the offence "charged," without any reference to time. Now, that is quite consistent with the evidence having proved ill-treatment in August and September and no continued ill-treatment in the subsequent months, for the verdict must be taken as only finding that between the first and the last date there was ill-treatment. It is said we must assume that it was a course of ill-treatment continued throughout the period libelled, but we cannot assume anything except what is stated in the conviction, and that is quite consistent with the accused having been found guilty of a crime which had prescribed.

I move your Lordships, therefore, to sustain the suspension and to quash the conviction.

LORD ADAM.—The charge made against the suspender is that he, having the custody, "control, or charge of Robert James Farquharson M'Lauchlan, a boy under the age of fourteen years, did, between the 1st August 1893 and the 28th February 1894, at Bogarrow aforesaid, wilfully ill-treat, neglect, and expose the said Robert James Farquharson M'Lauchlan, so as to cause unnecessary suffering," and so on. Now, the question arises in this way—The Summary Procedure Act, in section 24, requires in all cases libelling a statutory offence, that the complaint be brought within six months from the time when the matter libelled in such complaint occurred. This libel was served on 29th March 1894, and it would have required to have been brought two months earlier if it was competently to have included an offence libelled as having been committed during a period commencing on 1st August 1893. It was not so brought. That necessarily involves that the charge should have been limited to conduct on the part of the accused within a period of six months prior to 28th March. That it was not so limited is said to constitute irrelevancy. To this it is answered that the contravention charged is not any particular act or acts, but a continuous course of conduct, beginning on the 1st August and culminating on the 29th February, and therefore that it was within the six months. It might be, and it is maintained in support of this that the offence is a continuous offence. A continuous offence may be more or less continuous, and it is not said that the Crown would have to prove an offence on each and every day of that period.

Now, I cannot see that the Sheriff under this charge might not have pronounced the conviction in the terms he has, if he had found it proved that the accused gave the boy two or three severe beatings, or even one severe beating between 1st August and 28th of September. That would have entitled the Sheriff to find the accused guilty of the contravention charged to the extent of wilfully ill-treating the child, so as to cause unnecessary suffering by beating him, and that is all the Sheriff has found. Now, how can we tell when the beating took place, whether in August or after 28th September? But even taking it that the Sheriff did find that the ill-treatment continued after 28th September, how can we tell from the charge or the conviction how far the beating prior to that date affected the Sheriff's mind in the sentence which he pronounced? If the Sheriff had said expressly that all the acts proved occurred between 29th September and 28th February, I do not say whether we might or might not have interfered with his sentence. But looking to the fact that we cannot say whether the accused has or has not been convicted of an offence which has prescribed by the statutory limitation, I think we have no course open to us but to quash the conviction.

LORD WELLWOOD.—I am of the same opinion. Looking to the latitude taken by the prosecutor in the complaint and the terms of the conviction, it is impossible to say that the Sheriff may not have convicted the suspender on the strength of isolated acts or continuous ill-treatment committed between 1st August and 28th September. That being so, the conviction cannot stand.

THE COURT suspended the conviction.

In 1891 a mine-owner entered into an agreement with his miners that an average uniform deduction of 56 lbs. should be made from the gross contents of each hutch sent up from the pit in respect of stones and substances in the hutch other than coal.

In 1894 the manager was convicted upon a complaint which charged him with a contravention of section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, in having failed to pay a miner the full amount of wages corresponding to the actual weight of the coal in a hutch. It was proved that the miner had been paid in terms of the agreement.

 Ronaldson v. Mowat.

HIGH COURT. ON 16th January 1894 David Marr Mowat, residing at Summerlee Iron-works, Coatbridge, Lanarkshire, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at the instance of John M. Ronaldson, Her Majesty's Inspector of Mines for the Western District of Scotland, upon a complaint which set forth that the accused, "having been on the dates hereinafter libelled, the agent or manager of the Orbiston Colliery, in the parish of Bothwell, Lanarkshire, belonging to the Summerlee Iron and Steel Company, and, as agent or manager foresaid, having been responsible for the due observance of section 12* of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and in which mine Robert Knox, Michael M'Guigan, Charles Stewart, and John Rooney . . . were employed as miners, and whose wages depended on the amount of coal gotten by them," the accused "did, as agent or manager foresaid, on or about 4th November 1893, . . . fail to pay" Knox, M'Guigan, Stewart, and Rooney "according to the actual weight of coal contracted to be gotten in so far as," &c. Four separate charges were libelled, one with respect to each of the four men, the charge with respect to Rooney being that he "having on said 25th October 1893, in said mine, filled and despatched to the pithead a hutch containing 8 cwt. 33 lbs. of coal, as weighed at said pithead, the said David Marr Mowat did pay the said John Rooney for only 8 cwts. of coal, being a loss in wages of a halfpenny or thereby to the said Rooney, and this" the accused "did contrary to the Act 50 and 51 Victoria, cap. 58, sec. 12 (1)."

The accused pleaded not guilty, and evidence was led.

The following facts were established:—In April 1891, the company having had some differences with their workmen as to the method of payment and deductions, a meeting was held between the manager and the miners, and an agreement was arrived at between them to the effect that a uniform deduction of half a hundredweight should be made from the ascertained weight of every hutch sent up to the pithead, in name of and

* The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. c. 58), sec. 12 (1), enacted,—“ 12 (1) Where the amount of wages paid to any of the persons employed in a mine depends on the amount of mineral gotten by them, those persons shall be paid according to the actual weight gotten by them of the mineral contracted to be gotten, and the mineral gotten by them shall be truly weighed at a place as near to the pit-mouth as is reasonably practicable.

“ Provided that nothing in this section shall preclude the owner, agent, or manager of the mine from agreeing with the persons employed in the mine that deductions shall be made in respect of stones or substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten, which shall be sent out of the mine with the mineral contracted to be gotten or in respect of any tubs, baskets, or hutches being improperly filled in those cases where they are filled by the getter of the mineral, or his drawer, or by the person immediately employed by him; such deductions being determined in such special mode as may be agreed upon between the owner, agent, or manager of the mine on the one hand, and the persons employed in the mine on the other, or by some person appointed in that behalf by the owner, agent, or manager, or (if any checkweigher is stationed for this purpose, as hereinafter mentioned) by such person and such checkweigher, or in case of difference by a third person, to be mutually agreed on by the owner, agent, or manager of the mine on the one hand, and the persons employed in the mine on the other, or in default of agreement, appointed by a chairman of a Court of Quarter Sessions, within the jurisdiction of which any shaft of the mine is situate.”

for stones, dirt, &c., or other foreign material, with the additional proviso that if 25 lbs. of such stones, dirt, &c., and other foreign material should be found in any hutch when examined, the whole hutch should be deducted, and in effect payment for the entire hutch should be forfeited by the miner who sent it up. Notices embodying this agreement were posted at the pithead, and it was not disputed that the notices, if valid under the statute, constituted a binding contract between the masters and men.

 Ronaldson v.
 Mowat.

The inspector examined the hutches in question. The round coal was separated from the dross, and the amount of dirt in it was ascertained. In each case only stones, dirt, &c., which did not pass through the meshes of the riddle used, were separated and weighed, no account being taken of the weight of dirt, &c., in and with the dross, which along with it passed through the riddle. The result obtained in this manner in Rooney's case was 23 lbs. of dirt. The amount of stones and dirt mixed with the dross in specimens analysed by the respondent's head chemist amounted to 25 per cent. Mowat produced a statement shewing that for four weeks in October 1893 the average amount of dirt and stones mixed with the dross was 128 lbs. per hutch.

The Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) convicted the accused.

Mowat appealed under section 67 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and the reasons of the appeal were, inter alia, these:—(2) Because the facts proved do not disclose any offence under section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. (3) Because the persons mentioned in the complaint were, in fact, paid according to the actual weight gotten by them of mineral contracted to be gotten. (4) Because the deductions complained of were made in terms of an existing agreement between the appellant or the mine-owners and the persons employed in the mine, and were made in respect of stones or substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten, or in respect of the hutches being improperly filled, and were authorised by the terms of the statute.

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—We have been told that our opinion is desired on a question of general importance, viz., whether the agreed-on deduction of 56 lbs. per hutch at the appellant's colliery is legal or not. But it must be remembered that this is an appeal against a criminal conviction, and must be so dealt with, whatever our view on the general question may be. In my opinion the conviction is bad apart from the legality or illegality of the deduction; but in the meantime I shall deal with the deduction.

1. The complaint is framed on the footing that the miners' wages depended on the amount of coal gotten by them, that being the mineral contracted to be gotten; that they despatched to the pithead hutches which, after deducting so many pounds for stones and dirt ascertained to be contained in them, were found to contain a certain weight of coal; and that, instead of paying the miners according to the actual weight of coal so ascertained, the appellants in each case deducted 56 lbs. from the gross weight of the contents of the hutch.

Take as an example Rooney's hutch. The gross weight including tare was $12\frac{1}{2}$ cwt.; deducting $4\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. for tare left $8\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. The amount of dirt in the hutch according to the evidence for the complainer was 23 lbs. only. Deducting that from $8\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. left 8 cwt. 33 lbs. Rooney was not paid upon that weight but upon 8 cwt.,—56 lbs. having been deducted from the weight of the total contents of the tub.

The appellants entirely dispute that the hutches in question only contained the quantity of stones and dirt spoken to by the complainer's witnesses; and it is proved and admitted that no note was taken of the dirt in the dross. But supposing for the sake of argument that the complainer's figures are correct, the question then arises whether the deduction of 56 lbs., to which these miners amongst others had agreed, was a legal deduction or not. If it was a legal deduction, then that is an end of the case. If it was not a legal deduction, we may have to consider whether the facts proved support and square with the charge in the complaint.

I do not think there is any real difficulty, at least as regards this case, as to the construction of section 12 (1) of the Act of 1887. The first two paragraphs are as follows:—(Reads). Reading the first paragraph in connection with the second, I do not think it doubtful that the "mineral contracted to be gotten" (in this case coal) is contrasted with and does not include stones and dirt. The miners are to be paid according to the weight of the mineral contracted to be gotten, i.e., coal brought up. If no agreement as to deductions is come to in order to ascertain the weight of coal, the stones and dirt in each case would require to be separated from the coal, which, if practicable, would be an inconvenient and expensive process alike to owners and miners.

To avoid this inconvenience the second paragraph provides for owners and miners agreeing on some special mode for fixing deductions to be made "in respect of stones and substances other than the mineral contracted to be gotten which shall be sent out of the mine with the mineral contracted to be gotten."

If deductions for dirt are agreed on, then of course these being deductions from the gross contents of the hutch, the gross contents must in the ordinary case be weighed; the weighing of the actual coal being dispensed with.

It is manifest that any special mode of fixing deductions must dispense with the ascertainment by weighing of the actual amount of coal in each hutch; and, strictly speaking, the owners under such an agreement will not pay the miners in all cases according to the precise amount of coal brought up by each. In a word, such special mode must be based upon the average amount of foreign matter which overhead might be expected to be contained in a hutch according to the experience of practical miners. It is a necessary consequence of taking an average that in some cases the miner may not be paid according to the actual weight of coal brought up. He may be paid for more or less coal than on examination would be found to be contained in his hutch.

In the present case the owners and the miners—the parties best qualified to judge—are agreed that a uniform deduction of 56 lbs. is fair; and we are asked by the complainer to say that this special mode of ascertaining the deduction to be allowed, which seems to have given satisfaction to the men for many years, and of which the complainer never hitherto thought it his duty to complain, is so unfair and so illegal that the appellant must be criminally convicted for having agreed to it.

I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion the deduction was both legal and fair, based as it was on an average satisfactory to all concerned. I think the Sheriff's judgment proceeds upon grounds which would make it impossible in any case to fix a deduction by way of average; and I think further that he has misapplied the English judgments to which he refers. He says, after referring to the case of Kearney—"Here the question is as to the legality of a uniform deduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. per hutch, no attempt being made to separate and weigh the dirt. I cannot distinguish this case from Kearney's. Unless it can be shewn that the actual amount of dirt does exceed the amount reckoned for deduction, it is clear that the miner is bargaining to have a certain payment deducted which the statute prohibits him from bargaining about." If this were sound, every deduction which depended upon averages would be illegal, and no other practical mode being suggested, the parties would have to revert to weighing the amount in each hutch. The Sheriff proceeds to a certain extent upon the fact that one seam of coal is sometimes cleaner than the others. But the answer seems to be that the miners are not confined to working one seam, and the average is taken for the whole pit with its one pithead. The complainer's witness Barry says:—"We must have the same rate of deductions for the three seams having the same pithead."

July 13, 1894.
Ronaldson v. Mowat.

The Sheriff further indicates that an average to be legal must be an average restricted to each miner and his own labour alone. The complainer himself repudiates it,—“You could not have a rate of deduction for each man in a large colliery.” The statute seems to contemplate such a general agreement as here exists, and not a separate agreement with individual miners.

The Sheriff then proceeds,—“If the average is such that it means an average between his own work and the work of other people working in other places and in seams where the coal sent to the surface differs in the amount of dirt it contains, the result must be that in some cases the average means a deduction from the coal produced. In this case no average was struck or attempted to be struck. A rough estimate was made, and made at a time when the cleanest seam at present being worked was not opened.” Here again the Sheriff's view seems to me to make an agreement by average impossible. If an agreement is illegal wherever it can be said that in some cases the average means a deduction from the coal produced, all deductions by average will be illegal.

The cases cited in the Sheriff's note have really no application. The case of Bourne v. Netherseal Colliery Company, Limited, 20 Q. B. D. 606, and 14 App. Cas. 228, merely decided under the Act of 1872 that it was illegal to contract that the miners should not be paid for slack, i.e., dross, the reason being that slack is part of the coal, the mineral contracted to be gotten.

In the case of Kearney v. Whitehaven Colliery Company, 1 Q. B. [1893], p. 700, the agreement did not proceed on average or provide for a deduction; it involved total forfeiture of the whole of the coal in the hutch tested if it contained 35 lbs. of dirt. Justice A. L. Smith says (1 Q. B. [1893], p. 714),—“What has been done is this—They do not weigh for dirt every tub which comes to the top, but they give the men the benefit of nineteen out of twenty tubs. They test about one tub in twenty, no matter by what man it is sent up. If it contains no more than 25 lbs. of dirt, then no drawback is made. If it contains more than 25 lbs. and not more than 35 lbs., then a drawback of one-half the weight of the coal in the tub is made; and if it contains more than 35 lbs., then no payment at all is made for the coal in the tub. Now, in my judgment, the House of Lords has practically put this construction on the section—A pitman when paid by weight must be paid according to the weight of the coal he actually wins, but by the proviso the master may agree with him to make deductions from the total weight of what is sent up in the tub in respect of stones and substances other than mineral. If all that had been done here was to agree upon some mode of finding out what was the average amount of dirt in a given number of the tubs sent up without weighing every one of them, I do not think any difficulty would arise under this section ; but what was done was this—when a certain proportion of dirt was found in the tub selected for testing, the actual coal in that tub was not paid for at all. In face of that can it be said that the provisions of section 12 have not been disregarded? I am of opinion that they have.”

Ronaldson v.

The case is clearly not in point. Deduction based on average implies that the deduction so fixed represents dirt. Open forfeiture of payment for coal, the weight of which has been ascertained by weighing, is a very different thing. The two decisions to which I have referred proceeded on the footing that the so-called deduction was an undisguised agreement that payment should not be made for an ascertained quantity of coal brought up, and therefore illegal.

II. Even if the deduction were illegal, as being made on a wrong basis, it does not follow that the conviction can stand. Looking to the complaint alone, I cannot say that it is irrelevant ; but the facts proved do not support the charge. Reading the complaint, one would assume that the coal was weighed by the appellants in pursuance of their usual system, and that they failed to pay according to the weight so ascertained. But it appears from the evidence that this process was exceptional, and was performed under the instructions of the complainer and according to his directions. It must be remembered that so far as regards the complaint and conviction we have only to do with the cases of the four miners named in the complaint. The coal was weighed under the directions of the prosecutor, and I think it is for him to shew that it was fairly weighed, and that the amount of dirt and stones did not amount to 56 lbs., the deduction made by the appellants. Now, it appears from the proof that the dirt said to have been found in the hutches and weighed was merely the dirt in the round coal, and that no deduction whatever was made for dirt in the dross, and no attempt to discover the quantity of dirt in it. Now, it is proved by analysis that while the average amount of dirt and stones in the round coal is comparatively small, the average amount of dirt and stones among the dross in specimens analysed amounted to no less than 128 lbs. per hutch. It is therefore, in my opinion, not proved that the deduction of 56 lbs. exceeded the amount of dirt in the hutches in question. Suppose it did, is this experiment with four hutches probatio probata that the average agreed on was excessive? What took place did not fairly represent the appellant's system. The appellant's system may or may not be legal, but it has not been properly put in issue in this complaint.

Therefore, even if I were of opinion that the deduction was not covered by the statute I should not be prepared to sustain the conviction.

In conclusion, I must observe that I think the concluding part of the agreement as to forfeiture in the event of more than 25 lbs. of dirt being found in round coal is illegal ; but with that we have nothing to do in the present case, and I fancy that in practice it is very seldom that such a case occurs.

LORD ADAM.—I concur in the result of the opinion of Lord Wellwood, but as the case is of importance I think it right also to state shortly the grounds of my opinion.

In the course of the discussion we were referred to two English cases of the highest authority as throwing light on the construction of the clause with which we are concerned.

The first of these cases, the Netherseal Coal Company, arose upon the construction of the 17th section of the Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1872, which is the corresponding clause to the 12th section of the present Act, under which the present case arises.

Ronaldson v.
Mowat.

In that case I think it was established—(1) That the words “mineral gotten by them” meant the contents of the tub or hutch as sent up by the miners, and that it was the contents of the tub or hutch as so sent up that was to be truly weighed. (2) That the owner might lawfully agree with the miners that deductions should be made from the minerals so gotten in respect of stones, &c., other than the mineral contracted to be gotten, viz., coal, but that such deductions must be ascertained in the manner provided by the Act—that is, in that Act—by the banksman and weigher or checkweigher. (3) That any deduction made which involved that the miner was not paid according to the weight of the mineral contracted to be gotten was illegal. But (4) that the whole agreement was not illegal, in respect of an illegal condition, but that such illegal condition was not enforceable.

The second case was that of Kearney, which arose under the present Act, and in which it was held (1) that the miner must be paid according to the weight of mineral in the tub or hutch. (2) That deductions might be made from the total weight of mineral in respect of stones, &c.; and (3) that agreements might be made with reference to the deductions to be made from such total weight.

The decisions in these cases may not be binding on us as authorities, but they are cases on the construction of a British statute, and I should have no hesitation in following them, even if I doubted their soundness, which I may respectfully say I do not. I shall therefore give effect to them so far as they apply in considering the present case.

The agreement between the owner and miners is in this case in the following terms,—“One half hundredweight to be deducted from each hutch,—and if any hutch contains 25 lbs. of dirt or foreign material, the whole hutch to be deducted.”

Now, as regards the latter of these conditions, I have no doubt, on the authority of the cases of Netherseal and Kearney that it is illegal, in respect that it necessarily involves a forfeiture of mineral contracted to be gotten. No question, however, arises in this case under that condition of the agreement, and I think also, under the authority of these cases, that the fact of that condition being illegal does not render the whole agreement illegal. The question, therefore, which we have to consider is whether the first condition is illegal. Now, that condition, as I read it, stipulates that $\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. shall be deducted from each hutch in respect of dirt and foreign material.

The condition, therefore, implies in the first place that each hutch as sent up by the miner shall be weighed. In the next place, that the deduction is to be made in respect of stones, &c., other than the mineral contracted to be gotten, a matter about which it is quite legal to contract.

In the third place, that the deduction is to be ascertained in a manner provided for by the Act, because the Act provides that the deductions may be determined in such special mode as may be agreed upon between the owner, agent, or manager of the mine on the one hand, and the persons employed in the mine on the other—a provision, I may remark, which was not contained in the previous Act—and this mode of ascertaining the deductions has been agreed upon between the manager of the pit on the one hand, and the persons em-

No. 18. ployed in the pit on the other. So far I think the case is sufficiently clear and the agreement unobjectionable.

July 18, 1894.
Ronaldson v.
Mowat.

But it is said that under this condition a miner may not be paid according to the mineral contracted to be gotten by him, and that any condition which involves that contingency is invalid, as the Act requires that the miner shall be paid according to the weight of the mineral contracted to be gotten by him.

Now, it is the fact that under this condition if one particular hutch only is taken into consideration, it may not contain $\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. of dirt or foreign material, and consequently that the miner is not paid for the whole of the mineral contracted to be gotten contained in that hutch. But the condition is founded on the doctrine of average, and if the average is a fair average it follows that the miner is in fact paid for all the mineral contracted to be gotten by him from the pit—the deficiency of one hutch being made up by the surplus of another—which, in my opinion, is all that the Act in any view requires.

It appears to me, therefore, that ex facie of the agreement there is nothing illegal about it. It deals with a matter about which the owner and miner were free to contract, and deals with it in a manner authorised by the statute.

No doubt if the prosecutor were able to shew that the average was not a fair average, and that, under pretence of contracting as to deductions for dirt and foreign material, the parties had in fact contracted that the miners were not to be paid for the whole mineral contracted to be gotten by them, the agreement might be illegal.

But I think it lies upon the prosecutor to prove this. He is challenging, and desires to get behind an ex facie valid agreement. Has he proved it in this case? I think not, for the reasons stated by Lord Wellwood, which I need not repeat. In fact, I think it is sufficient to set aside this conviction that only the amount of round coal in the several hutches weighed was ascertained, but that no attempt was made to ascertain the amount of dirt which passed through the meshes of the riddle along with the dross, and which the evidence shews is in this pit very considerable. In these circumstances I do not see how it can be maintained that the prosecutor has proved that the miners were not paid on the actual weight of the mineral contracted to be gotten by them, and unless he has proved that, this conviction cannot be sustained.

I concur, therefore, that this conviction should be set aside.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

Mines—Wages—Payment by weight of minerals—Agreement—Standard weight system—Improper filling—Checkweigher—Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict. cap. 58), secs. 12 and 13.—By section 12 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, “where the amount of wages paid to any of the persons employed in a mine depends on the amount of mineral gotten by them, those persons shall be paid according to the actual weight gotten by them of the mineral contracted to be gotten . . . provided that nothing in this section shall preclude the owner, agent, or manager of the mine from

Sec. 13, subsec. (1) provides for the appointment of a checkweigher "in order that he may on behalf of the persons by whom he is so stationed, take a correct account of the weight of the mineral or determine correctly the deduction as the case may be."

Subsection 2 imposed a penalty upon the owner or manager of the mine in the event of his refusing proper facilities to the checkweigher appointed by the miners to ascertain the true weight of the coal sent up.

A coalowner entered into an agreement with his miners that the "standard weight system" should be adopted in the mine, and that no payment should be made for the excess weight in any hutch beyond 10 cwt., and the practice was when a hutch was found to contain more than 10 cwt. to carry the weighing of it no further.

The manager was served with a complaint, which, proceeding upon the footing that this standard system was illegal, charged him with having contravened section 12 of the Act by having failed on the days libelled to truly weigh certain hutches and to pay the miners who loaded them according to the actual weight of the coal in the hutches (which was in excess of the maximum 10 cwt.). The complaint further charged him with a contravention of section 13, in so far as he "by failing to weigh the actual weight of coal contained" in certain hutches, did prevent the checkweigher "from taking a correct account of the coal contained therein."

The accused was convicted of both offences.

In an appeal, held that the conviction of the first offence was bad, in respect that the agreement for deductions was valid, overfilling being one mode of "improper filling" in the sense of sec. 12, and that the failure to weigh or pay for the contents of the hutches beyond the maximum of 10 cwts. was not a contravention of section 12, and that the conviction of the second offence was bad, the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Wellwood holding that the checkweigher's duty to see that the agreement as to deductions was properly carried out did not require him to ascertain the exact weight of hutches weighing over 10 cwt., Lord Adam holding that the second charge was not relevant, as the accused was not bound to weigh the coal in the hutches, but the whole mineral therein.

On 2d March 1894 James Hastie, agent or manager of the Fairhill Colliery, Hamilton, was charged in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at the instance of James Boland Atkinson, Her Majesty's Inspector of Mines for the Eastern District of Scotland, upon a complaint which set forth that he having been agent or manager of the coal-mine known as Fairhill Colliery, Hamilton, "did, as agent or manager foresaid, (1) on 27th December 1893, at the pithead . . . fail to weigh truly the hutches of coal after mentioned, and thereafter on or about 13th January 1894, at the pay office at said colliery, fail to pay the said Thomas Chalmers, Robert Syme, William Halliday, and Buchan Littlejohn, according to the actual weight of coal, being the mineral contracted to be gotten by them, in said hutches, in so far as (a) each of the said Thomas Chalmers and Robert Syme having on said 27th December 1893, in said mine, filled and despatched to the said pithead of No. 2 pit of said colliery a hutch, which on being put on the weighing-machine there was ascertained to contain more than 10 cwts., the said James Hastie did fail to weigh the actual weight of coal contained in said hutches, and did on said 13th January 1894 pay each of the said Thomas Chalmers and Robert Syme for only 10 cwts., whereby each of them suffered a loss in wages to the complainer unknown, but not exceeding 2d., or thereby; (b) . . . (c) the said Buchan Littlejohn having on said 27th December 1893 filled and despatched to the pithead a hutch containing 10½ cwts. of coal, the said James Hastie did on said 13th January 1894 fail to pay the said Buchan Littlejohn according to the actual weight of 10 $\frac{1}{4}$ cwts. of coal contained in said hutch, and did only pay him for 10 cwts., whereby he suffered a loss in wages to the amount of 1 $\frac{1}{4}$ d., or thereby."

The charge under the 13th section of the Act was that "on 27th December 1893 at said No. 2 pithead," the accused "as agent or manager foresaid, did fail to afford to David Gilmour, 142 Low Waters, Hamilton, the checkweigher duly appointed and stationed at said No. 2 pithead on behalf of the persons employed in said mine, facilities for enabling him to fulfil his duties as set forth in section 13 (1) of the said Act, 50 and 51 Victoria, chapter 58, in so far as he, the said James Hastie, by failing to weigh the actual weight of coal contained in the hutches of the said Thomas Chalmers and Robert Syme as above libelled, did prevent the said David Gilmour from taking a correct account of the weight of the coal contained therein."

The accused pleaded not guilty, and evidence was led, which was recorded.

The following facts were established :—At the pit in question it was the practice to ascertain the true weight in all hutches not exceeding 10 cwt. and to pay according to the actual weight, but if the weight in a hutch exceeded 10 cwt., payment was only made on 10 cwt. It was thus unnecessary to ascertain the true weight in hutches beyond 10 cwt., and in practice this was not done. This system of a maximum load beyond which no weight was ascertained or paid for was known as the standard weight system, and had been adopted by the miners named in the complaint. It was admitted that in the present case, as soon as it was ascertained that the weight in the hutches exceeded 10 cwt., the actual weight was not ascertained, and payment was only made on the 10 cwt. It was not the practice at the mine to make any deduction in respect of stones and dirt in the hutches, and none was made from the hutches in question. It was also admitted that no opportunity had been given to the checkweigher appointed by the men to ascertain the true weight of the hutches. The evidence which the Court held negatived the view that the standard weight of 10 cwt. was too high is referred to by Lord Wellwood.

The Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) convicted the accused, who thereupon appealed under section 67 of the Act of 1887 to the High Court.

The reasons of appeal were, inter alia;—“(1) Because the complaint was irrelevant. (2) Because a valid agreement was made between masters and men in No. 2 pit, Fairhill, for deduction in respect of hutches improperly filled.”

The arguments¹ appear from the opinions of the Judges.

At advising,—

LORD WELLWOOD.—This case also turns upon the construction of section 12, subsection (1), of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887. But the question is not the same.

Under the proviso in section 12 (1) it is competent for mine-owners and miners to agree upon deductions not merely in respect of stones and dirt, but also in respect of “hutches being improperly filled.”

There is no definition in the statute as to what is meant by “improper filling,” but it is sufficient to say that the complainer himself admits—“I think a hutch is improperly filled if it contains too little or too much, or where two different minerals are filled together.”

Now, what was done at the appellant's colliery was that the owners and the men agreed that 10 cwt. of stuff should be the standard contents of a hutch, because in their opinion it was inconvenient and dangerous to put on a greater load. Accordingly, while the contents of all hutches under 10 cwt. were accurately weighed at the pit-head, when it was ascertained that a hutch contained more than 10 cwt. the weighing was not carried further, and the miner was paid on a weight of 10 cwt. But then they were paid on the footing of the 10 cwt. being coal, and no deduction was made in respect of stones or dirt. I see nothing in the evidence or the decisions to lead me, far less to compel me, to hold that overfilling is not improper filling. If it is improper filling, the statute authorises masters and men to agree as to a deduction in respect thereof, and they are the judges of the amount of the deduction and also—what is involved—of what constitutes overfilling. Our opinion is asked whether to deduct or disallow payment for anything beyond 10 cwt. is a proper deduction or not. I doubt whether it is our province to decide that matter. But if it is, I am of opinion that the deduction is both reasonable and valid. To load even 10 cwt. the stuff must be piled up to a height of 10 or 11 inches above the lip of the hutch, and it is plain that a hutch cannot with convenience or safety hold a much greater heap.

As to whether loading beyond 10 cwt. is dangerous or not, I confess I prefer to accept the views of those most interested, viz., the owners of the pit and the miners who worked in it, and I am not disposed to attach much importance to the theoretical views of the witnesses who apparently have, rather unwillingly, supported this prosecution. As in the last case, the complaint seems to have emanated from the checkweigher, the witness Gilmour, a miners' agent whom the complainer held, I think erroneously, to represent the men. Now, I think it is sufficient in this matter to quote the following passage in the cross-examination of the complainer,—“I have known the standard system since I came to Scotland. I know about twelve collieries that use it. To my personal knowledge no individual miner has complained. I had earlier complaints in this district against the standard system. I assumed Mr Gilmour represented the men. I have heard that the men asked for the restoration of the system. I disapprove of fixing a standard for loading hutches in this particular way, but not in a general way. I think the maximum amount in the hutches at Fairhill should be about 12 cwt. There is a certain amount of danger in overloading hutches, both to life and property. To fix 10 cwt. errs on the side of safety. It was explained that safety was the object of the standard. The only other reason I can suggest is that the master gets a little overweight, but I do not suggest that in this case. It is a very good way to let the miner know that if he goes beyond a certain quantity he will lose for it. I would disapprove of paying a man for doing a dangerous thing. If the man knew how much over 10 cwt. he sent up he might remember and restrict the quantity in future. To reach 10 cwt. you need to go considerably beyond the top of the hutch. At a certain height there is danger, but that depends a great deal on the class of coal.” He says further,—“Over 12 inches, unless carefully filled, some coal might fall down the shaft, not if filled square. That requires care. I would leave it to the management to decide what is safe for a hutch to hold. When 10 cwt. is in the hutch filled square, it will be 5 or 6 inches above the lip. The average man might fill it 6 to 12 inches high. My own maximum would be much more than 10 cwt. (Q.) Would it not be unsafe then to fill more? (A.) I do

No. 19. not think so. A hutch might contain far more than 10 cwt., and squarely filled be only 12 inches high. In fixing the standard of safety I would take the best filled, not the average.”
 July 13, 1894.
 Atkinson v.
 Hastie.

In the face of those admissions alone—it being admitted that it is a matter of opinion and degree what constitutes overfilling—how can it be said that it is proved that there was no overfilling, and that this deduction is so excessive as not to be a deduction authorised by the statute?

As to the owners making any profit out of the system, I can only say that if there is any truth in the evidence in the other case to the effect that the deduction of $\frac{1}{2}$ cwt. for stones and dirt per hutch is a fair deduction, the miners will in the long run distinctly benefit by this agreement. They can always avoid overloading a hutch, and if they do not overload they are sure of being paid for the whole of the stuff in the hutch as if it contained pure coal without any deduction for stones and dirt.

The only difficulty in the case arises from the fact that the appellants did not weigh the contents of the hutch beyond 10 cwt. This no doubt seems at first sight a failure to carry out the provisions of the statute; the appellants neither weigh the coal separately where the contents are above 10 cwt., nor do they ascertain the gross weight in those cases. But I do not think that it is sufficient to warrant a conviction, because the result would have been precisely the same if they had weighed the full contents of every hutch. The agreement being that in fixing the amount to be paid for, nothing should be allowed for the weight over 10 cwt., there was no need to ascertain the precise weight of the surplus, which probably seldom exceeded $\frac{1}{4}$ cwt. or $\frac{1}{2}$ cwt., and, I may observe in passing, was not all coal.

In the view which I take of the case it is unnecessary to refer to the English cases mentioned by the Sheriff, as I think they have no direct application to the questions which we have now to decide. With some of the observations made by the learned Judges I cannot say that I agree. But these were obiter dicta, and the points really decided in the cases, as to which I do agree, were entirely different from those in this and the other case before us.

I do not agree that the words “the mineral contracted to be gotten” in the first paragraph of section 12 (1) mean the gross contents of the hutch. They certainly do not bear that meaning in the proviso which follows, and they cannot on any reasonable construction bear a different meaning in the first paragraph of the clause.

I do not think, however, that there should be much dispute as to the practical effect of the clause. The leading object of the enactment is that where the miners’ wages depend upon the amount of the mineral contracted to be gotten, the mineral,—in the present case coal,—should be accurately weighed, and that in my opinion must be done if no arrangement is made as to deductions.

If there is an agreement as to deductions in respect of stones or dirt, I agree that as the purpose of the agreement is to avoid weighing the coal, the deduction must necessarily be made from the gross weight of the contents of the hutch, and for this purpose the gross contents of the hutch must be weighed.

Again, in the case of a deduction in respect of improper filling by overloading, the practical way to give effect to such deduction seems to be to disallow or deduct payment for all the stuff brought up beyond the recognised standard weight. In this view it is unnecessary (although to satisfy the precise words of the statute it might be prudent) to weigh the whole contents of the hutch No. 19.

even beyond the standard weight. The result would be precisely the same. July 13, 1894.

Lastly, if the owner of the colliery neither weighs the coal separately nor Atkinson v. Hastie.
arranges for a deduction, he will either subject himself to a penalty for not weighing, or possibly be held confessed as liable to pay on the gross weight.

These are the views which I venture to take of the application of this clause, and I do not think that in substance they much differ from the opinions expressed by the learned Judges in the English cases.

If the deduction is legal and properly made, it is not necessary to criticise the terms of the complaint. But it is to be observed that the complainer speaks of the gross weight of stuff in the hutches as being in every case coal.
Now, it is quite certain that that was not the case. If the charge had been that the appellants failed to weigh the contents of the hutch, or the amount of the coal contained in it, and failed to pay on the gross contents of the hutch or of the coal, the charge might have been relevant, although I think that on the evidence a conviction would not have been obtained on such a charge, because I think that practically there was no failure to weigh. But as the charge stands, the evidence does not square with it, or at least does not prove it, because it is not proved that the gross contents of the hutches were coal.

As to the charge under section 13 of not giving the checkweigher facilities —if the miners who appoint the checkweigher agree to certain deductions, the result of which agreement is to dispense in part with a checkweigher's duties in seeing the actual coal weighed, I cannot see what right he has to demand facilities which are inconsistent with the agreement of his constituents.
The statute contemplates this alternative. The checkweigher is to "take a correct account of the weight, or determine correctly the deductions, as the case may be," section 13 (1), and for these purposes he is to get facilities.

On the whole matter I think that this conviction also should be quashed.

LORD ADAM.—I concur in the result of Lord Wellwood's opinion, and have little to add.

The first question is, whether overloading is improper filling in the sense of the Act. That overloading may be dangerous is not doubtful, and if a hutch is filled so as to be dangerous, from the heaping up of the mineral therein, or otherwise, I cannot see that that hutch is properly filled—or otherwise than improperly filled. I see no ground for limiting improper filling to the case where an undue proportion of dross is sent up in the hutch.

Then, if overloading be improper filling, the parties are free to contract as to deductions being made in respect thereof, and such deductions may be determined in such special mode as may be agreed upon by the parties.

Now, it will be observed that the deductions agreed on, in the case of improper filling, may result in the miner not being paid for the actual amount of the mineral contracted to be gotten by him. That would be so, for example, in the case of a deduction made in respect of an undue proportion of dross in a hutch—which nobody says is not improper filling—for dross is coal, the mineral contracted to be gotten.

I see nothing illegal, therefore, in the parties agreeing that 10 cwt. should be taken to be a full and proper load for a hutch, and that any mineral in the hutch above that weight should be deducted.

I further agree with Lord Wellwood that there is nothing in the evidence improper filling, then master and man may agree as to what is to be deducted for improper filling. If it be held, as I think it must be, on the evidence, that overfilling may be improper filling, then I think that there may be an agreement by the master and men that if a hutch contains more than a certain weight such hutch is overfilled, and I see no ground for holding that master and men may not agree that what is over that weight shall be disallowed in respect of the overfilling. The power to them to agree on a "special" mode of ascertaining deduction seems to me to be sufficient to make this mode legal.

It is plain, I think, that deduction for overfilling must include a deduction of coal, for it is of the character of a fine to prevent an improper proceeding, and if agreement be made on that matter, it can only be applied in the case of a working producing pure coal, as workings often do, by a deduction of coal. Further, it would not be a fine unless it applied to coal. For being a fine in kind, it can only apply to what has value. It is a part of what is contracted to be gotten for the master by the miner that is to be deducted in computing what is due to the man for getting it. It is my opinion that the master and men may agree that such a deduction shall be the overplus over the agreed-on weight.

THE COURT quashed the conviction.

Complaint—Relevancy—Causing obstruction in a public street—Greenock Police Act, 1877 (40 and 41 Vict. cap. cxxiii.), sec. 179, subsec. 25.—The Greenock Police Act, 1877, sec. 179, subjects to a penalty every person who is guilty of any of "the following disorderly acts or omissions" in any public street, road, &c., "to the obstruction, annoyance, or danger of the residents or passengers," viz., inter alia, "(25) Every person who occasions any kind of obstruction, nuisance, or annoyance in any road, street, court, passage, close, entry, or common stair, or obstructs or incommodes, hinders, or prevents the free passage along or through the same, or prejudices or annoys in any manner whatsoever any other person using the same."

A summary complaint charging four persons with a contravention of the foregoing enactment set forth that the accused did on the afternoon of a day specified in a street named, and in front of or near the shop occupied by J. P., "which was then open for business purposes, wilfully occasion an obstruction and annoyance in the said street, by standing, loitering, and walking backwards and forwards therein, and by procuring" two men named "to stand, loiter, and walk backwards and forwards in the said street in the vicinity of the said shop or premises, and carrying boards with bills affixed to the same, and having printed thereon in conspicuous characters the words 'Don't shop on Wednesdays after 2 P.M., and support the half-holiday movement,' in consequence of which a crowd of persons was caused to assemble there, and an obstruction and annoyance was occasioned to the said" J. P. "in his business as a grocer, and to others of the lieges using the said street, and whereby the free passage of persons and vehicles along the same was hindered; all to the obstruction, annoyance, or danger of the residents or passengers in said street."

In a suspension by one of the accused, who had been convicted, held that the complaint was relevant.

Opinion (per Lord Young and Lord Trayner) that the offence charged would have warranted an indictment at common law.

ON 29th May 1894 John M'Giveran, tailor in Greenock, was, along with three other persons, charged in the Police Court there upon a complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, setting forth that he and the other accused "did, between the hours of four and six o'clock of the afternoon of the 16th day of May 1894, in Dalrymple Street in Greenock, and in front of or near to the shop or premises there occupied by John Paget, grocer, which was then open for business purposes, wilfully occasion an obstruction and annoyance in the said street, by standing, loitering, and walking backwards and forwards therein, and by procuring" two men named "to stand, loiter, and walk backwards and forwards in the said street in the vicinity of the said shop or premises, and carrying boards with bills affixed to the same, and having printed thereon in conspicuous characters the words 'Don't shop on Wednesdays after two P.M., and support the half-holiday movement,' in consequence of which a crowd of persons was caused to assemble there, and an obstruction and annoyance was occasioned to the said John Paget in his business as a grocer, and to others of the lieges using the said street, and whereby the free passage of persons and vehicles along the same was hindered; all to the obstruction, annoyance, or danger of the residents or passengers in said street, and in contravention of the 25th subsection of the 179th section of the Greenock Police Act, 1877." *

The accused objected to the relevancy of the complaint, but the magistrate repelled the objection, and after hearing evidence convicted M'Giveran "of the offence charged, being to the obstruction and annoyance of the residents and passengers in Dalrymple Street in Greenock" (the words

July 20, 1894.
M'Giveran v.
Auld.

M'Giveran presented a bill of suspension on the grounds—

(1) That the complaint was irrelevant in respect that under the statute libelled it "is not an offence for any person or small number of persons to walk up and down any street or any particular part of a street, or to employ or instruct a small number of persons carrying bills or posters of an innocent description to perambulate the streets in an orderly way. These acts are within the ordinary legal uses of the streets by the community. . . . Being in themselves perfectly innocent and lawful acts, they are not relevantly charged as an offence by being described as 'to the obstruction, annoyance, or danger' of passengers. The mere walking or standing in a street of one or even of three persons cannot obstruct, annoy, or endanger any person." The concluding portion of the complaint "ascribes no further acts to the complainer or the sandwich men, but attributes certain extravagant consequences to their innocent movements." It is "the crowd, not the complainer and sandwich men, that are described as having caused the alleged obstruction and annoyance; and unless the complainer, by conduct not alleged to have been disorderly, is rendered responsible for the assembling of a crowd, not alleged to have been disorderly, . . . no statutory offence can have been committed by him."

(2) That incompetent evidence had been admitted in respect that Paget, the shopkeeper mentioned in the complaint, had been allowed to depone to a conversation by telephone which he had on the morning of the day libelled with a person whom, from the voice, he supposed to be the complainer, in the course of which the person said "that he would make it very obnoxious for him" (Paget) "if he kept his shop open."

(3) That incompetent evidence had also been admitted in respect that a lieutenant of police had been allowed to give evidence to the following effect:—That he was in Court on 17th May 1894, when the two sandwichmen were put on trial, and that at that trial the complainer, as a witness for the defence, had deposed on oath, after being cautioned by the presiding magistrate, that the sandwichmen had on the occasion in question acted under his instructions. The objection to this evidence was that evidence given at a former trial could be proved only by a written official record.

(4) That at the trial a coloured printed leaflet beginning "Shopkeepers' Half Holiday—Do not be too hasty," and setting forth that "a certain shopkeeper" kept his shop open on Wednesday afternoons, was produced by the procurator-fiscal; that no evidence was led to connect the complainer with this leaflet; but that nevertheless the magistrate had entered a reference to the leaflet under the head "List of Productions," the leaflet being described as "produced by the procurator-fiscal."

(5) That the conviction as it originally stood, without the marginal addition, was bad, as being a general conviction on an alternative charge; that the marginal addition was made after the complainer had paid the fine and left the bar, and that, being so made, it vitiated the whole conviction; that even if competently made the addition was meaningless, seeing that it merely amounted to a statement that the offence charged was to the annoyance of the residents and passengers; and that even if the addition was intelligible, the conviction was still open to objection, as being a conviction of two of the three alternative offences of an alternative charge.

M'Giveran v.
Auld.

Counsel for the complainer having been heard,¹ and counsel for the respondent not having been called on,

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The first objection taken by the complainer is to the relevancy of the complaint, which is brought under the 179th section of the Greenock Police Act, 1877. In regard to this objection I am of opinion that the charge is relevant, because undoubtedly the things described as having been done,—the standing, loitering, &c.—might constitute an obstruction to the danger and annoyance of persons using the street. In certain circumstances they might cause no obstruction, but if stated to have been done wilfully and with the purpose of obstruction, and to have actually caused obstruction, then in my opinion there is enough in the charge to entitle the magistrates to proceed.

The next objection is that at the trial evidence was incompetently admitted to the effect that the accused had been heard to speak in a threatening manner to Mr Paget through a telephone. This evidence is in my opinion perfectly competent. There is no rule of the law of Scotland making it incompetent to lead evidence of statements made by a particular person through a telephone. Such evidence may be subjected to any amount of cross-examination, and its reliability as a means of identification of a particular voice, and through the voice of a particular individual, may very well be the subject of argument to the Court before which the evidence is led. The evidence is practically the same as that given by a person outside a house who identifies a person inside by his voice, and such evidence has never been held incompetent.

Another objection taken to the conviction is that at the trial a police-officer was allowed to give evidence as to what the complainer had said on oath as a witness in a previous trial in connection with the same occurrences. The ground of this objection is that such evidence cannot be referred to unless a written record of it is kept. I think this is a contention for which there is no authority. On the contrary, it is perfectly common both in civil and criminal cases to bring parole evidence of what has been said in another case. Even where notes of the evidence are taken by the Judge, it is still admissible to prove by parole that statements not appearing in the record of the evidence have been made by the witnesses. In regard to criminal charges it seems an extravagant contention that the evidence of a particeps criminis cannot be used against him unless it be taken down in writing.

The next objection is that a certain "coloured leaflet" referred to in the proceedings was improperly included by the magistrate in the "list of productions," and referred to as having been "produced by the procurator-fiscal." It was contended that this leaflet had never been proved to have any connection with the charge against the complainer, and that it ought therefore not to have been included as an article in evidence. I am at a loss to see how the complainer was prejudiced by its inclusion, and how it could possibly be made a ground for quashing the conviction. Under the Summary Procedure Act every article used in the proof must be referred to in the record of the proceedings, and in my opinion the magistrate was only conforming with this rule in the reference to the leaflet. It may be that the term "list of productions" is not an appropriate one. In criminal trials the term is used of the productions to be used in evidence, as to which notice must be given to the accused. But in summary prosecutions any articles may be produced by the prosecutor and used in evidence without notice, and it would probably be more correct to refer to such productions as "articles referred to in the evidence."

No. 20.

July 20, 1894.
M'Giveran v. Auld.

The next objection is that after the complainer had paid the fine imposed by the magistrate and left the bar, the magistrate added or caused to be added to the sentence the marginal addition set forth in the bill of suspension. Now, a Judge is entitled to make an alteration in the wording of the sentence to secure greater clearness or accuracy if there is no substantial alteration of the conviction and sentence. The complainer maintains that in this case the addition has the effect of making the sentence ungrammatical and unintelligible, but I cannot accept this view, or hold that the addition was such as to vitiate the proceedings.

The complainers' last objection is that the conviction is a general conviction of alternative offences. He contends that the conviction ought to have set forth whether the acts found proved were to the obstruction or to the annoyance, or to the danger of the public, these being three distinct alternatives. I do not think so. In my opinion these words only indicate various ways in which the statutory offence may be committed, and the conviction as it stands is perfectly valid. It was open to the magistrate to hold that the act in question was to the obstruction, annoyance, and danger of the residents and passengers in the street, or was merely to any one or two of these.

On the whole case I would therefore move your Lordships to dismiss the bill.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that all the grounds of objection to the conviction are bad. I scarcely think that any of them are reasonably stateable.

I should like to say, however, that the accused may, in my opinion, consider himself very fortunate in the prosecution having decided to bring him to trial under the 179th section of the Greenock Police Act, and not at common law. It was not suggested, and I do not suggest, that that clause of the Police Act does not comprehend this case, but I do not think that a case of this aggravated character is contemplated in a provision in which the penalty is limited to a fine of £1 or seven days' imprisonment. It is impossible to read the clause without seeing that it contemplates obstruction of a very much less aggravated character than that which appears from the complaint to have been committed here. The clause applies to such obstructions as might be caused by the laying down of a box, or a bundle at a shop door, or in a court, entry, close, or common stair, innocently enough done, but thoughtlessly, considering the interests of other people, and a very sufficient punishment for that might be a fine within the limits of £1 or imprisonment within the limits of seven days. But the gravity of this case consists in this, that there was an obstruction of the street of a serious character, wilfully and purposely got up in a particular locality for a most indefensible and illegal purpose, and for this, if it had been tried at common law, and the accused convicted, I should have expected a sentence of a lengthened imprisonment with hard labour. It appears from the complaint that there was a division of opinion in Greenock among shopkeepers as to whether it was expedient upon the whole, in their own interest, and in the public interest, that there should be

WILLIAM ALEXANDER BOYES (Burgh Prosecutor, Perth), Respondent.—Dewar.July 20, 1894.

Public-House—Search warrant—Magistrate who is licence holder—Statute—Construction—Home Drummond Act, 1828 (9 Geo. IV. cap. 58)—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 35), secs. 20 and 36.—The Home Drummond Act, sec. 13, enacts that “no Justice of the Peace or magistrate in any county or royal burgh who is a brewer, maltster, distiller, or dealer in . . . exciseable liquors . . . shall act as such Justice of the Peace or magistrate respectively in the execution of this Act . . . and everything done by a Justice of the Peace or magistrate respectively in any case in which he is so disqualified to act shall be null and void.”

The Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 20, empowers Justices of the Peace and magistrates of burghs to grant warrants to the police to search for exciseable liquors on any premises within the county or burgh in which there is reasonable ground for believing that such liquors are being trafficked in without a licence, and impose a penalty upon the person occupying or using the premises where such liquor shall be found for the purposes of traffic.

The same Act, sec. 36, enacts that “the provisions and enactments contained in the recited Acts [including the Home Drummond Act] so far as not repealed, shall extend and be construed, deemed, and taken to extend to and form part of this Act, in the same manner and as fully and to all intents and purposes as if the said provisions and enactments were herein repeated and set forth at length.”

Held that section 13 of the Home Drummond Act was not incorporated with the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, except with reference to matters falling within the scope of the Home Drummond Act, and consequently, as the granting of search warrants was not a matter which fell within the scope of that Act, that a magistrate, although a licence holder, might competently grant a search warrant.

On 16th June 1894 Giovanni Costadasi, ice-cream manufacturer, Kirk-gate, Perth, was charged in the Police Court, Perth, with having committed a contravention of section 20 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862. Before pleading to the charge the accused objected to the legality of the search warrant on which the complaint proceeded, in respect that (as was the fact) the magistrate who granted it was a licence holder. The objection was repelled. The accused then pleaded not guilty, but was convicted and fined £2, with the alternative of fourteen days' imprisonment. He obtained a case, which set forth the foregoing facts and the following question of law:—“Whether the search warrant in question was legal?” The statutory provisions upon which the question depended are sufficiently set forth in the rubric.

HIGH COURT.
Lord Justice-
Clerk.
Lord Young.
Lord Trayner.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The appellant here raises the objection that the search warrant, which formed the preliminary step in these proceedings, was granted by a magistrate who was a licence holder, and it is, therefore, argued that the warrant itself is illegal, and that the whole proceedings which have followed on it must fall, because by the Home Drummond Act no licensed person is allowed to act as a magistrate under that Act. Now, the Home Drummond Act deals with two things, namely, the granting of licences and the punishment of persons holding licences for any breach of certificate. Neither of these has any application to the granting of search warrants in the case of persons who are suspected of keeping exciseable liquor for sale, without having a licence. That is a matter provided for by the Public-Houses Amendment Act of 1862. No doubt the Home Drummond Act is incorporated into the Act of 1862 by

No. 21. the 36th section of that Act, but I do not think that that incorporation extends beyond the purposes of the Home Drummond Act itself. I think that if it was intended that the prohibitions of the Home Drummond Act as to the magistrates who were to administer that Act should apply to the granting of search warrants, that would require to be stated. I cannot hold that it was illegal for this magistrate to sign the search warrant.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Rent of lands to “form part of” annuity—Additional or in security merely.—A testator by his trust-disposition and settlement directed his trustees to pay an annuity of £500 to his widow, with power to her to bequeath the amount of the annuity to any one or more of the children she might choose, and failing her exercising this power, the sum retained to meet the annuity was to be divided among the children equally. The estate beyond what was retained to meet the annuity was to be realised and divided among the children equally. By holograph codicil the testator directed that the free rental of certain heritage should “form part of the annuity bequeathed to my wife during her life . . . after the death of my wife the free rental to be divided equally among my children.”

In a special case the widow maintained that she was entitled to the free rental of the heritage in addition to the annuity already bequeathed.

Held that the rental of the heritage was not intended to be given in addition to the £500 annuity already bequeathed, but merely that the heritage was to be part of the estate retained to meet the annuity.

JAMES CHIVAS, wine-merchant in Aberdeen, died on 8th July 1886, 2D DIVISION. survived by his widow, and by two sons and two daughters.

By his trust-disposition and settlement, dated 9th March 1881, Mr Chivas directed his trustees in the third place “to pay to my said spouse, free of all deductions, an annuity of £500 sterling . . . with power to my said spouse to bequeath the amount of said annuity to any one or more of our children as she may think fit: In the fourth place, I appoint my said trustees to allow my said spouse to occupy, until the final division of my estate after mentioned, free from rent and feu-duty, my said dwelling-house in King Street, and my said dwelling-house at Thornhill, . . . In the fifth place, I appoint my said trustees to convey and make over my business . . . to my said two sons, Alexander and James, in equal shares, . . . the value of the stock and debts to be ascertained by the valuation of competent persons, and the sum fixed by them to be paid by my said sons to my said trustees in five yearly payments, commencing the first payment thereof one year after the date of

In the eighth place, as it is my wish that the house and land at Thornhill should, if possible, remain with my family, I authorise my said trustees, at any time prior to the final division of my estate after mentioned, in the event of either or both of my said sons wishing to purchase the same, to convey the same to him or them at a fair value, subject to the right of occupancy of the dwelling-house in favour of my said spouse above mentioned: . . . In the tenth place, I appoint my said trustees, as soon as conveniently may be after payment of the fifth and last yearly instalment payable by my sons as aforesaid, and after retaining what is sufficient to provide for the said annuity to my spouse, and a further sum of £75 sterling to be paid to her yearly during her life in lieu of her right of occupancy of said dwelling-houses . . . to pay and divide the whole of my remaining heritable and moveable estate equally among my said four children: . . . Declaring that, on the death of my said spouse, the amount retained to provide for said sum of £75 yearly to her, and also the amount retained to provide for said annuity of £500 to her, in the event of her not having exercised her power of bequeathing the same above mentioned, shall be divided among my said four children equally in the manner above pointed out in regard to the remainder of my estate."

Chivas' Trustees v. Chivas.

Mr Chivas also left three holograph codicils, in the form of letters addressed to his trustees, by the last of which, dated 16th April 1885, he directed, inter alia, as follows:—"In case it may please God to call me away before I have an opportunity of making the following alterations on my will or settlement, I desire my trustees as follows:—First, That the free rental of Thornhill lands form part of the annuity bequeathed to my wife during her life. Second, That the houses and grounds of Thornhill be kept in my family during their lives and in equal shares Seventh, After the death of my wife, the free rental of Thornhill, after all expenses are paid, to be divided equally amongst my four children; and, when any of my family dies, then their children (if any) to succeed to their share."

On 29th May 1893 a special case was presented by Mr Chivas' trustees as first parties, his widow as second party, and his children, or their representatives as third and fourth parties, for the determination of various questions arising on the construction of his testamentary writings, including:—"1. Is the testator's widow entitled, under the deed of settlement and third codicil, to the liferent of Thornhill House, offices, grounds, and agricultural lands, or to any, and which part thereof, over and above the annuity of £500, and the yearly payment of £75?"

The case stated that the testator's business was taken over by his eldest son alone, as at the date of his father's death, 8th July 1886, and consequently that the period for payment of the last instalment of the price of the business, and the date of the "final division" of the estate in the sense of the settlement was 8th July 1891; that Mrs Chivas occupied Thornhill House, grounds, &c., for the first four years after her husband's death, and that since then it had been let at a rent of £200 per annum, the rent being paid to her; and that the agricultural lands of Thornhill had since the testator's death been let to a neighbouring farmer at a rent of £64 yearly.

Argued for the second party;—The second party was entitled to the rent of Thornhill House, grounds, and lands, in addition to the annuity of £500 and the annual payment of £75. The natural meaning of the language of the codicil led to that result. The codicil assumed an annuity of definite amount already bequeathed, and to say that the rental should "form part of" that annuity meant that the rental was additional. Further, the capital retained to meet the annuity under the trust-disposition was to go to the children on the death of their mother, subject to her power of apportionment, while it was the "rental" of Thornhill which under the codicil was to go to the children when their mother died, and there was no power of apportionment. That difference shewed that the rental of Thornhill was additional to the original annuity.¹

Argued for the third and fourth parties;—The testator's obvious intention was to keep Thornhill in his family, and to that end he directed that the rental should form part of his widow's annuity. But it was not to be supposed that he thereby intended to increase the annuity to so considerable an extent. The natural meaning of the first clause of the codicil and the reasonable intention were that the rental was pro tanto in substitution of the original annuity. Thereby a larger part of the estate became divisible at "the period of final division." At all events only the rental of Thornhill agricultural lands was additional; if the rental of the house was also additional the widow would be in effect paid twice, the £75 annual payment being given in lieu of the house. [LORD YOUNG referred to Jarman on Wills, 5th edit. vol. i. p. 499.]

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I am unable to read the clause in the codicil which directs that the free rental of Thornhill lands should form part of the annuity bequeathed to the testator's widow as giving her a new legacy of the rents of Thornhill lands. That result can only be reached by implication, and I see no reason for such an implication. I think that the clause means this only, that the trustees are to apply the rents of Thornhill lands, so far as they may go, to payment of the annuity, and in this way to relieve the moveable estate to that extent of the burden of paying the annuity, so that only so much of the moveable estate is to be retained as will be sufficient to meet the balance of the annuity. Therefore I propose to answer the first question in the negative.

LORD YOUNG.—I may say that I am generally of the same opinion. I cannot say, however, that the decision of the first question is to my mind altogether free from difficulty. That question is, whether the widow, Mrs Chivas, is entitled, under her husband's settlement and codicil, to the liferent of Thornhill House, grounds, and lands, in addition to an annuity of £500 and a yearly payment of £75. She is certainly not entitled to any such liferent under the original settlement, for by that she gets only an annuity of £500 and a yearly payment of £75. But it was contended—and I cannot say without plausible grounds for the contention—that she became so entitled under the codicil. This codicil, which is dated 16th April 1885, is really a letter addressed by the testator to his trustees, by which he directs them to give effect to certain alterations on his original settlement, in case he should not find an opportunity of giving a more formal expression to his intentions with the aid of a practised conveyancer. I think that any document of this kind should be read liberally and with a desire to carry out what was the intention of the testator.

Now it is clear that when the testator wrote this codicil he intended his widow to have an annuity of £500, and that his trustees should retain enough of his estates to pay this annuity, and, so intending, he in the codicil directs that "the free rental of Thornhill lands form part of the annuity bequeathed to my wife during her life." Now there are difficulties in the way of holding that

No. 1. this means merely that he intended Thornhill lands to be part of the estate which the trustees are to retain to meet the annuity, and therefore, as I have said, there is plausibility in the contention that he intended his widow's annuity to be increased by the rental of Thornhill. This view receives some confirmation from the seventh clause of the codicil, in which he directs that after the death of his widow the rental of Thornhill is to be paid to his children; because, when a testator directs an estate or fund to be disposed of after the death of anyone, but says nothing as to what is to be done with the rent or income accruing from the estate or fund in the meantime, there is authority for saying that a gift of the rent or income in favour of the person named is to be implied. But after the best consideration I have been able to give to the matter, I have come to the conclusion that it would be unsafe to read the codicil as giving the rental of Thornhill to the widow in addition to the annuity already provided to her. That would really be to read the codicil as if the words "shall be in addition to" were substituted for the words "form part of" the annuity, and on the whole I am unable so to read the codicil. Then with respect to the argument that the seventh clause is to be construed as containing an implied gift of the liferent of Thornhill in favour of the widow, the implication would, I think, have been very strong if that clause had stood alone; but taken along with the earlier clauses, I think that we can see the reason for delaying payment to the children until the death of the widow. I think that the testator's intention was that as regards part of the annuity which he had already given to his widow, she should be in the position of a landed proprietor. I therefore agree with your Lordship in thinking that the first question should be answered in the negative.

Cowan. D. Dundas.

Husband and Wife—Separate estate—Donation—Deposit-receipt—Bankruptcy—Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. cap. 21), sec. 1, subsecs. 3 and 4.—A married woman claimed, as against the trustee in her husband's sequestration, £70 of the contents of two deposit-receipts for £305 and £145 respectively, which bore that the contents had been received from the spouses, and were payable to either or the survivor. She averred that she was possessed of £70 at her marriage, that she had after her marriage placed it on the deposit-receipts, and that the remaining contents of the deposit-receipts were donations to her by her husband. Held that, assuming that she had placed £70 of her own property on the deposit-receipts, her statement shewed that it had not been kept separate from her husband's estates, and consequently that she was not entitled to a proof.

THE estates of John Cowan, sometime cashier and book-keeper, Calder Iron Works, Coatbridge, were sequestrated on 11th October 1892, and David W. Kidston, C.A., Glasgow, was appointed trustee. No. 2.

On 28th November 1892 Mrs Betsy Lawrie or Cowan, wife of the said John Cowan, and Cowan as her administrator-in-law, raised an action of multiplepoinding in name of the National Bank of Scotland, Limited, as nominal raisers, for the determination of the right to the contents of two deposit-receipts, dated respectively 14th September and 12th October 1891, and for £305, 10s. and £145 respectively, with interest, which had been taken from the pursuers' Fauldhouse branch, and were in these terms,—“Received from John and Betsy Cowan, Calder, Coatbridge, payable to either or the survivor,” &c. Lord Low.

Mrs Cowan lodged a condescendence and claim, in which she stated that she and her husband were married on 1st August 1887; that at the date of her marriage she had £70 at her credit on deposit-receipt with the pursuers' Fauldhouse branch; that it so remained deposited until 20th February 1888, when it was uplifted, and lodged by her on deposit-receipt in the joint names of herself and her husband in the Coatbridge branch; and that on 4th November 1889 it was uplifted and redeposited by her in the pursuers' branch at Fauldhouse. “A deposit-receipt was then taken by her in the name of the claimant and of her husband, and made payable to either or survivor. Said sum was uplifted by the claimant from the said bank on 13th October and 29th December 1890, and on 14th April, 7th August, 14th September, and 12th October 1891, and redeposited by her on each of those dates along with other moneys given to her by her husband, receipts therefor being taken by her in the names of the claimant and her husband, payable to either or survivor, the receipts being retained by the claimant. Said deposit-receipts were taken in her husband's name as well as her own animo donandi. . . . Said sum of £70 being part of the claimant's separate estate, and not having been immixed with her husband's estate, has not been attached by said . . . sequestration.”

She therefore claimed “to be ranked and preferred to the said sum of £70, with interest at bank deposit rates since the date of deposit.”

The claimant pleaded;—(1) The said sum of £70 being part of the claimant's separate estate, she ought to be found entitled to payment thereof, and to be ranked and preferred in terms of her claim.

Cowan's trustee claimed the whole contents of the deposit-receipts, averring that they belonged to Cowan, and were deposited by him in the bank, and formed part of his estates at the date of his sequestration.

On 31st May 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) sustained the claim for the trustee.

Mrs Cowan reclaimed, and argued;—The claimant desired to prove that she had £70 at the date of her marriage, that it formed part of the contents of the deposit-receipts in question, and that her husband had made a donation to her of the remaining contents. These facts being established, she was entitled to prevail under the Married Women's Property Act, 1881.* She claimed £70 only of the contents of the deposit-receipts, because, although she averred that her husband had made a donation to her of the remaining money in the receipts, she admitted that the donation had been revoked by his sequestration. But none the less was it a good donation while it lasted, and consequently the £70 had been mixed, not with her husband's property, but with her own. Possession under a deposit-receipt in the wife's name was sufficient possession to exclude the husband.¹

Argued for the trustee;—Whatever might have been the result had the deposit-receipts been taken in the wife's name only, the destination here was fatal to the wife's claim, for the husband might have withdrawn the money from the bank at any time. It was hopeless therefore to maintain that this £70 had been kept separate from the husband's estate.²

LORD YOUNG.—I do not think that this case is attended with difficulty. My opinion coincides with that which the Lord Ordinary must have had when he pronounced this interlocutor, although we have not been favoured with any note or opinion expressive of his views.

I think that, irrespective of the Act of 1881, it is clear that the wife would have no case, so that her claim must be rested on that statute. She says that she had a sum of £70 at the time of her marriage, that during the marriage her husband gave her certain sums of money, and that she put all these sums—both the £70 and the gifts by her husband—in two deposit-receipts, one for £305 and the other for £145. She admits that any donations by her husband to herself would not interfere with the trustee in her husband's bankruptcy taking the property so gifted, and accordingly her only claim is to the £70 which she says she had at the date of the marriage. She proposes by proof to trace this £70, and to shew that it forms part of the £305 which is lodged on the one deposit-receipt and the £145 which is lodged on the other, and the question is whether such a proof is competent.

Now, undoubtedly this £70, which I will assume belonged to her at the time of her marriage, was mixed up with the other sums in the two deposit-receipts for £305 and £145. But then the statute, which alone gives any substance to the wife's claim, expressly excludes such a claim, unless the wife has kept her estate separate from and unmixed up with her husband's estate. Now, can it be said that the wife here has kept the property which she says she had at the date of the marriage unmixed up with her husband's estate, when she has put the money along with other money which admittedly passes to the husband's trustee on two deposit-receipts, which bear that the money was received from her and her husband, and to be payable to either or the survivor? The case is just the same as if she had lent £70, along with so much money of her husband's, on a bond which acknowledged that the money had been received from him and her, and took the borrower bound to repay to either spouse or to the husband, or immixed with his funds, shall be treated as assets of the husband's estate in bankruptcy, under reservation of the wife's claim to a dividend as a creditor for the value of such money or other estate after but not before the claims of the other creditors of the husband for valuable consideration in money or money's worth have been satisfied. . . ."

Caution—Act 1695, cap. 5—Septennial Limitation—Contract—Proof—Writ.—In an action against a cautioner in a personal bond for payment of a principal sum and interest thereon, raised upwards of seven years after the principal sum became due, the pursuers averred that before the lapse of the seven years they had intimated to the cautioner that they intended to call it up, and that thereupon the cautioner "made application for indulgence, and specially requested that the loan should be allowed to lie over until the children of his son [the principal debtor] were of age. He further informed the executors [pursuers] that if this indulgence were granted he would negotiate a further loan of £500 from the bank, and advance £400 to his son in order that he might make a fresh start in business. . . . Said loan was negotiated and said advance made, and the executors granted the indulgence craved and permitted the bond to lie over." The cautioner's grandchildren were not of age at the date of the action. Held that the cautionary obligation had been extinguished by the operation of the Act 1695, cap. 5, and that the pursuers had not relevantly averred a new and independent contract with the cautioner under which he would still be liable for the debt.

In February 1893 James M'Kerchar and Archibald M'Gregor, executors of the late Mrs C. M'Gregor, raised an action in the Court of Session against Mrs Catherine Anderson or Fernie and another, trustees and executors of the late James Anderson senior, Blairgowrie, concluding for payment of £155, 9s. 11d., being one-half of the principal sum and interest alleged to be due to them under a personal bond for £300 and interest.

The pursuers averred;—(Cond. 2) By personal bond, dated May 1882, James Anderson junior, hotel-keeper at Ben Lawers, and his wife granted to have borrowed from the executors of the deceased Mrs Catherine M'Gregor the sum of £300 sterling, which sum they, as principals, and the deceased James Anderson senior and the pursuer Archibald M'Gregor, as cautioners, bound and obliged themselves, conjunctly and severally, to pay to Mrs M'Gregor's executors, and that on the 31st day of December 1882, with interest at the rate of five per centum per annum during the not payment of the principal sum. (Cond. 3) During the year 1888 the said executors resolved to call up said bond, and intimated this resolution to the cautioners. On receipt of this intimation the said deceased James Anderson made application for indulgence, and specially requested that the loan should be allowed to lie over until the children of his said son were of age. He further informed the executors that if this indulgence were granted, he would negotiate a further loan of £500 from the bank, and advance £400 to his said son in order that he might make a fresh start in business, and so improve his financial position. Said loan was negotiated and said advance made, and the executors granted the indulgence craved, and permitted the bond to lie over. But for the intervention and actions of the said deceased James Anderson, the executors would have called up the bond in the year 1888.

They further averred that at the date of this action the amount due to them on the bond with interest was the sum sued for. With reference to the averments in cond. 3 it was admitted at the bar that the children of James Anderson junior were not yet of age at the date of the action.

The pursuers pleaded;—(3) Delay having been granted in consequence of the intervention and actings of the deceased James Anderson, as condescended on, defenders are barred from pleading the operation of the Statute 1695, c. 5.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No relevant case. (2) The obligation of the said deceased James Anderson senior under said bond having been extinguished by the operation of the Statute 1695, c. 5, the defenders should be assoilzied.

On 17th June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the Statute 1695, c. 5, applies to the obligation of the deceased James Anderson senior, as cautioner under the bond libelled: Before answer, and under reservation quoad ultra of all the pleas of parties, allows the pursuers a proof of their averments, and to the defenders a conjunct probation, and appoints the same to proceed on a day to be afterwards fixed; reserving expenses."*

* "OPINION.—This is an action by the creditors in a personal bond, dated 25th and 31st May 1882, against the representatives of a party who was bound by the bond expressly as a cautioner; and the question which has been debated is whether the cautionary obligation has been extinguished by operation of the Statute 1695, c. 5, through the lapse of seven years since the date of the bond.

"The pursuers maintained in argument (1) that the statute did not apply, because the bond covered interest as well as principal, and (2) that it did not apply to the obligation for the interest which fell due after the expiry of seven years from the date of the bond. There are no pleas in law for either contention, and I am of opinion that both are totally untenable. The pursuers quoted Morrison v. Henderson, March 9, 1892, 19 R. 581, in support of the second contention, but I am of opinion that it has no application. There the question was whether a cautioner, who was bound only for the interest and not for the principal due under a bond, was relieved by operation of the statute after the lapse of seven years from the date of the bond. There was much difference of opinion on the bench, but the majority in the Inner-House held that the cautioner was not relieved. The distinction between that case and the present is too obvious to require comment, and none of the reasons for the judgment apply. I do not think it necessary to say more on this point, which is not open to question, and I am therefore of opinion that the statute applies to the bond libelled. But the pursuers have pleaded (3) that the defenders are barred from pleading the statute, because of the delay granted in consequence of the intervention and actings of the cautioner. This is a plea of bar, not a plea that there has been any alteration on the conditions of the contract in the bond, or any contract other than the bond, and it raises a question of much greater difficulty. The averments on which the plea is based are contained in the third condescendence. It is there averred that, before the expiry of the seven years from the date of the bond, the creditors intimated to the cautioner their resolution to call it up; that the cautioner then 'made application for indulgence, and specially requested that the loan should be allowed to lie over until the children' of the debtor, who was his son, were of age, and he informed them that if this indulgence were granted, he would advance £400 to his son; that he made this advance;

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuers had stated no relevant case. The only averments of which proof had been allowed were that the creditors granted the indulgence, and permitted the bond to lie over; and that, but for this intervention of the cautioner, the creditors would have called up the bond. The question is whether these averments are relevant, and whether, if they were proved, the defenders' plea on the statute would be excluded. It is to be regretted that these averments are not made with more exactness, distinctness, and precision. The pursuers declined to amend them. But although they are extremely defective, I think they cannot be safely treated as wholly irrelevant.

"If it be true that, when the period of seven years was drawing to a close, the creditors were induced to delay to enforce payment by the solicitations of the cautioner, it seems, prima facie, unjust that the cautioner should escape under cover of the statute by reason of a delay which he himself solicited, and in that case that result will not be readily reached.

"It was maintained by the defenders, with much plausibility and force, that the provisions of the statute were peremptory, and that it absolutely extinguished the obligation of the cautioner at the expiry of the seven years; that no conduct of the cautioner could prevent the application of the statute or bar him from pleading it; that his obligation under the bond ceased vi statuti when the seven years were completed, and that he could not be liable for the sum in the bond, except by virtue of some separate or additional contract, of which, it was maintained, there was no relevant averment. Reference was made to the somewhat remarkable case of Carrick v. Carse, August 5, 1778, M. 2931, where a cautioner was held entitled to repayment of a debt which he had paid in ignorance of the statute on the day after the seven years had expired; and to the cases of Douglas, Heron, & Co. v. Riddick, March 1, 1793, M. 11,045, and 4 Paton's Appeals, 133; Scott v. Yuille, November 27, 1827, 6 S. 137, February 9, 1830, 8 S. 485, affirmed 5 W. & S., 436; and Stocks v. M'Lagan, July 11, 1890, 17 R. 1122.

"The pursuers, if I understood them rightly, rested an argument on the assumption that they had averred a new contract or change on the original contract, and they argued that they were entitled to prove such new contract or change of contract by parole evidence. But I am of opinion that there is no averment in condescendence 3 of any new contract or alteration of contract with the cautioner, and that it is unnecessary to consider whether such an averment could be proved by parole if it had been made. There is, besides, no plea in law bearing on any such ground of defence. I read the averments in condescendence 3 as directed only to support the plea in bar. And it is to be observed that if the pursuers mean to aver that they agreed to delay the enforcement of their claim until the children of their debtor were of age, the result would be that this action would have to be dismissed as altogether premature; but I do not think there is such an averment, and there is no plea by the defenders to the effect that the action is premature. But it appears to me that there is considerable authority to support the proposition that a cautioner may be barred by his actings from pleading the benefit of the statute. Professor Bell says expressly that the obligations of the cautioner will be extended beyond the seven years when there have been 'negotiations for answering the demand of the creditor, carried on with the cautioner, so as to bar him personal exceptione from pleading on the Act.' In support of that proposition, he quotes the case of Douglas, Heron & Co. v. Riddick, which he considers to have been decided on that ground. There seems some difficulty in affirming that a party can be debarred from pleading that the law is what it has been decided to be, or what has been enacted, and there is room for the contention that the case of Douglas, Heron & Co. was not decided on the ground of personal bar, but on the ground of a promise to pay expressed in a correspondence.

"The case of Carrick v. Carse does not seem an adverse authority. It raised nothing but a question of condictio indebiti, and some doubt seems thrown on it by Lord Eldon in Douglas, Heron & Co. The cases of Scott v. Yuille and those in cond. 3, and they were irrelevant to afford a good plea in bar against the defenders taking the benefit of the Statute 1695, c. 5. Under that statute the obligation of a cautioner was absolutely extinguished at the expiry of seven years, and he could only be made liable under the bond of caution if an entirely new and separate contract was averred. There was no relevant averment of such a new contract here. The only new contract set forth ex facie of cond. 3 was an undertaking that the loan should be allowed to lie over till Anderson junior's children were of age, and that event had not yet occurred. If, therefore, the pursuers averred that that was the contract, then the action was premature, and ought to be dismissed. There was no averment on record that the defenders had agreed not to take advantage of the statute, and even assuming that such an undertaking was relevantly stated, and could legitimately be entered into by a cautioner, it would require to be proved by writing, and such proof was not even averred in the present case.*

Argued for the pursuers ;—The statements in cond. 3 amounted to an averment that the defenders had renounced the benefit of the Septennial Limitation Act, and the pursuers had renounced their right of recovering from the cautioner for an indefinite period. It was competent to prove the defenders' waiver by parole.¹ It was quite competent for anyone to abandon his rights under a statute, and in the cases of Scott v. Yvulle (4 Pat. App. 133), and Stocks v. M'Lagan (17 R. 1122), it was recognised that a person could do so.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The bond of caution on which this action is brought is undoubtedly prescribed, and the legal consequence of that is that no action lies on it. It is said however by the pursuers that their averments in condescendence 3 entitle them to prevail ; but these averments do not in my opinion amount to anything like the representations which the House of Lords, in the case of Douglas, Heron & Co., v. Riddick, 4 Paton's App. 133, held to be necessary to enable the creditor in a cautionary obligation to get over the statute. If the averments here could be read as meaning that Mr Anderson on condition of time being granted to him undertook to pay the sum due under the bond after the statutory period had expired, that would have been a sufficient answer to the plea on the statute ; but when cond. 3 is scrutinised we find in it no statement to the effect that such a transaction was entered into ; all that is said is that Mr Anderson "specially requested that the loan should be allowed to lie over until the children of his son were of age," and, further, that he "informed the executors that if this indulgence were granted he would negotiate a further loan of £500 from the bank, and advance £400 to his said son in order that he might make a fresh start in business, and so improve his financial position. Said loan was negotiated and said advance made, and the executors granted the indulgence craved, and permitted the bond to lie over." Now, was there, as the result of this agreement, any legal obligation on Anderson to pay after the bond had expired? That is not apparent on the averments, and the case I think accordingly falls short of what according to the decision of the House of Lords in the case I have mentioned was necessary to elide the statute.

Stocks v. M'Lagan seem only to import that the actings there founded on did not give rise to any personal bar or import any new contract.

"Without expressing any more decided opinion at present, I have come to the conclusion that the case cannot be safely decided without inquiry into the averments made by the pursuers in their third condescendence. If the result of that inquiry shall be that it shall be held that nothing has happened which can prevent the application of the statute, then, of course, there can be no other question, and the defenders will be assoilzied ; but if it should appear that the defenders are barred from pleading the statute, then there may be other questions as to the extent of the defenders' liability, and I think that therefore a proof should be allowed in general terms before answer, and under reservation of the pleas of parties."

But further, even if the averments in cond. 3 had set out a relevant case, it could only, in my opinion, be proved by writing, and the pursuers are in the position of not having documents to sustain their contention. Accordingly on both grounds I am of opinion that the pursuers must fail.

LORD ADAM.—I concur. The pursuers seem to me to be in a dilemma, because their averment is that Mr Anderson "made application for indulgence," and requested that the loan should be allowed to lie over until the children of his son were of age, and agreed to do certain things if that indulgence were granted, and, further, that the pursuers granted the indulgence craved. I can understand that that is an averment of delay having been granted until these children came of age, but if that was the obligation on the part of the pursuer the answer is that the children are not yet of age, and therefore the action is premature, and must be dismissed on that ground. But the pursuers say that that was not the agreement, and it was said at the bar that the agreement was perfectly indefinite, and that they might have sued the debtor at any time. Now, if the indulgence granted was quite indefinite, how can it be said that there was a definite agreement on the part of the debtor not to take advantage of the Act? I agree, therefore, that the statements made with regard to the alleged agreement are altogether irrelevant, and I further agree with your Lordship in holding that such an agreement could only have been proved by writing, and that none such being produced or averred the pursuers' case fails on this ground also.

LORD M'LAREN.—I agree in thinking that there is no averment on this record relevant to entitle the pursuers to prove an independent contract on the part of the defenders not to take advantage of the Act. The pursuers, therefore, must fail in the action.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur. It is quite settled that the original cautionary obligation became extinguished on the lapse of seven years from its date, so that the creditor could not sue on it, unless he had obtained a new and independent obligation on which to proceed. It appears to me that what the pursuers on record undertake to prove is a new and distinct obligation by the debtor, for they say that Anderson, when the executors intimated to him that they intended to call up the bond, "made application for indulgence," and requested that the loan should be allowed to lie over until the children of his son came of age, and informed the executors that if the indulgence were granted he would "negotiate a further loan of £500 from the bank, and advance £400 to his son." That is the conditional offer which they say the defenders made, and they further aver that the indulgence was granted, and that in consequence a fresh loan was negotiated and the advance made. If that averment means anything it is that the pursuers undertook to let the loan lie until these children came of age. If such a contract were well alleged and could be proved by competent evidence, it would be an entirely new contract and would be a good answer to a demand for payment until the children did come of age. But the pursuers cannot say that that is their case, because the children are not yet of age. Accordingly we are told that the meaning is that Anderson was to negotiate a further loan of £500 from the bank, and advance £400 to his son, but that the pursuers were to be at any time at liberty to enforce the bond, and that Anderson at the same time had agreed to abandon his right to plead the statute if they did not bring their action within seven years. The pursuers are, therefore, as Lord Adam said, in a dilemma; either there was a binding contract that this action should not be brought until the children were of age—and they are not of age yet,—or there was an indefinite arrangement which left the pursuers at liberty to sue on the bond at any time, just as if no new arrangement had been made; and that cannot possibly import a definite contract that the defenders should not take advantage of the Act.

It is not necessary to consider in this case whether it is sound to say that a cautioner cannot be barred from pleading the Septennial Limitation Act,—that is to say, that he cannot be disabled by his conduct from taking the benefits of that Act on the same grounds as would disable him from benefiting by any other legal right. But if a plea in bar is to be taken it must be averred that the person against whom the bar is pleaded has by his representations or conduct induced the other party to believe a certain state of facts to be true, and to alter his position by acting on that belief. There is nothing in this record approaching a relevant averment of that nature, and therefore I concur in thinking that the defenders must be assoilzied from the conclusions of the summons.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and assoilzied the defenders.

D.-F. Sir C. Pearson—Mackintosh.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND, Defender.

Public Health—County Council—Ultra vires—Secretary for Scotland—Special Water District—Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 50), sec. 81, subsec. 2.—The Local Government Act, 1889, sec. 81, subsec. 2, enacts that “where a special drainage district or special water supply district is partly within a county and partly within a burgh or police burgh,” the management and maintenance of the works shall be charged upon a subcommittee of the County Council “and such number of the town-council or police commissioners (as the case may be) of such burgh or police burgh as failing agreement the Secretary for Scotland may determine having regard to all the circumstances of the case.”

Held that a determination of the Secretary for Scotland under the above section, that a police burgh should be represented on the committee in the proportion of eight members to six members appointed by the County Council was ultra vires, and determination reduced.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

IN 1873 the special water supply district of Duntocher and Dalmuir was formed under the Public Health Acts by decree of the Sheriff of Dumbartonshire. The district embraced the whole of the burgh of Clydebank and a part of the county of Dumbarton, which formed part of the eastern district of the county.

The Eastern District Committee of the County Council of Dumbartonshire, on 18th June 1890, appointed a subcommittee under section 81, subsection (1), of the Local Government Act 1889.* As the parties could not agree as to the number of police commissioners to be added to the subcommittee, in order to discharge the duties required under subsection 2 of the 81st section, the police commissioners of the burgh applied to the Secretary for Scotland "to determine the respective representations of the burgh and landward parts of the water district." The Secretary, on 18th February 1891, issued the following determination:—"(1) The police burgh of Clydebank shall be represented on the subcommittee charged with the management and maintenance of the water supply works within the Duntocher and Dalmuir special water supply district in the proportion of eight members being police commissioners appointed by the police burgh to six members appointed by a district committee of the County Council of Dumbartonshire."

In September 1892 the Eastern District Committee of the County Council of Dumbartonshire and three ratepayers raised an action in the Court of Session against (1) Hugh Young and others, police commissioners of the police burgh of Clydebank; and (2) the Secretary for Scotland, concluding, inter alia, for reduction of the determination of the Secretary of Scotland, with a relative declaratory conclusion.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The said determination being ultra vires, the pursuers are entitled to decree of reduction and declarator to that effect.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The said determination being within the powers conferred on the Secretary for Scotland by the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, decree of reduction and declarator should be refused, with expenses.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), on 18th February 1893, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Reduces, decerns, and declares, in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons: With regard to the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, finds, decerns, and declares, that the Secretary for Scotland has and had no power to make or issue the determination recited in the first reductive conclusion, and that he has no power to fix or determine the proportion which the members of the body or committee, charged under section 81, subsection 2, of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, with the management and maintenance of the water supply district, who are Police Commissioners of the burgh of Clydebank, shall bear to the number of the members of said body or committee who are appointed by the said Eastern District Committee, but that he is only entitled, in virtue of said section 81, subsection 2, of said Act, failing agreement between the said County Council and the said Commissioners, or between the said Eastern District Committee and the said Commissioners, to fix the number of commissioners of the said burgh who are to act along with the members of said body or committee (if any) appointed by the said Eastern District Committee, under section 81, subsection 1, of said Local Government Act, in managing and maintaining the water supply work of the said special water supply district, . . . and decerns.*

(2) Where a special drainage district or special water supply district is partly within a county and partly within a burgh or police burgh, the subcommittee appointed under the immediately preceding subsection, and such number of the town-council or police commissioners (as the case may be) of such burgh or police burgh as failing agreement the Secretary for Scotland may determine having regard to all the circumstances of the case, shall be charged with the management and maintenance of the drainage or water supply works within such special district, and the determination of the Secretary for Scotland may provide for the regulation of the proceedings and for the allocation and payment of the expenses incurred under this subsection.”

* "OPINION.—The leading object of this action is to set aside a certain determination of the Secretary for Scotland, under section 81 of the Local Government Act, 1891, as being disconform to and unauthorised by the statute. The determination complained of has reference to the constitution of the subcommittee, charged under section 81 of the Act with the maintenance and management of the water works within Duntocher and Dalmuir water supply district—a district formed in 1873 out of the landward parish of Old Kilpatrick, in Dumbartonshire, but now comprising within its limits the police burgh of Clydebank, formed in 1886 under the General Police Act of 1862. The complaint is, that the Secretary for Scotland, being empowered to fix the number of Police Commissioners of Clydebank who should sit with the county representatives on the subcommittee, has taken it upon himself to determine that the burgh of Clydebank 'shall be represented on the subcommittee charged with the management and maintenance of the water supply works within the Duntocher and Dalmuir special water supply district, in the proportion of eight members being police commissioners appointed by the police burgh, to six members appointed by a district committee of the County Council of Dumbartonshire.'

"It is maintained by the pursuers, who represent the county district committee, that this is not what the Act authorised. They point out that the total number of police commissioners under the Act of the burgh of Clydebank is twelve, and that, on the other hand, there is no limit to the number of the representatives whom the County Council Committee, from their side, may place on the subcommittee. Under the Act, therefore, they say the county element was secured in a preponderance. It was so, even if the Secretary for Scotland should determine that the whole twelve of the Clydebank Commissioners should be members of the subcommittee. According, however, to the determination, all this has been reversed. The burgh secures the preponderance, and does so by what is in effect a limitation of the number of representatives to be appointed by the county committee. This, it is said, is entirely unauthorised by the Act. What was intended by the Act was, not that the burgh representatives should obtain control of the subcommittee, but that they should be represented upon it; not that the Secretary for Scotland should define the composition of the subcommittee, but that he should fix the number of burgh representatives; not that he should limit the powers of the county subcommittee, but that he should say how many of the twelve Police Commissioners should sit and vote with the county representatives on the subcommittee.

"I have come, somewhat reluctantly, to the conclusion that there is no good answer to this argument. I think the Secretary for Scotland has probably overlooked the very limited character of his powers; or it may be that he has overlooked the fact that there is a maximum number of Police Commissioners, and no similar limit on the other side. In any case, it appears to me that he has gone beyond his powers. He might have determined that the whole twelve of the Police Commissioners might be appointed to the subcommittee, but he was not entitled to determine that whatever number of them were so appointed, the county district committee should appoint a number one-fourth less. In short, he was not, in my opinion, entitled to interfere with the county district committee

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The determination was within the powers of the Secretary. What the Act contemplated was, that in the event of disagreement, the Secretary should nominate such a number of members for the committee from the police burgh that the landward district should not have a preponderance of power. Had not some such power been given, the landward district (though it might, as in the present case, be the inferior of the burghal district in population and rateable value) would be in a position to swamp the burgh in the district committee. It was to avoid this result that the Secretary had fixed the number in the way he had done.

Argued for the pursuers;—The determination was ultra vires. The procedure of the Act was that the district committee should, under certain regulations, nominate their contribution to the total number of the subcommittee, and that then the Secretary, with the list of their nominees before him, should say how many members of the Police Commissioners should sit with them. He had no power to regulate for the future the numbers which should sit on the committee for the management of water supply works, but that was what he had attempted to do here, as by naming the proportions in which the two bodies should sit on the committee he was, in effect, interfering with and regulating the number of nominations to be made by the County Council District Committee in the future, and over that the Act gave him no powers.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I am satisfied that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right. The question is whether the determination of the Secretary for Scotland set out in condescendence 4 was a due exercise of the statutory power conferred on him by subsection 2 of section 81 of the Local Government Act of 1889. That subsection provides for the constitution of a body to manage a special drainage or water supply district situated partly within a county and partly (to take the present case) within a police burgh. The procedure is quite plainly expressed in the statute. The initiative lies with the district committee of the County Council; they are to nominate their contribution to the subcommittee; then, failing an agreement being come to between the county and the police burgh, the Secretary for Scotland is to have power to say how many are to be added to the subcommittee by the police burgh. That is a very plain and simple procedure, but what the Secretary has done is to elaborate that procedure, and to take a step which appears to me to be distinctly outside his powers.

The Act, confiding largely in the good sense of the two bodies, has simply said that the Secretary shall, in case of disagreement, say how many representatives of the police burgh shall be on the committee. Possibly the fertility of controversy may provide emergencies where the provisions of the Act may not prove exactly fitted completely to meet, in all circumstances and in all tempers, the requirements of exaggerated and eccentric cases; but we have not to do with that. The error in the Secretary's determination here is that it assumes to constitute a code or rule for future nominations by the County Council; but the Act only contemplates that the Secretary, with the list of the nominees of at all, and it is because he has attempted to do so that the present difficulty has occurred.

"I shall, therefore, so far find for the pursuers, giving decree in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons, and so much of the declaratory conclusions as properly follow. . . ."

the County Council before him, shall then determine how many more members of the police commissioners shall be on the subcommittee. I have no doubt of the soundness of the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and his interlocutor seems to me appropriate to the occasion. With the sequel of the case under the original petition we have not in the meantime to deal; the only question we have to decide is whether the Secretary's determination can be sustained.

Harris v. Howie's Trustee.

JOHN HOWIE JUNIOR (Howie's Trustees), Respondent.—Shaw—Graham Stewart.

Trust—Removal of trustee—Judicial factor.—In a petition for removal of a trustee, and appointment of a judicial factor on the trust-estate, the petitioner averred that the trustee had paid out of the trust funds a claim on the trust-estate, without satisfying himself that it was properly vouched. It was not averred that in doing so he had acted in bad faith. The Court refused the prayer of the petition, on the ground that no malversation of office had been averred.

1ST DIVISION. BY last will and testament Thomas B. Howie, M.D., Alyth, who died in January 1884, appointed his brother, John Howie junior, builder, Alyth, his sole trustee and executor, and tutor and curator to his children.

By the second purpose of the deed he directed his trustee to apply "the interest, and part or the whole of the capital of his estate" for the support, education, and upbringing of his two daughters, Anne Crichton and Jeannie Harris Howie, in such shares and proportions, less or more, as his trustee might think proper. The daughters were aged at the date of their father's death about two and one years respectively.

In June 1893 Miss Maggie Harris, Alyth, maternal aunt of the children (who lived with her), presented a petition to the Court of Session praying for removal of John Howie junior from the offices of trustee, tutor, and curator, and for sequestration of the estate, and the appointment of a judicial factor thereon.

The petition set forth that the personal estate of the deceased Dr Howie was given up as amounting to £736, 4s. 4d., and that the children were further entitled to a sum of £1500 from the estate of their grandfather.

The petitioner then averred;—"The respondent has persistently refused to carry out the directions and purposes of the trust, and has grossly violated his duties as trustee, and as tutor and curator. In particular, he has, contrary to the terms of the trust, taken no steps to realise the late Dr Howie's estate or to invest the same as directed by the trust-deed, though repeatedly called on to do so. He has allowed a sum of £306 belonging to the trust-estate to lie in bank uninvested ever since Dr Howie's death; . . . Moreover it has been ascertained that, some time after Dr Howie's death, the said John Howie junior paid away to his father, John Howie senior, out of the funds under his charge as trustee and as tutor and curator, a sum of £175 or thereby, in discharge of a pretended claim by the said John Howie senior for expenses of aliment and education, alleged to have been incurred on behalf of the deceased Dr Howie, his son. The said John Howie senior was taken before a Justice of the Peace, and swore to the correctness of his account which was then paid. The said pupil daughters have ever since Dr Howie's death lived with the petitioner, their maternal aunt. They are of delicate constitution, and the elder of them particularly requires much care and attention. In order to fit them for earning their livelihood by teaching or otherwise, in a manner consistent with their station, it is essential that they should receive as good an education as possible. The income hitherto received from the said John Howie junior, and expended by the petitioner on their behalf, does not exceed £57, 10s. This sum has by the exercise of the strictest economy barely sufficed to pay the expense of their maintenance and education during childhood. It is, however, impossible to continue their upbringing on so small an expenditure any longer, and it is absolutely necessary, not only that the funds belonging to them should be laid out to the best advantage, but also that advances to a certain extent should be made from the capital of their father's trust-estate, as contemplated and directed in his testament. In order to enable the said children to continue their education, the petitioner has taken a house in Montrose, that they may attend the academy there. This will of course increase the expense attending their upbringing, inasmuch as no school fees were payable at the board school in Alyth, where they had hitherto attended school. The said John Howie junior, in spite of repeated representations as to the urgency of the case, has obstinately refused either to realise and invest the said estate, or to expend any part of the capital of the trust-estate, as contemplated in the trust-deed, to assist the education and maintenance of the children. . . ."

Howie's
Trustee.

The respondent lodged answers, in which he admitted that "the respondent accepted the office of trustee and tutor and curator, and gave up an inventory of the personal estate, amounting to £736, 4s. 4d., and that the sum of £306 has been allowed to remain in bank on deposit-receipt, and that the sum of £175 or thereby has been paid to the said John Howie senior, the testator's father.

"In his early days Dr Howie, after being educated as pupil teacher, desired to attend college and qualify himself as a doctor of medicine. As he was possessed of no funds, and his father, who was a builder in Alyth, was comparatively a poor man, it was arranged between them that Dr Howie should keep a pass-book, in which he was to enter all the advances made by his father towards his board and college expenses. Dr Howie did so,—the advances, as shewn by the pass-book, amounting to £183, 17s. 6d. When on his deathbed, Dr Howie sent to the respondent, whom he had appointed his sole trustee and executor, exhibited to him the pass-book, and charged him to repay out of his estate to his father the amount of the advances made by him. After the said John Howie senior filed an affidavit and claim before a Justice of the Peace for the above advances, and emitted an oath as to the correctness thereof, the respondent, acting on the instructions given by the deceased, paid the same. The pass-book, affidavit, and claim are herewith produced and referred to. The balance of the estate left by the deceased, after payment of the debts, and amounting to £306, has been kept by the respondent on deposit-receipt, as he found it impossible to get an investment for it without exposing it to risk, and in view of the youth of the children and the smallness of the capital he was desirous that it should be preserved for them, and should be readily available. . . . The interest of the said sum has been regularly paid by the respondent to the petitioner for the maintenance and education of the said children. The said children are also entitled to the sum of £1500 from the estate of the said Mr Harris, of Aberbothrie. . . . The trustees of Mr and Mrs Harris have paid the interest on this sum direct to the petitioner and on her own receipt, in order that she might apply the same for the children's maintenance and education. . . . As the respondent considered that the income of the funds belonging to the children was amply sufficient to keep and educate them in a proper manner, he has refused to comply with the persistently expressed desire of the petitioner for payment to her of part of the capital. . . ."

Argued for the petitioner;—The acts alleged by her amounted to a breach of trust on the part of the trustee, particularly the payment of the debt to the truster's father. That debt was not sufficiently vouched,¹ and by payment of it relatively a large portion of the trust-estate was lost. Moral delinquency was not necessary to entitle the Court to remove a trustee; anything done in breach of trust was sufficient.²

Argued for the respondent;—The petition did not set forth a sufficient cause for removal. It might be that when the children came of age they might be able to recover from him the sum of £175 as having been improperly paid away, but the question in these cases always came to be, had there been "decided malversation"? Here there was nothing of the kind averred, and the case was directly ruled by the case of Gilchrist's Trustees.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—This petition contains a number of statements as to the administration of the trust by the respondent, but the attention of the Court was from the first concentrated on one act which is specially challenged. I refer to the payment of a sum of £175 made by the trustee in satisfaction of a debt due by the truster to his father. It is important to observe that while the administration of the trust funds has resulted in a small sum being available for the children's maintenance the petitioner does not set out any relevant case for blaming the trustee for refusing to advance a part of their capital for that purpose. Up to this time the children have been receiving yearly a sum of about £57, made up of the interest of £306 belonging to the trust-estate, and of £1500 to which they are otherwise entitled, and considering their youth and condition I cannot doubt that the trustee was entitled to refuse to diminish their capital by advancing any part of it when asked to do so. There is no allegation that the money is in any danger in the hands of the trustee, and there is nothing about his circumstances or condition to suggest any such danger. The only question, then, is whether the trustee's action in paying the debt I have mentioned was such as to warrant us now in suspending him and appointing a judicial factor. Now, the petitioner does not aver that that payment was fraudulently made,—that the trustee was a party along with his father to a fraudulent scheme. The importance of such a statement if it had been made would manifestly be such that the fact that it is not made entitles us to treat the case as one where no fraud can even be suspected. The question merely is whether the lax or possibly too easy satisfaction of a claim on the trust-estate is sufficient to entitle us to grant the prayer of the petition. Certainly, such a payment does not raise a case of decided malversation, for in the case of

Gilchrist (11 R. 22) the Lord President, after saying that the trustees had made an illegal use of the trust funds, but that it was clear that they acted in good faith, goes on to say,—“The remedy suggested is that the trustees should be removed, and a judicial factor appointed; but in order to justify us in adopting so extreme a measure as the removal of a trustee, there must be something more than mere irregularity or illegality. We are not in the habit of removing trustees unless there has been a decided malversation of office, and there is nothing of that kind here.” Applying that rule here I am of opinion that there is no case of decided malversation averred in this petition. The petitioner’s case simply is, that the claim on the trust-estate which the trustee paid was not sufficiently vouched, and that a part of the trust-estate was lost owing to his not taking care to see that it was. Such a case does not entitle us to remove the trustee.

The alternative is, that we should sequester the estate and appoint a judicial factor. That is a question we must determine on a consideration of the interests of the estate. If we adopt that course, an action would have immediately to be raised with a view to recovering the money. Now, I do not think we should be acting for the benefit of the estate if we were to pledge the remainder of the children’s money with a view to recover this £175. In saying that I am moved largely by the fact that we are not by refusing to take that course in any way prejudicing the question whether, when these children come of age, they may not, if so advised, try to get the money back; we, in short, say nothing as to the propriety or otherwise of the payment in question. I think, therefore, that we should refuse both branches of the prayer of the petition.

Process—Appeal—Proof or jury trial—Reparation—Master and servant—Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. IV. cap. 120), sec. 40.—A steelmelter, who had been dismissed from his employment, brought an action in a Sheriff Court against his employers for £220, as the balance of the wages due to him on a yearly engagement, and £30 as the equivalent of a free house, alleging that he had been engaged at £5 a-week for a year, with a free house, and that he had been unjustifiably dismissed after eight weeks’ service. The defenders averred that the engagement was a weekly one, and that the dismissal was justifiable. The pursuer having appealed for jury trial, the defenders moved that the case should be sent back to the Sheriff Court for a proof. The Court (dub. the Lord Justice-Clerk) remitted the case to the Sheriff Court for a proof.

In April 1893 James Cunningham, steelmelter in Glasgow, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Kilmarnock against the Ayrshire Foundry Company, Limited, Stevenston, Ayrshire, for £220 and £30, being respectively the balance of salary due to him by the defenders upon an alleged engagement for a year, and the equivalent of a free house.

on receiving an offer of a situation at £5 a-week in Glasgow, where his wife and family lived; that on that day, when on his way to Glasgow, he at Stevenston Station met Mr Cleminson, the defender's director general and over manager, who, after some conversation "on defenders' behalf, requested pursuer to return to their employment, and offered in that event to give him a year's fixed engagement, with a salary of £5 per week of six shifts upstanding, i.e., whether there was work for him or not. Mr Cleminson, at the same time, on defenders' behalf, also offered to pay the rent for twelve months of a house at Stevenston, suitable for pursuer and his family, and likewise the expense of the removal of pursuer and his family, with their furniture, from Glasgow to Stevenston"; that the pursuer accepted this offer, and re-entered the defenders' employment, in which he remained until 10th January 1893, when they wrongously and in breach of their agreement dismissed him without compensation.

In answer the defenders averred that the engagement was a weekly engagement only, and that the pursuer had been justifiably dismissed for gross carelessness in the management of their furnaces.

The Sheriff-substitute (Hall) having allowed a proof, the pursuer appealed for jury trial, and proposed an issue. The defenders also proposed counter issues.

On the motion for the approval of issues, the defenders objected to the case being sent to a jury, and moved that it should be remitted to the Sheriff Court for a proof.

Argued for the defenders;—This was not a case suited for jury trial. It was not a case of the assessment of damages, but was simply a question as to the nature of the pursuer's engagement, and as to whether he had been justifiably dismissed.

Argued for the pursuer;—The rule was that a case, which had come up for jury trial under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, would be sent to a jury or not, according as it would have been sent to a jury or to proof had it originated in the Court of Session.¹ The present case, being an action of damages for breach of contract, was prima facie fitted for jury trial,² and there was nothing exceptional in the case. The action was for a substantial sum, and raised issues of fact which a jury could well determine.

LORD YOUNG.—It was formerly an important question whether in appeals from the Sheriff Court under this section with a view to jury trial, the Court has a discretion to refuse to send the individual case to a jury, and may send it back to the Sheriff for a proof if that is thought to be the proper course. That, I think, was an important question. But it has now been settled, by decisions in both divisions of the Court, that the Court has such a discretion, and is bound to exercise it in each particular case. In England, if my memory serves me aright, this matter is expressly provided for by statute. A right is there given by statute of removing a case begun in the County Court to the High Court of Justice, but a discretion is also given to the High Court of Justice to refuse to entertain the particular case if they think it more fitted to be tried in the County Court. Therefore the discretion which we think we have upon a construction of our statute is expedient in itself, and is in accordance with the practice of our brethren in England, although that practice stands upon a special enactment.

We have usually exercised our discretion by sending the case to a jury, but there have been several instances in which we have used this discretion exceptionally, and have remitted the case to the Sheriff Court, being of opinion that the particular case was well fitted for trial by the Sheriff, and was not well fitted for jury trial. In my opinion we should properly exercise our discretion here by sending the case back to the Sheriff Court for proof. I think that it is not a case that is fitted for jury trial. If we should adopt the other view, then I think that it is plain enough that every butler or housemaid who thinks that he or she has been wrongously dismissed may bring an action of damages in the Sheriff Court and then have the case brought here for jury trial, the question in each case being whether the pursuer had or had not done his or her duty. I do not think that such a mode of trial is expedient in cases of this description. It is said that the sum here sued for is a large one, but I do not think that the case is made exceptional because the pursuer had £5 a-week. It is a larger sum than usual, but that is not sufficient, in my opinion, to make the case different from what it would have been had the sum been smaller. The only questions to be tried are these:—What passed between the parties when the pursuer was engaged? and did the pursuer perform his work in such a manner as to entitle his master to dismiss him? That being so, I think that we should send the case back to the Sheriff Court.

LORD TRAYNER.—It having been now determined, contrary I admit to what was my opinion, that the Court has a discretion whether to send a case to jury trial or to refuse to do so, I cannot doubt that this is a case which we should refuse to send to a jury. This is not properly an action to assess damages at all, it is really a question of resting owing, as I pointed out during the discussion. The pursuer says he was engaged for a certain time at a certain wage, that his services have been dispensed with, but that his wages are due. The answer is that he was not engaged for that time, and that the wages claimed are not due. That is simply a question whether any money is due the pursuer. In reading this case I do not see what is the question in it appropriate for a jury trial; in fact I see no question that would not be more appropriately tried by the Sheriff.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur in holding that we have the discretion to send this case to jury trial or to proof before the Sheriff. My only doubt is whether we should exercise that discretion by sending this case back to the Sheriff. There may be a very considerable sum found due in certain supposable circumstances, amounting to more than £200, and I have doubts whether such a case should be withheld from a jury, but as your Lordships have a clear view that the case ought to be sent back to the Sheriff I do not dissent.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK was absent.

THE COURT remitted the cause to the Sheriff for proof.

Ld. Wellwood.

In this case, which was an action for payment of legitim by James B. Crellin, Mrs Crellin's testamentary trustee, against the judicial factor on the estate of Charles Muirhead, her father, the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood), on 22d June 1893, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns and ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuer of" a certain sum in name of legitim: "Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses, reserving till after taxation the question whether any, and if so what, modification should be allowed in respect of the ascertainment of the amount of the legitim fund: Allows an account to be lodged, and remits the same to the Auditor to tax and report."

No reclaiming note was presented against this interlocutor.

The Auditor having reported, the Lord Ordinary, on 14th July 1893, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Approves of the Auditor's report on the pursuer's account of expenses, and having heard counsel on the question of modification, modifies the same to the extent of £14, 5s.: Decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £166, 6s. 2d. sterling, being the balance of the taxed amount of said account."

The defender reclaimed against this interlocutor.

The pursuer objected to the competency of the reclaiming note, and argued;—The interlocutor of 22d June was a final judgment in the sense of the 53d section of the Court of Session Act, 1868,* and if the defender intended to reclaim on the merits, he ought to have reclaimed against that interlocutor within twenty-one days of its date. That was the necessary result of the case of Stirling-Maxwell,¹ for there could not be two final judgments in one cause. At the utmost, all that could be raised under the present reclaiming note was the question of the modification of expenses; but even that was incompetent, for the Act expressly said that it should not prevent a cause from being held to be finally decided "that expenses if found due have not been taxed, modified, or decerned for." The interlocutor of 14th July was merely executorial, and could not be reclaimed against.

Argued for the defender;—The reclaiming note was competent. The case fell within the exception which the Lord President reserved in Stirling-Maxwell,¹ viz., where there still remained a substantial matter of dispute regarding expenses. A decree for expenses, after the determination of that dispute, could not be said to be merely executorial of the prior interlocutor, for it involved an exercise of discretion and judgment by the Lord Ordinary. If, then, the interlocutor was reclaimable it was a twenty-one days' interlocutor, and it brought up all prior interlocutors. There was no other category of interlocutors into which it could be placed. The case was ruled by Baird v. Barton.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case we have had an opportunity of consulting with our brethren of the other Division. We are of opinion that, without trenching upon the judgment in the case of Stirling-Maxwell, the Judge in the Outer-House having applied his mind to a question which had not been previously considered, viz., the modification of expenses, the reclaiming note is competent, and must go to the roll.

LORD YOUNG.—Our decision is put entirely upon the ground of the question of modification, but it must be understood that this reclaiming note brings up all previous interlocutors.

Expenses—Fees to counsel—Jury trial.—A jury trial for damages for personal injury lasted for part of a day at the sittings. In taxing the successful party's account of expenses, the Auditor reduced the fee of senior counsel from twenty guineas to thirteen, and that of junior counsel from fifteen guineas to eight. The successful party objected to the reduction, maintaining that it had been fixed by decisions of the Court that twenty guineas and fifteen guineas respectively were the proper fees to be allowed against the losing party in all ordinary jury trials which did not extend beyond a single day, and that this rule ought to be applied in the present case, the Auditor not having reported that there was anything exceptional in the case. The Court refused to interfere with the discretion of the Auditor.

Blair v. Caledonian Railway Co.

2D DIVISION.

Observed that there is no general rule which requires the Auditor to allow fees of a particular amount in all ordinary jury trials.

THIS case, which was an action of damages for personal injury at the instance of Robert Blair, porter, Grangemouth, against the Caledonian Railway Company, was tried before the Lord Justice-Clerk and a jury at the Summer Sittings 1893. The case lasted for about four hours on the afternoon of 25th July. The jury returned a verdict for the pursuer and assessed the damages at £100. The pursuer was found entitled to expenses. In taxing the pursuer's account of expenses, the Auditor reduced the fees of senior and junior counsel from twenty and fifteen guineas respectively to thirteen and eight guineas. The pursuer lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report, in which he, inter alia, objected to this reduction.

Argued for the pursuer;—This objection raised a question of principle, and not one of mere taxation, for it had been fixed by a series of decisions that the fees charged in the pursuer's account were the proper fees, as in a question with the losing party in all ordinary jury trials which did not extend beyond a single day.¹ It was the duty of the Auditor, therefore, if he thought that this settled rule did not apply to the present case, to have stated the grounds of his opinion in a note to his report. As it was, he had simply arbitrarily taxed off so much without saying whether he did so because he thought the case an exception to the rule, or because he thought that the rule had no existence. On the latter alternative he was clearly wrong, and he had no discretion to disregard the settled rules of Court. In point of fact there was nothing exceptional in this case. It was true that the trial only lasted for about four hours, but it took place at the sittings when counsel were not understood to be in Court except for the trials for which they were retained, and this trial might have come on at any time during the day.

The defenders argued that the question was for the Auditor's discretion, with which the Court would not lightly interfere.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The Auditor is an officer of Court who necessarily has before him all the decisions of the Court on questions of expenses, and having these decisions before him, he considers whether, in the particular case, the particular fee which is charged ought to be allowed. I should have been surprised if, in any decision, it was laid down that the Auditor must allow a particular fee in any particular class of cases, because I think that it is the duty of the Auditor, in each case, to consider the whole circumstances of the case. This case lasted for about four hours, and the Auditor, no doubt considering that circumstance and all the other circumstances of the case, thought that the fees charged were too high, and in consequence he felt himself justified in cutting them down to a certain extent. For myself, unless in very strong and exceptional circumstances, I should not be inclined to interfere with the Auditor's discretion as to the amount of the fee to be allowed in any particular case, and I can find no such exceptional circumstances here.

LORD YOUNG.—I must admit that I am surprised at this objection. Since I have sat in this Division we have always, as far as I am aware, refused to interfere with the judgment of the Auditor in such a matter as the present, and we have hinted pretty emphatically that we never would interfere—not because we had no power to do so, but on the ground that under no ordinary circumstances would we interfere with the Auditor's discretion in such a matter. It may be possible to imagine a case in which we would interfere, but it would, I think, be only a fancy case. It is obvious—most of us know it from experience—that the fees sent to counsel must vary in different cases and for different reasons. But we have now the good fortune to have as Auditor the most experienced man alive in these questions—a gentleman whose sound judgment and good sense we all know, and he knows, or has brought under his notice, all the decisions bearing on the subject. It would require a very exceptional case—one, indeed, that for myself I can hardly figure—to induce me to interfere with his judgment in regard to the proper fees to be allowed in a particular case. Here no ground at all has been stated for our interference except it be this, that either the Court ought to lay down a general rule, or table of fees, for the guidance of the Auditor in all cases, or else that we ought to revise his decision in every case. I do not think that it would be expedient to lay down a general rule which should be binding on the Auditor in every case, and I think that reconsidering the judgment of the Auditor in each particular case is not a kind of work for which this Court is fitted. I am clear that these objections should be repelled.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that we ought not to interfere with the discretion of the Auditor in this case.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

Contract—Notice—Reparation—Master and Servant—Employers Liability Act, 1880 (43 and 44 Vict. cap. 42)—Insurance.—In defence to an action by a workman against his employers for damages for personal injury, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, the defenders proved that they had posted at various places in their works, including the pay-box, notices to the effect that from the weekly wages paid to the workmen certain sums would be deducted, to secure certain insurance benefits in case of accident, and that any workman accepting such benefits would be held to have discharged all claims against his employers. It was further proved that the notice was well known to the defenders' workmen generally, and that the pursuer had taken benefit of the insurance.

The Court assolized the defenders, holding (1) that the conditions founded on were lawful conditions of the contract of employment; and (2) that on the evidence the pursuer must be held to have known of and assented to the conditions.

In February 1893 Benjamin Wright, labourer, Kirkcaldy, raised an action against Howard, Baker, & Co., contractors, for damages, at common law and under the Employers Liability Act, 1880, on account of injuries sustained by him while in the employment of the defenders in the construction of a railway between Kirkcaldy and Cowdenbeath.

Besides answers on the merits, Howard, Baker, & Company stated:—(Stat. 1) "The pursuer entered the employment of the defenders under certain conditions, which are specified in the notice or bill herewith produced,* which notice or bill is posted at the various parts of the defender's works. The pursuer was fully aware of the terms and conditions of this bill or notice. Quoad ultra, pursuer's statement in answer is denied." The defenders further averred that the pursuer had taken the benefit of the insurance fund referred to in the notice.

In answer, the pursuer averred;—(Ans. 1) "The said notice or bill is referred to for its terms. Denied that pursuer entered the employment of the defenders under the conditions herein stated. The pursuer's attention was never drawn to these conditions, and he was quite ignorant of their existence; all that he knew was that a small deduction was made from his wages for a sickness fund."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuer, having accepted the insurance money, is debarred from raising any action, either at common law or under the Employers Liability Act, 1880; this action is therefore irrelevant, and should be dismissed, and with expenses.

The defenders were allowed a proof of their averments above quoted, and the pursuer a conjunct probation (there being conjoined with the present an action at the instance of another workman named M'Kenna raising the same question, which was not taken to appeal). It appeared from the evidence that 1½d. per week was deducted from the pursuer's wages and placed in the accident fund, and that after the accident he received under the insurance scheme payments at the rate of 6s. a-week, and amounting in all to £5, 17s. His father received this money for him.†

* "Notice to Workmen.—Accident Insurance.—We have effected an accident insurance for the benefit of workmen in our employment. The scale of contributions therefor is as follows, viz.:—Where the wages do not exceed 20s. per week, 1½d. per week. Where the wages are above 20s. and do not exceed 30s. per week, 2d. per week. Where the wages are above 30s. per week, 2½d. per week.

"Contributions at these rates will, for the convenience of contributors, be deducted from their wages at the weekly or fortnightly pays. The following are the benefits to be derived from the insurance:—(1) If any workman in our employment, paying the above contributions, shall sustain personal injury caused by accidental external and visible means, while engaged in our work, and the direct effect of such injury shall occasion his death within three months after he has sustained such injury, the legal representatives of such workmen shall (providing no claim is made under the 'Employers Liability Act, 1880,' or at common law) be entitled to receive one year's wages, with a limit of £60, which sum shall be in full satisfaction of all claims in respect of such injury. (2) If the injury so sustained be not fatal, compensation shall (providing no claim be made, as aforesaid, under the 'Employers Liability Act, 1880,' or at common law) be paid to such workman at the rate per week of one-third of the week's wage being earned by him at the date of disablement, so long as he remains totally and absolutely incapacitated from attending to work of any kind in consequence of such injury; but the period during which such compensation is payable shall not exceed twenty-six consecutive weeks for any single accident.

"Note.—The above benefits are payable only when the workman has no claim against the employer, either at common law, or under the Act of 1880, and his acceptance of the benefits hereby provided for shall be equivalent to a discharge of these and any other claims against the employer. The workman has no direct claim against the insurance company.

"No claim for compensation or aliment will be recognised unless these rules are strictly complied with.

Howard,
Baker, & Co.

They merely ask for a job and get one. The conditions of public works are always mentioned in regulations set forth in handbills and posters. We do not bring any conditions under the notice of the workmen. We leave them to find them out for themselves. The reason is you cannot bring every man that you engage and discuss with him the various conditions of the employment. I may explain how the men are engaged. They are not engaged by us personally, but the gaffer in the particular gang engages the men that he requires. Even the wages are seldom mentioned at the time of the engagement. At the commencement of this undertaking, the defenders effected an accident insurance policy with the General Accident Assurance Corporation, Limited. The premium is paid partly by the defenders, and partly by the workmen. It is a mutual insurance. . . . Any sums recovered from the Insurance Company are handed to the workmen, so that the defenders are not interested in the settlement made with the workmen. When the policy was taken out, the insurance company sent us a number of bills. . . . They were posted up at different places all over the works. We presently have one at the pay-office at Inveriel, . . . I understand there are some contractors who don't insure against accidents in this way. In consequence of this the workmen, when they come to a particular work, make a point of ascertaining the conditions of that work. They are always very particular about that. They are also particular about seeing that they are correctly paid. A man would very soon detect if there was a deduction taken off that he did not know of. If there was anything taken off his wages, the workmen would make a point of knowing why it was taken off. He would ascertain the cause of the deduction, and this would lead him to know about the bills if he did not know about them before."

M'Kinlay, the defender's cashier, in substance corroborated this evidence.

Hector M'Donald, a foreman with the defenders, gave this evidence:—"The men who work at a particular section are paid at the same office. They are all paid at the same time . . . Many is the time that we have been kept waiting for our pay, in consequence of Mr M'Kinlay not being forward. (Q.) What did you do when you were kept waiting? (A.) I always got into argument about this insurance money. That was a common thing to put off the time, not only for me, but for other men. We used just to talk through one another. (Q.) Does that mean, that whatever subject was discussed, was discussed by the whole lot of you? (A.) Yes. We have often had discussions about the insurance money. (Shewn No. 6 of process)—I have seen bills like that ever since I started in the work. I have seen them at Seafeld Docks, and I have seen them along the works at the pay-box. Sometimes in the course of the discussions we had to refer to the bill to see who was right. In that case a man would often read out a piece of a bill. I know that the pursuers belonged to the same section as myself, and they were bound to be at the pay-box at the same time. (Q.) If these discussions were going on at the pay-box, is it possible that they could not have heard them? (A.) They should have heard them. I cannot say whether I heard the pursuers themselves taking part in these discussions."

Others of the defenders' workmen gave similar evidence.

The pursuer, as a witness for himself, deponed,—“I asked M'Kinlay about my wages at the first pay. He told me 3s. 8d. a-day, and a penny off. He did not tell me what the penny off was for. I had no idea myself what this penny was for. I was just like the rest of the men. I understood it was a sick or an accident fund, and that I would get medical attendance in the case of sickness or accident. I knew also the amount that I was to receive—an allowance of a third of my pay. I was never given to understand how long this third of my pay would continue. I never saw the bill No. 6 of process before. I first saw it in the hands of my agent. I never saw that bill posted about the works. If it had been there I would have seen it. My attention was never drawn to that bill. I was always paid my wages on the line. M'Kinlay paid me. He came to me with the money. . . . I have heard what the witnesses said about accidents for their workmen, the premium being paid partly by sums deducted from the workmen's wages, and partly by a contribution from the defenders themselves; that printed posters, headed in large type 'Notice to Workmen: Accident Insurance,' were posted on the pay-box and other conspicuous places about the works, one of the benefits set forth in the notice being a weekly allowance payable to a workman injured in the work; that acceptance by a workman of the benefits thereby provided was declared to be equivalent to a discharge of his claims against the employers, either at common law or under the Employers Liability Act; that the contents of the notice were well known to the men employed by the defenders, and the subject of frequent discussion; that on 26th September the pursuers were injured by an accident while in the defenders' employment; that the pursuers, in the knowledge of the conditions of the insurance scheme above mentioned, accepted the weekly allowance under it, and received sums amounting, in the case of Wright, to £5, 17s., and in the case of M'Kenna to £6: Finds in law that they thereby discharged the claims sued for; assoilzies the defenders, and decerns: Finds them entitled to expenses."

The pursuer Wright appealed.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It has already been settled by decision, and there is now no dispute about the matter, that when employers and employed agree to do so they are entitled to contract themselves out of the operation of the Employers Liability Act. Therefore the question here is whether upon the proof the pursuer and the defenders had so contracted, that the pursuer could not accept payments of money from the defenders under the insurance arrangements, and at the same time keep up his claim against them either under the Act or at common law. The case presented to us on behalf of the defenders is that they entered into an accident insurance arrangement with an insurance company; that in order to meet the premium upon this insurance they themselves contributed so much, and also deducted so much from the pay of the workmen employed by them; and that in respect of these deductions the workmen became entitled to certain allowances in the event of their meeting with accident in the employment. The defenders say that they put up at different parts of their works bills containing a sufficient notice of the conditions of this arrangement, and undoubtedly the bill before the Court, if put up in the works in a fairly prominent position, was sufficient notice. It sets forth very clearly, and in my opinion quite unambiguously, the whole terms of the contract. It brings into strong relief, in a manner capable of being understood by an ordinary workman on the one hand the benefits to be derived by the workman from this insurance scheme, and on the other hand the conditions that no claim the discussions going on at the pays. I have been present at discussions going on at the pays. The nature of these discussions was, that the men understood that it was their own money that they were getting back,—that it was a sick and accident fund. . . . Sometimes I got my pay at the pay-box. I have seen the witnesses for the pursuer there. I have seen them all. During the discussions that I have spoken of I never saw any of the men reading out of the bill. There was no bill at all posted up on the pay-box that I saw. If it had been there I would have seen it, and I could have read it too."

Other workmen in the employment of the defenders deposed that they never saw the bills in question posted up at the works.

for compensation would be recognised unless the rules were complied with, and that acceptance of the benefits by the workman discharged any claim which he might have against the employer either under the Act or at common law. The Sheriff-substitute holds, and I agree with him, that it is proved that these notices were sufficiently posted. The only evidence to the contrary is the evidence of people who say that they did not see them. I have the gravest doubt about the truth of that evidence. It is quite probable that many of the workmen did not read the notice, knowing that such conditions existed. But that these bills were posted in such a manner as to constitute a sufficient notice, I have no doubt. That being so, and deductions having been made from the pursuer's pay in conformity with the notice, I think it must be taken that he knew the terms of the contract. If then that is so, I can see no ground for interfering with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute. By receiving the allowances after the accident the pursuer completed the contract by accepting the benefits of the insurance scheme. No doubt it was the pursuer's father who received the payments from the defenders' cashier and granted the receipts, but it cannot be disputed that the defender got the money, and that he knew that the payments were made out of the accident fund. In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the pursuer has come under the condition of the notice, which excludes him from making any claim against his employers either at common law or under the Act. I move your Lordships, therefore, to adhere to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and the only alteration I have to suggest on his interlocutor is to add to the finding "that the contents of the notice were well known to the men employed by the defenders," the words "including the pursuer."

LORD YOUNG.—I only desire to add a word or two in order that my judgment may be put distinctly on what I conceive to be the right ground. The pursuer here was in the service of the defenders for eleven months prior to the accident, and it is not disputed that during that period he was insured against accidents when engaged in the defenders' work. That must be taken as certain, because every week during these eleven months 1½d. per week was deducted from his pay as a premium of insurance, and after he met with the accident he drew compensation under the insurance at the rate of six shillings a-week for four months. There is no dispute in regard to either of these facts. Now, anyone who is insured against accident must be insured under a contract, because there is no insurance in this country except insurance by contract. What then was the contract under which the pursuer was insured? He says that he does not know—that he knows nothing at all about it. I am not disposed to take that answer off his hands. The defenders, on the other hand, say that there was a contract under which the pursuer and all the other workmen employed at these works were insured, and that bills setting forth the terms of this contract were posted up in conspicuous places in the works under the headings "Notice to Workmen—Accident Insurance." By these notices it was provided that certain deductions should be made from the workmen's wages, in return for which, in the event of a workman's death while engaged in the work, his representatives are to receive a certain sum in full satisfaction of all claims, and in the event of the injury not proving fatal, the workman himself is to receive a certain sum weekly. The notice then bears distinctly that "the above benefits are payable only when the workman has no claim against the employer, either at common law or under the Act of 1880, and his acceptance of the benefits hereby pro-

No. 9. vided for shall be equivalent to a discharge of these and any other claims against the employer." That is quite intelligible, and it is the contract upon which the defenders found in answer to the pursuer, who says that he has not a conception of the contract under which he paid the premiums and received the compensation. Now, I think with the Sheriff-substitute that these notices were posted up as the defenders say they were, and that the contract which the notices set forth was known to the pursuer, and was the contract under which he paid the premiums and received the compensation. Accordingly, I think that he must be bound by its terms, and must be held to have discharged all claims which he might otherwise have had against the defenders, either at common law or under the Employers Liability Act. I have only to add that if I had entertained any doubt on this question of fact, I would not have been for altering the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, proceeding on the rule that if we, sitting as a Court of Appeal on a question of fact, think that the Sheriff has reached a wrong conclusion, we ought to alter his judgment, but if we have any doubt we ought to let it alone. Here, however, I think that the Sheriff-substitute arrived at the right conclusion.

Church—Lands held in trust for use and benefit of minister—Mines and minerals.—In 1676 certain lands were conveyed in trust "for the use and benefit of the minister of the gospel serving the cure at the Kirk of Bo'ness." In 1888 minerals in the lands were opened and leased for twenty years at a yearly rent of £25 or royalties. In a special case between the trustees and the minister of the parish, held that the mineral rents or royalties were not to be paid to the minister as part of the income of the benefice, but were to be accumulated as capital, the income of the accumulated fund only being paid to the minister for the time.

In 1638 the inhabitants of Bo'ness, which then formed part of the parish of Kinneil, having resolved that the town should be disjoined and erected into a separate parish, built a church and proceeded, by means of voluntary contributions, to create a permanent fund for the endowment of the minister. As the interest of the fund so raised, and the other sources of income, did not amount to 800 merks per annum, which, under the Act 1633, cap. 8, was the lowest stipend competent to be given to a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, it became necessary, in order to the erection of Bo'ness into a separate parish, to obtain statutory authority for raising the required sum by annual assessment; and accordingly, by an Act passed in 1649, Bo'ness was erected into a separate parish, and power was given "to those whom the supplicants have chosen to be assisting to the kirk-session according to the Act of Parliament, or some other who shall be nominate be commont consent of town and session to stent yearly every inhabitant and indweller within the said parochin, bounded as said is, according to their abilities for making up the yearly stipend of 800 merks." Galbraith v.

Bo'ness.

In 1648 a sum of 5000 merks, part of the permanent fund, was lent out on wadset over the lands of Muirhouse, and in 1653 the lands of Muirhouse were appraised for this debt. In 1676 a charter was obtained from King Charles II., proceeding upon the decree of appraising, conveying the lands of Muirhouse to certain parties as representatives of the inhabitants of Bo'ness "for the use and benefit of the minister of the gospel serving the cure at the kirk of Bo'ness." Under this charter and the infetment following thereon, the lands of Muirhouse were thereafter possessed and managed by the representatives for the time of the inhabitants of Bo'ness, for behoof of the minister.

In 1888 the minerals in the lands of Muirhouse were leased by the representatives, under a lease for twenty years for payment of a fixed rent or of royalties.

In 1893 a special case was presented by W. T. Galbraith and others, the representatives, as first parties, the minister, as second party, and the moderator and the clerk of the Presbytery of Linlithgow, as representing the presbytery for their interest, as third parties.

The questions of law were,—“Do the mineral rents or royalties paid in respect of the Muirhouse minerals, under the foresaid lease, fall to be accumulated with the capital or stock? Or are the said mineral rents to be dealt with as revenue or income of the estate administered by the first parties?”

The first parties maintained that the mineral rents or royalties paid and to be paid under the lease formed part and portion of stock or capital, and therefore fell to be accumulated yearly, and that only the interest or annual proceeds of the mineral rents were to be treated as revenue, and paid to the minister of the parish.

The second party maintained that the mineral rents or royalties ought not to be dealt with as capital sums, but must be treated as ordinary rents or revenue in a question with the second party.

The case set forth the foregoing facts, and further stated that the rents or royalties paid under the lease, amounting at the date of the case to £187, 12s. 6d. in cumulo, had not been made over to the minister, but had been accumulated by the representatives. The case also stated that in 1806 it was found by the House of Lords, reversing the judgment of the Court of Session, that the minister for the time being was not restricted to a yearly stipend of 800 merks, but was entitled to the whole income (subject to certain deductions) provided and raised as already mentioned—Rennie v. Tod, July 21, 1806, 5 Pat. App. 114.

Argued for the first parties;—The general rule with reference to persons having a limited interest in heritable subjects was that such persons were entitled to the benefit of the subjects only under the qualification salva rei substantia. That rule was not an absolute one. It had been held, for example, that a liferenter was entitled to the rents or royalties drawn from mineral fields which had been opened before the commencement of the liferent.¹ But with respect to glebes, the qualification salva rei substantia was absolute. It had been so held with reference to timber,¹ marl,² coal,³ peats,⁴ the price or produce of which was to be accumulated, and the income thereof only paid to the minister and his successor in office. The lands here were in the same position as a glebe,⁵ and therefore the first parties were bound to accumulate the rent or royalties and pay the income thereof only to the second party.

Argued for the second party;—The lands here, as the title shewed, were not in the same position as a glebe, which was not intended to be a source of commercial profit to the minister,⁶ nor was the case analogous to that of an ordinary liferent; it was nearer to the case of an heir of entail in possession. The presbytery made no objection, and the fee of the property was not appreciably affected. The Court therefore ought to construe the rights of the second party liberally.

LORD YOUNG.—It seems to me clear that the present incumbent is not entitled to the mineral rents or lordships, and that the trustees have acted with perfect propriety in laying aside the income for behoof of the benefice. I think that they should continue to do so, the minister receiving annually the income only of the accumulated fund.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. To my mind there is no doubt about the matter.

Reparation—Illegal apprehension—Apprehension without a warrant.—In an action of damages for illegal apprehension brought by a seaman against a sergeant of police, the pursuer averred that while he was engaged in regular employment on board a trading steamer he had been arrested by the defender, without a warrant, on a charge of having received 10s. 7d. six months previously by false representations; and that the defender, having handcuffed the pursuer, took him from Leith (where he had been arrested) to Edinburgh and thence to Falkirk, where he was tried and acquitted. Held that the action was relevant.

 by the rules of which he was entitled to an allowance not exceeding £2, on account of the loss of clothes, through shipwreck or fire on board ship; that in June 1892 (not having had an opportunity of doing so earlier) he applied to Mr Cowie, the secretary of the Grangemouth branch of the Union, being the branch at which he paid his subscriptions, for an allowance in respect of the loss of clothes through shipwreck in March 1891; that in July 1892 Mr Cowie admitted the claim to the extent of £1, 10s., but deducted from that the sum of 19s. 5d., as being arrears due by the pursuer to the Union, leaving 10s. 7d., which was remitted to the pursuer. (Cond. 5) "The pursuer was thereafter employed as a seaman on board the new steamship 'Durward,' belonging to Leith. During the month of October 1892 the defender T. D. Rennie, who acts as organising secretary for the defenders the Sailors and Firemen's Union, accompanied by the defender James Black, secretary of the said Union at Leith, called upon the pursuer at the said ship, then lying in the Albert Dock, Leith. Mr Rennie stated to the pursuer that he had received a shipwreck allowance on false statements, and that he would require to pay it back. The pursuer denied the charge, and declined to pay back the allowance . . . Mr Rennie returned in about ten days afterwards, and again asked pursuer if he did not intend to pay back the money. The pursuer again declined, whereupon the defender Rennie stated he had the authority of the officials of the Union to prosecute the pursuer, which he threatened would now be done. The pursuer still declined to make any payment to the Union, and Mr Rennie then left." (Cond. 6) "On or about Tuesday, 15th November, the pursuer was engaged at his duties on board the 'Durward,' then lying in Leith Docks, when he was called on shore by a man whom he afterwards found to be the defender Alexander Burt. The said defender was dressed in plain clothes, and was accompanied by the said defender Black. The defender Alexander Burt asked the pursuer to accompany him to the Union Office, which the pursuer refused to do unless one of the ship's officers was made aware of the fact that he was leaving his duties. The defender Black then informed the second officer of the vessel that the pursuer was being taken to the Union Office on a charge of receiving money on false representations, and that he would return in an hour and a-half and let him know whether the pursuer would be detained or not." (Cond. 7) "The pursuer accordingly accompanied the parties above mentioned to the Union Office, where some conversation took place as to matters in respect of which the charge was made. The pursuer objected to being kept waiting in the office an indefinite time, and asked the said defenders whether they had a warrant for his apprehension. To this the defender Burt replied, 'I am the warrant.' During the time that the pursuer was being detained at the said office, the first officer of the vessel arrived and inquired what they were going to do with the pursuer, as he would require to ship another man if the pursuer was not promptly released. The pursuer is unable to say what passed between the first officer and the defenders Burt, Black, and Cowie; but the result of it was that the first officer left the office, and, as the pursuer afterwards learned, engaged a man to take his place. Pursuer was detained a considerable time in the said office until after the arrival of the defender Mr Cowie, who stated his version of what took place in June 1892 when the pursuer made his claim, which the pursuer contradicted upon every material point." (Cond. 8) "The pursuer was then taken in charge by the defender Burt. As he wanted his clothes out of the ship, he was accompanied to the 'Durward' by the defenders Burt and Cowie, where he got his clothes, which were left at the Union Office.

Oct. 28, 1893.
 Leask v. Burt.

No. 11. He was then taken by the defenders Burt and Cowie to the police-office at Leith, and, on the instructions of the said defender Burt, was locked up in a cell by one of the Leith police. On the defender Burt's return several hours afterwards, the pursuer was taken out of the cell, handcuffed by the said defender Burt, and taken by him on a tramcar to Edinburgh, and thence by rail to Falkirk, where he was locked up for the night in the police-office, without food and without bed or covering of any description." The pursuer then averred that on the following morning he was charged, in the Sheriff Court at Falkirk, with fraud, on the allegation that he had obtained 10s. 7d. from Cowie on false pretences; that he pleaded not guilty, and was admitted to bail; and that he was tried on 18th November, when the Sheriff-substitute found the charge not proven. (Cond. 12) "The whole of the said proceedings were wrongous, irregular, nimious, and oppressive. The pursuer was apprehended on 15th November without a warrant of any kind, and was subjected to the indignity of being taken through the public streets in Leith and Edinburgh in custody, and of being detained in the police cells, both at Leith and at Falkirk, without a warrant of any kind having been first obtained from the proper authorities. The said Alexander Burt, in apprehending and detaining the pursuer in the manner above mentioned without legal warrant, and in treating him in the manner before described, acted wrongously and oppressively." The pursuer pleaded;—The defenders having apprehended the pursuer, or caused him to be apprehended illegally and without warrant, are liable for the loss that he has sustained through the said apprehension.

The defender Burt admitted the substantial accuracy of the pursuer's statements in conds. 6, 7, and 8, "subject to the explanations that the pursuer was only handcuffed for a short part of the journey, viz., between Leith and Edinburgh, and that he was supplied with food and drink by this defender at Edinburgh station. Denied that in Falkirk police-office the pursuer was without food, bed, or covering of any description." The defender further stated, that on 14th November he was instructed by his superior officer, Superintendent M'Donald, to go to Leith next morning, and, if prima facie evidence of the alleged charge of fraud against the pursuer (which had been intimated to the defender) was forthcoming, to arrest the pursuer. "It was known to this defender and his superior officer that the pursuer's ship was to leave Leith on 15th November. This defender accordingly went to Leith on the morning of the 15th and saw Mr Black and Mr Cowie, and the latter having distinctly stated the said charge of fraud against the pursuer, and the detailed grounds thereof, this defender, after having seen the pursuer, and having had a prima facie case of fraud disclosed against him, arrested him in conformity with the instructions he had received from his superior officer as above explained, and conveyed him to Falkirk. This defender acted throughout upon the instructions of his superior officer, and in good faith, and he had reasonable grounds for apprehending the pursuer."

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant as against this defender. (2) This defender's whole actings having been legal and proper, he should be assolizied. (3) This defender having acted throughout under the instructions of his superior officer, and in good faith, and with reasonable grounds for his proceedings, ought to be assolizied.

On 16th October 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) repelled the first plea in law for the defender, and appointed a day for the adjustment of issues.*

The defender Burt reclaimed, and argued;—The arrest here, although without a warrant, was legal. A policeman was entitled to arrest without a warrant if the circumstances justified that course.¹ Here the defender was justified. He acted in good faith and on the instructions of his superior officer; and he did not apprehend until he had investigated the case, and found that the pursuer was on the point of leaving the country. In any case the pursuer must aver malice and want of probable cause.

Leask v. Burt.

The pursuer was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—There is no doubt that it is established law, as stated by Hume II. 76, that a police-constable, if he has witnessed a felony being committed, or has immediate information from others who are sure of the fact, may arrest without a warrant. But this case does not resemble those mentioned by Hume in the least. There was here an allegation against the pursuer of having committed a fraud six months before by receiving ten shillings and sevenpence by false representations, and the case stated by Mr Dundas amounted to this that a police-constable, acting on the instruction of his superior officer, is entitled to leave his own county and go into another county, and there practically take precognitions, and if satisfied in his own mind that there are good grounds for doing so, arrest the suspected person. That seems to me an extremely inadvisable method of proceeding even if it fell within the letter of the law, which I cannot hold that it does.

The authorities referred to by Mr Dundas do not seem to me to bear upon the present case. In the case of Peggie, 7 Macph. 89, the pursuer had collected some money on behalf of another person, and in place of handing it over to its owner he admitted to the police-constable who apprehended him that he had appropriated part of it to his own purposes, and merely alleged that he intended to refund it if he was allowed time. In such a case it was reasonable to assume that more of the money would have been spent if the constable had not apprehended the man. Besides it is to be observed that the decision in that case was not a decision upon relevancy, but was pronounced after all the facts had been ascertained. In the case of Young, 18 R. 825, the police-constables had direct authority under the Local Police Act to make the arrest, and what was complained of was not so much the fact of the arrest as the harsh way in which it was said to have been carried out. Neither of these cases therefore has any bearing on the present.

The only other ground taken up on behalf of the defender was that the pursuer when he was arrested intended to abscond from justice. That is a defence which cannot well be considered on a question of relevancy, for it almost of necessity arises on the defender's statement, since a man is hardly likely to state facts which involve the inference that he intended to abscond from justice. Here, we have nothing beyond this that the pursuer was a seaman who for some months before the arrest had been regularly employed on trading voyages between this country and the Continent, and to say that a seaman who is on case against the defender Burt, who is a sergeant of police in the Stirlingshire constabulary. The case stated against Burt is not merely that he apprehended the pursuer without a warrant in circumstances which, prima facie, do not seem to justify such a proceeding, but that he apprehended him in Leith, which is in another jurisdiction than that in which he was entitled to act, without any authority from a magistrate of that jurisdiction. . . ."

No. 11. the eve of starting on one of his regular trips is on that account to be assumed to have the intention of absconding from justice, is absurd. But even if he had been going away on that voyage without any intention of returning, I can find nothing to shew that there was no time to get a regular warrant before the ship sailed. It is, however, quite plain that with reference to this six months old offence the only person whose authority was considered to be of any importance was this police-constable, who took the precognition, and after he had satisfied himself with the result of his investigations, proceeded to arrest the pursuer. On the whole matter I think that the pursuer has stated a relevant case.

Oct. 28, 1893.
Leask v. Burt.

LORD YOUNG.—I must own that I think this a very clear and indeed gross case. It is a general rule of our law that no one in this country, man or woman, is to be deprived of his or her liberty without a warrant from a magistrate. That is the general rule, which no doubt is subject to certain pretty well defined exceptions. One clear exception occurs where the Police Acts of large towns give wide powers to police-constables to apprehend although they may have no warrant from a magistrate, and of this we have an example in one of the cases which were cited to us, where the police-constables were empowered to apprehend and take into custody, although without a warrant, women who are known to be of bad fame and are importuning men on the street. Another example of the same sort is to be found where the Police Act of a town empowers the police-constables to apprehend without a warrant persons whom they suspect of an intention to commit crime. But the exceptions to the general rule, that no one shall be apprehended without a warrant, are by no means confined to police-officers or to statutory exceptions. A very familiar class of exceptions—and one not at all confined to police-officers—is exemplified in the right to apprehend anyone who is found in the act of committing an offence against one's self. A man who is attacked on the street, or who even without any violence being used towards himself finds the hands of another man in his pocket, is entitled to seize and detain the aggressor although he has no written warrant from a magistrate for doing so. That is an exception which the common law recognises, and any police-constable, on being informed of the occurrence is entitled to give what aid he can in securing the apprehension of the offender, and that right is not confined to police-constables but extends to any citizen. The cases are familiar to the Court both here and in Glasgow, or in any other large town, of passers-by interfering, as they are entitled to do, and assisting and taking into custody persons who have been caught in the act of robbing a man, or in the commission of any similar crime. These are all exceptions which are recognised because they commend themselves to the common-sense of mankind. But the proposition here is that a sailor, who is suspected of having obtained ten shillings and sevenpence upon false representations six months before, may be seized without a warrant by a sergeant of police, when on board the ship which has been his ordinary place of business for the intervening six months, may be handcuffed, taken by this policeman first to Edinburgh and then on to Falkirk, and there locked up for the night in the police-office without food, or bed, or covering of any description. This last statement is said not to be true, but it is averred. The suggestion that it is not necessary in such circumstances to go before a magistrate and state a case, and ask him for a warrant to apprehend and lock up—that all this may be done by a policeman of his own authority or upon the instructions of one of his superior officers—is one of the most extravagant that I have heard submitted to this Court for a long time. The thing is utterly and absolutely illegal. Of the relevancy of this case, therefore, I have no doubt.

 Mitchell & Co.

In April 1893 Duncan, who had held the properties since the date of the disposition, and had transacted with them as authorised by the minute, sold them by private bargain to William Mitchell & Company, wood-merchants, Leith, and as the title tendered a conveyance granted by himself only. Mitchell & Company declined to accept the conveyance offered, maintaining that the deed should be granted not only by Duncan but by the trustee on Stewart's sequestrated estates, with the consent of the commissioners thereon, the consent and concurrence of a majority in number and value of Stewart's ordinary creditors and of the Accountant of Court having also been obtained.

Duncan then raised this action against Mitchell & Company for decree ordaining the defenders to implement the contract of sale by accepting a valid disposition executed by the pursuer, and alternatively for £500 as damages for breach of contract.

The pursuer pleaded, inter alia;—(1) In respect of said contract of sale contained in said letters, and the disposition tendered by the pursuer to the defenders, the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. (2) On a sound construction of the disposition in favour of the pursuer, and relative minute, the pursuer is entitled to dispense to a purchaser the subjects described in the summons without the consent of any other party.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the disposition in favour of the pursuer, and relative minute of agreement, the pursuer is not entitled by himself to sell the said subjects by private bargain. (2) The pursuer being only a security-holder of said subjects, a private sale by him thereof can only be effected under the conditions imposed by the Bankruptcy Acts.

On 14th July 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns against the defenders in terms of the first conclusion of the summons: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses."

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The minute of agreement did not give the creditor here direct and express power of sale by private bargain, and by recording the minute of agreement he lost the position of ex facie absolute proprietor, and became a mere security-holder, who had no power of sale by private bargain without his debtor's consent.¹

duration, and at such rents as he shall agree to, collecting by himself, or any factor or parties appointed by him, and intromitting with the whole rents, feu-duties, and casualties, and other profits of said subjects, feuing out to such person or persons, and at such rate or rates of feu-duty as he shall fix and determine, to be held of himself and his foresaids, the whole or any part or parts, of the said subjects and others still unfeued, and otherwise managing the said subjects and others, and that the execution of this minute of agreement by the said William Duncan shall not in any way affect or prejudice his right to lease, feu, or sell said subjects, or any part thereof, all which powers shall remain as entire as if this minute of agreement had not been entered into, and as if the absolute right of proprietorship and beneficial interest of the said William Duncan, constituted by the said disposition in his favour, had been in no way qualified by this minute of agreement." "Sixth, In the event of the said William Duncan selling the said subjects and others, or any part or portion thereof, which he is specially authorised to do as aforesaid, and that at any time or times, by public roup or private bargain, and with or without advertisement, he shall be bound to account for and pay over to the said William Stewart any balance of the price of said subjects which may remain in his hands after repayment of all advances made and to be made, and of all sums due and to become due, under the various heads specified in the first article hereof. . . ."

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that this case is disposed of by the documents before us. The pursuer, Duncan, got an ex facie absolute disposition to the subjects mentioned in the summons, and under that disposition there is no doubt that he could have sold them by private bargain. But his debtor Stewart and he entered into a minute of agreement, which was recorded, and it is said that his position has been so altered by it that he cannot sell these subjects by private bargain. I find, however, that, according to this minute, Duncan is to have full power over the subjects, and that its execution is not in any way "to affect or prejudice his right to lease, feu, or sell said subjects or any part thereof," that is to say, he is to sell them under the title he has as an ex facie absolute proprietor, because the minute goes on, "all which powers shall remain as entire as if this minute of agreement had not been entered into, and as if the absolute right of proprietorship and beneficial interest of the said William Duncan constituted by the disposition in his favour had been in no way qualified by this minute of agreement." Then the sixth article of the agreement assumes that the pursuer is specially authorised to sell the subjects either by public roup or private bargain. These provisions seem to me to leave the pursuer's position as to selling the subjects as if nothing had been done to affect his position as proprietor. The Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is, in my opinion, right, and I move that we adhere to it.

LORD YOUNG.—It is sufficient for the decision of this case for us to hold that the title offered by the pursuer is a good title, and is sufficient implement of the contract of sale between him and the buyer. I have no objection, however, to saying that the minute of agreement, in my opinion, rightly assumes that a creditor whose security is an ex facie absolute disposition qualified by a recorded back-letter—which this agreement really is—has an absolute power of sale. I do not doubt that the law laid down by Mr Bell is right when he says that the holder of an absolute disposition with a recorded back-bond is in a different position from one whose back-bond is not recorded, but I think that he has a power of sale. If he sells he must, of course, account for the balance of the price after satisfying his debt. But with that the purchaser has no concern, for I repeat, it is sufficient for the decision of this case that the title offered is good ex facie.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of opinion that under this minute of agreement the pursuer is entitled to sell by private bargain.

Process—Jury trial—Verdict—Reparation.—In an action by a widow for damages on account of the death of her husband, which had been caused by a large gate belonging to the defenders falling on him, the defence was that the gate had been nailed up by order of the defenders, they not intending that it should thereafter be used as a gate, and that it had been opened without their knowledge and consent. The presiding Judge told the jury that even if they found that the gate when used as a gate was unsafe, the defenders would not be liable for the accident, if it was proved that it had been shut up by order of the defenders, and had not thereafter been used as a gate with their knowledge and

The jury returned an unanimous verdict for the defenders, but added this rider, as noted by the presiding Judge, "while accepting unanimously the law as laid down by your Lordship, we do not think that a due measure of supervision and care over the gate in question had been exercised by" the defenders. The verdict having been entered for the defenders, the pursuer moved for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted. The Court refused the motion, holding that the rider was not inconsistent with the verdict.

2D DIVISION.
L. Wellwood.

MRS JANE ARMSTRONG or BURNS, widow of Michael Burns, labourer, Glasgow, raised an action against The Steel Company of Scotland, Limited, for £400 as damages on account of the death of her husband. The action was tried before Lord Wellwood and a jury on the issue, whether the pursuer's husband was killed "through the fault of the defenders"?

The evidence led at the trial was to the following effect:—On the north side of the defenders' Blochairn Iron Works in Glasgow was a piece of ground belonging to the defenders on which stood two cottages which they let to persons in their employment. The ground was surrounded by a high sleeper fence, in which was a large wooden gate for carts, which was opened and shut by means of overhead pulleys. About two years before the date of the accident, this gate was nailed up, so that it could not be opened without removing the nails. The occupants of the cottages after that gained entrance to the ground only by means of a wicket-gate at the side of the larger gate. On 26th January 1893 Henry Healy, the defenders' foreman, to whom one of the cottages had been let, brought his furniture in a lorry to the larger gate, and its fastenings having been in some manner removed, he and Burns, the pursuer's husband, shoved the gate open, and admitted the lorry. After the lorry had been taken out again, Healy and Burns tried to pull the gate close, but it fell down and killed Burns. There was evidence that the gate was unsafe if it was to be used as a gate, but there was also evidence that the defenders did not intend it to be so used, and that, as fastened up, it was in a safe condition. There was no evidence that the defenders were aware that the fastenings had been removed on the day in question.

The presiding Judge told the jury that even if they found that the gate, when used as a gate on the occasion in question, was unsafe, the defenders would not be liable if it was proved that they ordered the gate to be nailed up, that it was in fact nailed up, and that it had not been thereafter used as a gate with the knowledge and consent of the defenders. No exception was taken to this direction.

The jury returned this verdict,—“The jury unanimously find for the defenders,” but added this rider to their verdict, as noted by the presiding Judge: “The foreman added that he had been asked to state by the jury that while accepting unanimously the law as laid down by your Lordship, we do not think that a due measure of supervision and care over the gate in question had been exercised by the Steel Company.”

The presiding Judge asked the jury if they understood the direction. They replied that they did. The verdict was then entered for the defenders.

The pursuer moved for a rule to shew cause why a new trial should not be granted, and argued;—The verdict and the rider were inconsistent, the verdict being for the defenders and the rider affirming that they had been in fault. A new trial ought therefore to be granted.¹

LORD WELLWOOD.—In this case there was evidence adduced at the trial that this gate, the fall of which caused the death of the pursuer's husband, was in a defective condition if it was to be used as a gate, but there was also evidence that by the order of the defenders, the Steel Company, the large gate had been nailed up some time before, leaving a wicket-gate for the use of the tenants of the cottages. There was evidence for the defenders also that it was their intention that their tenants should use the wicket-gate as the only means of going to and from their houses, and that the large gate should be kept shut and used as a fence, and that if it had been left in that condition it would have been quite safe.

Burns v. Steel
land, Limited.

I told the jury that even if they found that the gate when used as a gate on the occasion in question was unsafe, the defenders would not be liable for the accident caused by its unfitness if it was proved that they ordered it to be shut up, that it was as a matter of fact shut up, and that it had not thereafter been opened and used as a gate with their knowledge and consent.

I think that the jury quite understood the directions I gave them, and I was not asked to give any other direction, either on matters of fact or on the law.

When the jury returned their verdict, and added the rider to it which has been read to your Lordships, I asked them again if they had understood the directions I gave them. They said that they did, and I then entered the verdict as a verdict for the defenders.

My own impression is that what the jury meant to express by the rider to their verdict was this, that although, according to the law laid down, the defenders were not under any legal obligation to do so, they should, in the opinion of the jury, have kept a closer watch on their tenants, and prevented them from using the gate. Although I cannot say that I agree in this view, there is nothing in the rider inconsistent with the verdict of the jury, which proceeds on this, that no fault inferring legal liability had been proved against the defenders.

I am therefore of opinion that the motion for a rule should be refused.

LORD YOUNG.—I see no cause for granting a rule.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, LORD TRAYNER, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT refused the motion.

Black v. Clay.1ST DIVISION.
Lord Low.

JOHN CLAY was tenant of the farm of Winfield, belonging to John Richardson Black, under a lease for nineteen years "from and after the entry of the said John Clay, which is hereby declared to be to the houses (with the exceptions after mentioned), grass, and fallow land on the 26th day of May in the year 1860, to the arable land in corn crop at the separation of the crop of the same year from the ground, and to the barns and barnyard and two cothouses at Whitsunday 1861, from these periods respectively to be possessed by the said John Clay and his foresaids during the space above written."

The subjects let were described as "All and Whole the farm and lands of Winfield, with the houses thereupon, and pertinents thereof." The stipulated rent was £765, payable at Whitsunday and Martinmas, by equal portions, beginning the first term's payment at Martinmas 1861, and the second term's payment at Whitsunday 1862, and that for the first year's possession of houses, grass, and fallow land from Whitsunday 1860 to Whitsunday 1861, and for corn crop 1861, and so forth yearly and termly thereafter during the currency of this lease.*

The lease was extended by tacit relocation until 1891, and on 29th May in that year the landlord obtained a decree of removing ordaining the defender to remove "from the farm and lands and pertinents of Winfield, that is to say, from the houses (with the exception after mentioned), grass, and fallow land at the term of Whitsunday 1892; from the arable land in corn crop at the separation of the crop of the same year from the ground; and from the barns and barnyard and two cothouses at Whitsunday 1893, and then to leave the said farm and others at the periods respectively before specified void and redd."

The tenant continued to occupy the subjects of his tenancy up to the respective periods specified in the decree.

On 6th June 1892 the tenant sent the landlord a notice of claim under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, for compensation for unexhausted improvements,† in which he stated that it was his intention to claim certain sums on the determination of his tenancy of Winfield, "as to

* The lease contained, inter alia, the following stipulations:—"And in the last year of this lease the landlord or entering tenant shall have power to sow grass seeds with the said John Clay's waygoing crop on that part of the lands which had been summer fallow, turnips, or other drilled green crop in the preceding year, the said John Clay harrowing or rolling in the same in a proper manner, all without charge: And moreover, in the last year of this lease, the said John Clay or his foresaids shall, without any claim or compensation, leave to the landlord or entering tenant land for fallow equal to one-third part of the whole land which shall be in tillage in that year, and that in whole fields as near as the size thereof will admit, which fallow land the landlord or entering tenant shall have power to enter to and plough any time after the Martinmas preceding the said John Clay's removal from the pasture lands as aforesaid: . . . And whereas the outgoing tenant is to be allowed the necessary accommodation for threshing and carrying his last crop to market, the said John Clay and his foresaids shall, in addition to the barns, barnyard, and two cothouses before referred to, have stable room allowed them for two pair of horses, with the straw required for fodder and litter, without any charge, and that until the term of Whitsunday after their removal from the arable land as aforesaid."

† Section 7 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), is as follows:—"Notwithstanding anything in this Act a tenant shall not be entitled to compensation under this Act unless four months at least before the determination of the tenancy he gives notice in writing to the landlord of his intention to make a claim for compensation under this Act."

Black v. Clay.

On 22d June 1892 the tenant served a petition on the landlord, in which he set forth that he occupied the farm of Winfield under a tenancy which expired at Whitsunday 1893, and that he had presented the notice of claim of 6th June 1892, and craved the appointment of a referee in terms of section 2 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1889.

The landlord then presented a note of suspension and interdict against the tenant proceeding with the petition.

He averred that the notice of claim was inept "on the ground of its not having been given 'four months at least before the determination of the tenancy' in terms of the statute. The determination of the tenancy in the present case was the term of Whitsunday 1892, then past, at which term the farm was let to a new tenant. The determination of the tenancy was not postponed in any way by the respondent's occupation of the barns, barnyard, and two cothouses. These were let to him for a limited purpose, viz., the storing and manufacturing of his waygoing crop, and in so far as not required for that purpose have been available to the incoming tenant, and such limited privilege of use is not tenancy in the sense of the statute."

The tenant lodged answers, and pleaded that proper notice had been given.

On 20th July 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) refused the note and found the complainer liable in expenses.*

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is, whether the notice of claim for compensation under the Agricultural Holdings Act, which was given by the respondent on the 6th June 1892, was given timeously,—that is to say, four months before the determination of the tenancy.

"The complainer does not now maintain that the notice required to be given four months before the term of Whitsunday 1892, but he argued that it required to be given four months before the actual separation of the crop of that year. X

"It was held in the case of Strang v. Stuart (14 R. 637) that for the purposes of the Agricultural Holdings Act the determination of the tenancy is when a total determination of the tenancy takes place, and no further possession can be had by the tenant in terms of the lease.

"In the present case the respondent was, in terms of the lease, entitled to retain possession of the barn and cothouses until Whitsunday 1893, and the respondent argued that the determination of the tenancy did not take place until that term. There is force in the argument, but I am not prepared to express an opinion on the point, as I think the notice was timeously given in view of the termination of the respondent's possession under the lease of the arable land.

"I have already said that it was conceded by the complainer that the termination of the possession of the arable land was the point of time to be regarded, but he argued that as the respondent was only entitled to hold the land until the separation of the crop, the actual date when the crop was separated must be ascertained.

"The tenant's claim for compensation under the Act is absolutely lost if he does not give notice four months before the termination of the tenancy, and it must be an anomalous result if the four months fell to be calculated from a date which cannot be ascertained beforehand, but which depended upon the character of the particular season. Thus a tenant might give notice four months before the ordinary time when the crop was secured, and an unusually early harvest might cut him out of his claim. Again, a claim which would be lost if the

The complainer reclaimed, and argued;—The position maintained before the Lord Ordinary was not insisted in. The lease terminated at Whitsunday 1892, and the notice should have been given four months before that date. The old tenant then removed from the houses, &c., and the incoming tenant took his place. There could not be two tenants at the same time of the same farm. Besides, the outgoing tenant would have no opportunity after Whitsunday of spending money on, or otherwise executing, improvements, in respect of which he could claim compensation, and no object would be served by postponing the date of giving notice. His tenancy therefore had determined. He still had a right to come on the land for the purpose of reaping his waygoing crop. But he had that at common law,¹ and the fact that it was also expressed in the lease made no difference. So the right to occupy the barns, &c., was a mere incident. Had he sold the waygoing crop he would have ceased to have these rights. They did not therefore prolong the legal period of the lease. In any view it was idle to say that the lease, in any reasonable sense of that term, was extended till Whitsunday 1893, for the barns, &c., were an infinitesimal part of the whole subjects, and of no real importance. But the question was already decided in favour of the landlord's contentions in *Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun*²; for there it was conclusively settled that the earlier of two terms of removal was to be taken as the expiry or termination of the lease. The terms of the lease in that case and this were practically identical. *Strang v. Stuart*³ was distinguishable, for there it was impossible for the tenant to make out his claim before the later term.

Argued for the respondent;—The Court had to interpret the statute, not the lease. The scheme or policy of the statute was in favour of the respondent's contention. It pointed to there being only one point of time with reference to which the claim fell to be made. That was when tenant gathered his harvest expeditiously might be saved if he was dilatory in the work.

"I think that an ish at the separation of the crop is practically a Martinmas ish. The rent of a farm is due for the crop and possession of each year separately, and the term of Martinmas is regarded as the end of one crop year and the beginning of another. It is assumed on the one hand, that the crop will be secured by Martinmas, and, on the other hand, the tenant has up till Martinmas to secure the crop. No doubt if the crop is secured before Martinmas the incoming tenant could not be refused access to the land for the purpose of ploughing, but the outgoing tenant is entitled to exercise his discretion as to the most suitable time for gathering the harvest. And accordingly, it is not uncommon that the ish and entry of the arable land is made at 'the separation of the crop, or Martinmas,' the two terms being used as synonymous.

"The question, therefore, is whether, it being admitted that the tenancy did not determine until the separation of the crop, notice was timeously given upon the 6th of June? I think that the question must be answered in the affirmative:—(1) Because if there was no specific point of time from which the four months fell to be calculated, but if in every case of this sort the actual date of the separation of the crop had to be ascertained, the statute would be practically inextricable; and (2) because under the lease the respondent had, in my opinion, a title to possess the lands until Martinmas, if he found it necessary or expedient to do so, for the purpose of gathering the crop.

"I am therefore of opinion that the note falls to be refused, with expenses to the respondent."

the tenant was yielding possession of the subjects, for both parties could then best approximately estimate the merits of the claim. It was not too soon for the tenant to include all particulars, and not too late for the landlord to have an opportunity of testing and examining them for himself. "Determination of tenancy" meant when the landlord could call upon the tenant to remove from the whole subjects. The lease could not be said to have terminated by effluxion of time so long as the tenant had a right under it to occupy any portion of the subjects; and it was to be noted in this connection that the whole subjects here were let as a unum quid for one inclusive rent. The terms of the decree of removing obtained by the landlord recognised the subsistence of the lease till Whitsunday 1893, and it was idle, in the face of the plain language of the contract, to say that the rights of the tenant after Whitsunday 1892 were merely incidental, and independent of the lease. Notice, therefore, four months before Whitsunday 1893 would have been sufficient; multo magis, the notice actually given was timeous. According to the complainer's view of the Act, if the landlord were to give notice of a claim fourteen days after Whitsunday 1893, in respect of the buildings occupied by the tenant up to that date being dilapidated, the latter would be entitled to say that notice should have been given twelve months sooner, which was absurd, for the buildings at Whitsunday 1892 might have been in excellent preservation. *Strang v. Stuart*¹ was exactly in point, and should be followed. It was in accord with the view taken by the English Court of a similar clause.² *Wight's case*³ was totally irrelevant in construing the statute, for it decided only the construction of a particular clause in a particular contract. Besides, the words under construction there were entirely different, and fell to be interpreted in the light of the whole lease, which very clearly shewed that they pointed to the earliest possible termination of the lease. Had the lease and the present statute fallen to be construed together, the decision would have been different.

At advising,—

LORD M'LAREN.—This is a reclaiming note against the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in a process of suspension and interdict instituted in this Court for the purpose of restraining the respondent John Clay, lately tenant on the suspender's farm of Winfield, Berwickshire, from proceeding with a petition to the Sheriff for the appointment of a referee under the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883. The suspender maintains that the respondent is not in a position to enforce his claims for the value of unexhausted improvements, in respect that the notice of claim given to the suspender was not given four months before the "determination of the tenancy," and the validity of the objection depends on the ascertainment of the point of time at which the lease is, within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, determined.

In the argument addressed to us the complainer relied mainly on the authority of the decision in Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun, a decision depending on the construction of a written contract, and which was said to be capable of application to the cognate question which arises on the construction of this statute. It may be convenient to consider, first, what would be the true principle of construction to be applied to the statute, supposing there were no decisions to guide us in this matter.

No. 14.

Nov. 7, 1893.
Black v. Clay.

No. 14. The respondent's holding is, or was, a lease for nineteen years of a farm which is partly arable and partly pastoral, and which is therefore, as regards tenure and entry, to be classed as an arable farm. According to universal custom there is for such farms a duplicate entry, which results from this, that entry to arable land can only be given at or after the separation of the crop from the ground, while considerations of convenience have led to the term of Whitsunday being generally chosen for the entry to houses and pasture. We know that there are differences of local custom as to which of these entries shall precede the other. We are familiar with leases which fix the entries to the houses and to the arable land respectively as at Whitsunday and separation of the crop of the same year; and we know that it is usual in certain localities to give entry first to the arable land, the occupation of the house being deferred to the Whitsunday following. The lease in question is peculiar in this respect, that it contains three distinct entries—that is, an entry to the houses (with the exceptions after mentioned), grass, and fallow lands on the 26th of May 1860, to the arable land in corn crop at the separation of the crop of the same year from the ground, and to the barns and barnyard and two cothouses at Whitsunday 1861. It is declared that the location for nineteen years is to be “from these periods respectively,” and again in a later clause, under the head of accommodation for the outgoing tenant, it is provided that Mr Clay and his forebears “shall, in addition to the barns, barnyard, and two cothouses before referred to, have stable room allowed them for two pairs of horses, with the straw required for fodder and litter, without any charge, and that until the term of Whitsunday after their removal from the arable land as aforesaid.”

The question then is, which of these three terms is to be taken as the “determination of tenancy” from which the time for giving notice is to be reckoned? The statute says (sec. 42), that “determination of tenancy” means the termination of the lease “by reason of effluxion of time or from any other cause,” but as has been before observed, this definition does not make the matter any clearer, because the possession under the lease terminates at different times. But in construing the statute it is important to observe (1) that there is no limit fixed as to the time within which improvements may be made for which the tenant shall have a claim; and (2) if we assume that the last term of removal is the one most probably intended, we must follow this construction consistently in all cases, and irrespective of whether the latter term be Whitsunday or Martinmas, or any other date. The statute contemplates that the notice to be given by the tenant to the landlord should embrace (if the tenant desired it), all improvements which had been made by the tenant within the currency of the lease; but this object could not very well be attained under a lease in which the successive terms of removal extend over a whole year, if the tenant were put under the obligation to give notice four months prior to the first of these terms, or sixteen months before the actual termination of the lease according to the ordinary use of language.

It was objected that where the last of the prescribed terms of removal is the separation of the crop from the ground, this could not be the term from which notice is to be reckoned, because it is an indefinite time, and represents the end of a series of agricultural operations rather than a term certain. But it seems to me that this objection is directed not so much against one particular construction of the statute as against the statute itself, because if the alternative view were taken that notice must be given four months before the earliest period of removal then the objection would apply to the ascertainment of the period in leases like that in Strang v. Stuart, where the entry is to the arable land at Martinmas, and to the houses and grass at the Whitsunday following. The answer is, and there is authority for the proposition, that the tenant is understood to have until Martinmas to reap and ingather the crop of the arable land, and that the second legal term for payment of rent is Martinmas, because according to all the authorities that is the term at which the crop is supposed to be fully reaped. The reason why the expression "separation of the crop" is used in the clauses relating to entry and removal is that the incoming tenant may have access to each field as soon as its crop has been ingathered, and shall not be liable to be kept out of possession by a troublesome outgoing tenant in the assertion of a theoretical right to retain possession until Martinmas. But this construction is quite consistent with Martinmas being the autumnal term wherever it is necessary that something to be done in fulfilment of the lease should be referred to a definite day, payment of rent being a clear case in point. I have therefore no difficulty in holding that where notice has to be given four months before the autumnal term the term of Martinmas is the time from which the period of four months is to be reckoned.

It has already been found by a decision of the Second Division of the Court that where a lease prescribes two terms of removal the later term is the one from which the period of notice is to be reckoned. I refer to the case of Strang v. Stuart, where the principle is distinctly announced in the opening sentences of the Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion. His Lordship there observes,—“The statute says that the notice must be given four months at least before the determination of the tenancy, and it seems to me that the statute would be entirely inextricable unless there were a specific point. It can only mean one point, and I think that the just and reasonable interpretation to put upon the words ‘determination of the tenancy’ is the period after which no possession can be had by the tenant in terms of the lease.” The same construction has been put upon the corresponding provision of the English statute, passed for the same purpose, in the English case—In re Paul, 24 Q. B. Div. Now in the case of Strang v. Stuart the tenant's possession of the houses and grass terminated as usual at Whitsunday, and his possession of the arable land terminated at the separation of the crop preceding that term, and I think that in the present case, where the possession of the arable land ceases at a period subsequent to the term of removal from the houses and grass, the Lord Ordinary has rightly applied the decision by holding that the notice which was given four months before Martinmas is a sufficient notice under the statute.

There remains for consideration the argument that was maintained to us, founded on the concurring decisions of the Court of Session and the House of Lords in Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun. That was a decision on the construction of a lease for nineteen years, renewable in perpetuity on notice of renewal being given by the tenant to the landlord. The notice was to be given “at least twelve months before the expiry of the above term of nineteen years,” and by the terms of the lease the entry to the arable lands was at the separation of the crop subsequent to the Whitsunday entry for houses and pasture. The notice given was held to be insufficient, because it was not given twelve months before the Whitsunday term, when the tenant's possession of the houses and pasture came to an end. The construction there put upon the obligation to give notice was therefore different from the construction which I suggest as the true construction of the statutory obligation in the Agricultural Holdings Act, and it is proper to notice that amongst the reasons given by the Lord Chancellor for the judgment, his Lordship refers to the difficulty of determining what precise time is meant by the separation of the crop from the ground in the alternative view of the case of notice being reckoned from the term of entry to the arable lands. But Lord Wensleydale, as I read his Lordship's opinion, construed the obligation as meaning that notice must be given at the earlier term, because the intention was that the landlord should have a year to look out for another tenant in the event of the lease not being renewed, and in this view the other Judges of the Appellate Court concurred. Now, if this be the true ground of judgment, the case of Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun is an authority entirely consistent with the judgment which I propose, because the principle suggested by Lord Wensleydale is this, that when there are two terms of entry or removal, and the words of the obligation are indifferently applicable to either of these, we are to look to the purpose and motive of the obligation to ascertain which view is the more consistent with the intention of the parties. This is also the principle announced in the passage which I have quoted from the Lord Justice-Clerk's judgment in Strang v. Stuart, but as the motive of the statutory requirement of notice was altogether dissimilar to that of the contract in Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun, it follows quite legitimately that the last term or last "determination of the tenancy" is to be taken as the term to which notice is referred in accordance with the policy and intention of the statute.

I have only to add that in my apprehension this is a very unfavourable case for maintaining the argument that the notice ought to have relation to the Whitsunday entry, because not only is the tenant to remain six months longer in possession of the arable lands, but as I have shewn, he is to have possession of a substantial part of the subject for a whole year subsequent to his surrender of the house and pasture, which accordingly cannot in any real sense be regarded as the termination or determination of his right under the contract of location.

LORD KINNEAR.—The ground on which this reclaiming note was supported was not maintained before the Lord Ordinary in the Outer-House, because his Lordship says that "the complainer does not now maintain that the notice required to be given four months before the term of Whitsunday 1892." But the point which was not maintained in the Outer-House was the only point which was seriously argued here. On that point I agree with Lord M'Laren that the case is ruled by the case of Strang v. Stuart in the other Division, 14 R. 637, and I think also that the decision of the Queen's Bench Division in the case of In re Paul, 24 Q. B. D. 247, is very much in point. The observations of Mr Justice Matthew in that case appear to me to have a very direct application to the circumstances of the present case, because if the construction which the reclaimer proposes were to be adopted, a tenant would be in a position to deteriorate the lands for a period of twelve months, and the landlord would be altogether precluded from claiming compensation.

The LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Proof on question of jurisdiction—Sheriff—Ultra vires—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), secs. 26 and 30.—Held that it is ultra vires of a Sheriff to consider the question of jurisdiction in a petition for sequestration until the diet to which the debtor is cited, under sec. 26 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, to shew cause why sequestration should not be awarded.

In a petition for sequestration a Sheriff, before granting warrant to cite the debtor, who lodged a caveat with objections to the jurisdiction, allowed a proof on that point. Thereafter he pronounced an interlocutor in which he repelled the plea of no jurisdiction, and quoad ultra granted the usual warrant to cite the debtor. In an appeal held that the interlocutors of the Sheriff, in so far as they dealt with the question of jurisdiction, were incompetent, and fell to be recalled, but that the last interlocutor quoad ultra should be affirmed.

ON 5th September 1893 John Alfred Hope, Carlisle, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court, Glasgow, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, for warrant to cite Robert Macdougall, "property-agent, Glasgow," to shew cause why his estates should not be sequestrated, and for diligence "to recover evidence of notour bankruptcy and other facts necessary to be established."

Bill-Chamber.
1st Division.
Lord Trayner.

The petitioner pleaded;—The defender being notour bankrupt and unable to pay his debts, and having carried on business for a year before the date hereof in Glasgow, in the county of Lanark, the pursuer, who is his creditor to the extent foresaid [£615, 9s.], is entitled to apply for sequestration of his estates.

Macdougall lodged a caveat, and on 5th September the Sheriff-substitute (Murray) appointed 7th September as a diet for disposing thereof. Thereafter Macdougall lodged a note of objections objecting to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, "on the ground that he [Macdougall] is not subject thereto in terms of the Bankruptcy Statutes."

On 7th September the Sheriff allowed the note of objections to be received, and allowed parties a proof as to the jurisdiction.

On 11th September the Sheriff (Spens) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard evidence, finds respondent has been carrying on business in Glasgow within the twelve months preceding the date of presentation of this petition, therefore repels the plea of no jurisdiction: Quoad ultra, having considered the foregoing petition, with the writs produced, grants warrant to cite, in terms of the statutes, the therein designed Robert Macdougall to appear in Court on an inducia of seven days from the date of such citation, to shew cause why sequestration of his estates should not be awarded: Directs intimation of this warrant, and of the diet of appearance on the said inducia, to be forthwith made in the Edinburgh Gazette in terms of the statute; and grants diligence against witnesses and havers to recover evidence of the notour bankruptcy of the said Robert Macdougall, and of the other facts necessary to be established for obtaining the sequestration."

On the same day Macdougall appealed to the First Division, and on 29th September the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Trayner) dismissed the appeal, and affirmed the deliverance of the Sheriff.

Macdougall reclaimed to the First Division.

The respondent objected to the competency of the proceedings in the Sheriff Court, on the ground that the Sheriff was bound, under sec. 26 of the Act of 1856,* to grant warrant to cite and to recover documents when the petition was first before him, and it was not until the stage of the sequestration set forth in sec. 30, i.e., when the debtor had to appear before the Sheriff to shew cause why sequestration should not be awarded that the question of jurisdiction could be considered by the Sheriff, and a proof on the question allowed. On the merits he maintained that the Sheriff was right.

The appellant maintained that the procedure taken by the Sheriff was competent. The Sheriff, before he took any action in a petition for sequestration, was bound to satisfy himself that he had jurisdiction to entertain the cause at all. He was right in proceeding to do this at the earliest possible stage after he knew that there was a doubt on the question.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—In this case a petition was presented in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire by John Hope against Robert Macdougall praying for sequestration of the estates of the latter under the Bankruptcy Act of 1856. The prayer of the petition was in the usual form, viz., for warrant to cite Macdougall, and to grant diligence to recover evidence of the defender's notour bankruptcy, and "other facts necessary to be established." The defender, it appears, had lodged a caveat in the Sheriff Court, and in consideration of that the Sheriff, on 5th September last, appointed the 7th September "as a diet for disposing of the caveat." The parties met on the 7th, and the defender apparently produced a note of objections in which he objected to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff. On that date the Sheriff-substitute allowed the note of objections to be received, and allowed parties "a proof on the question of jurisdiction." Proof was accordingly led, and on 11th September the Sheriff-substitute pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard evidence, finds respondent has been carrying on business in Glasgow, within the twelve months preceding the date of presentation of this petition, therefore repels the plea of no jurisdiction: Quoad ultra, having considered the foregoing petition with the writs produced, grants warrant to cite, in terms of the statutes, the therein designed Robert Macdougall to appear in Court on an induciae of seven days from the date of such citation, to shew cause why sequestration of his estates should not be awarded: Directs intimation of this warrant, and of the diet of appearance on the said induciae, to be forthwith made in the Edinburgh Gazette in terms of the statute; and grants diligence against witnesses and havers to recover evidence of the notour bankruptcy of the said Robert Macdougall, and of the other facts necessary to be established for obtaining the sequestration." Now, it appears to me that the proceedings of the Sheriff in pronouncing the interlocutors of the 5th and 7th September, and the first part of the interlocutor of the 11th, were quite incompetent and ultra vires. The jurisdiction of a Sheriff in bankruptcy cases is entirely statutory, he has no common law jurisdiction in such proceedings. He must therefore walk strictly in the path laid down by the Act. Now, it appears to me that the statute very clearly points out what the Sheriff should do when a petition for sequestration is first before him. The procedure is regulated by sec. 26 of the Act, which provides that when, as here, a petition for sequestration is presented without the consent of the debtor the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff "shall grant warrant to cite the debtor . . . to shew cause why sequestration should not be awarded, and the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff shall, if desired, grant diligence to recover evidence of the notour bankruptcy or other facts necessary to be established." Now, one of the "other facts necessary to be established" is the fact that the alleged debtor is subject to the jurisdiction of the Court in which the petition is presented. No. 15.

The further procedure is provided by sec. 30 of the Act,—“Where the petition is not by or with the concurrence of the debtor, . . . and if the debtor . . . do not appear at the diet of appearance . . . and shew cause why the sequestration cannot be competently awarded, . . . the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff, on production of evidence of the citation and of the foresaid requisites for sequestration, shall award sequestration in manner and to the effect before mentioned.” That is the opportunity given by the statute for such objections being taken as we have here. The petitioner cannot succeed in getting sequestration of his debtor's estates unless he produces evidence of the citation and of the “foresaid requisites for sequestration.” Now, if the debtor says at that time,—I am not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court, and if the petitioner has not ready evidence to prove the jurisdiction, then proof may be required, but that—and not the earlier stage—is the time for producing it. What the Sheriff has done here is to divide the matter into two parts, and he has taken a separate proof at the first stage of the sequestration, which the statute does not allow. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutors to which I have already referred were incompetent and ultra vires. Nov. 7, 1893.
Hope v.
Macdougall.

That being so, the question comes to be, what are we to do now? Your Lordships will observe that of the last interlocutor of the Sheriff one part, the first, is incompetent, and the rest competent. In these circumstances, I find authority in the case of Reid v. Strathie, June 29, 1887, 14 R. 847, for the course which I propose should be pursued. There objection was taken to certain votes given for the election of the trustee. The Sheriff-substitute sustained or repelled some of the objections, but with regard to one objection taken by a Mr Reid he allowed a proof at large. That interlocutor was appealed to this Court, and the Court were of opinion that the Sheriff's interlocutor was final as regarded the objections repelled or sustained, but incompetent so far as it allowed a proof at large. Now there, though the stage of the sequestration was different from the present, we had an interlocutor which was partly competent and partly incompetent. The Lord President (Ingles) there said of the interlocutor under appeal,—“That interlocutor disposes of various objections which were stated, and it is in the usual form and in terms of the statute down to and including that part which repels the objection to the vote of Ross Robertson Auld and others. But then it deals with one objection stated by Reid to the vote of Thomas Anderson, merchant, Glasgow, which he was not in the position instantly to verify. In these circumstances the Sheriff-substitute, instead of repelling the objection as he ought to have done, allows Mr Robert Reid a proof of his averments, and to Mr David Strathie a conjunct probation. Now, it has been decided in several cases, to which I need not separately refer, that such allowance of proof is incompetent, and, having in view these authorities, that part of the interlocutor is beyond the power and jurisdiction of the Sheriff, and is not within the statute. That error being thus before us, I think our course is to quash that part of the interlocutor ante omnia. It is obvious that if the Sheriff-substitute had not fallen into the mistake of allowing a proof, he would have proceeded in ordinary course to declare one of the candidates duly elected, and we ought therefore to send back the case to the Sheriff-substitute to complete the interlocutor.” I am of opinion that we ought to follow that course here. I accordingly propose that we should recall as incompetent the interlocutors of 5th and 7th September, and that part of the interlocutor of the 11th which deals with the question of jurisdiction, and quoad ultra affirm that interlocutor. I may add that, while I propose that, I do not indicate that we differ in the least from the result arrived at by the Sheriff on the jurisdiction. On the contrary, if it had been competent for us or the Sheriff to consider the question at that stage, I should have concurred, but as that is ultra vires, so much of the interlocutor must be recalled.

LORD M'LAREN, LORD KINNAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the reclaiming note for the pursuer against the interlocutor of Lord Trayner, dated 29th September 1893, and heard counsel for the parties, Recall the said interlocutor: Further recall as incompetent the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 5th and 7th September 1893, and also the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute, dated 11th September 1893, in so far as it 'finds respondent has been carrying on business in Glasgow within the twelve months preceding the date of presentation of this petition'; and 'repels the plea of no jurisdiction': Quoad ultra adhere to said last-mentioned interlocutor, and decern: Find the respondent (petitioner) entitled to expenses, and remit the account thereof to the Auditor to tax and to report to the Sheriff; and remit to the Sheriff to proceed, with power to decern for the taxed amount of said expenses."

Sheriff—Appeal—Competency—Arbitration—Nomination of arbiter—Glasgow District Subway Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. c. clxii.), sec. 56.—Under a private Act of Parliament all differences arising with regard to the carrying out of certain operations in a city were to be referred to an arbiter mutually agreed on by the promoters of the Act and the Corporation, and "failing such agreement" to an arbiter appointed "by the Sheriff of the county of Lanark." The Corporation presented a petition to the Sheriff, praying him to appoint an arbiter, which he did by an interlocutor in the ordinary form. Held that in doing so he was not acting in his judicial capacity, and that, therefore, an appeal to the Court of Session was incompetent.

1ST DIVISION.
Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

BY the Glasgow District Subway Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. clxii.), the Glasgow District Subway Company were authorised to make certain subways, &c. in Glasgow.

Section 56 of the Act provides that "if the Corporation and the company shall differ upon or with reference to any plans, elevations, sections, or other particulars which under the provisions of the Act are to be delivered by the company to the Corporation, or as to the mode of carrying out the same, or as to any other matter or thing arising out of the said plans, elevations, sections, or other particulars, or any of the provisions of the Act, every such difference shall, on the application of the company or of the Corporation, be referred to the determination of an arbitrator, to be mutually agreed upon before the construction of the subways and works thereby authorised is commenced, and failing such agreement, as may be appointed on the requisition of any of the parties named in said section by the Sheriff of the county of Lanark; and such arbitrator shall have power to determine the matter in difference, and the costs of and incident to the reference shall be paid by the company." No. 16.

On 14th July 1893 the Corporation presented an application "to the Honourable the Sheriff of the county of Lanark," in which they stated "That no arbitrator was mutually agreed upon by the Corporation and the company before the construction of the said subways and works authorised by the said Act was commenced. That as certain differences are on the eve of arising between the Corporation and the company with reference to the implement by the latter of the obligations imposed upon them by the before-recited sections of their said Act, it is necessary that an arbitrator should now be appointed in terms of the said Act for the purpose of deciding such differences, and any other differences which may arise between the Corporation and the company with reference to any of the other provisions of the said Act in which the Corporation are interested."

Magistrates of

trict Subway
Co.

The prayer of the application was,—“May it therefore please your Lordship, upon considering this application, to appoint an arbitrator in terms of the said Act, for the purpose of determining all and any differences which may arise between the Corporation and the company under the same.”

On 8th August the Sheriff pronounced this order,—“Having heard the agents for the Corporation of Glasgow and the Glasgow District Subway Company, and considered the foregoing petition, appoints Professor Archibald Barr, of the University, Glasgow, as arbitrator, in terms of the Act referred to in the petition.”

The company appealed to the First Division of the Court of Session, and the note of appeal was marked as lodged by the Sheriff-clerk-depute of the county.

At the hearing of the cause it was admitted that the petition did not pass through the Sheriff-clerk's office when it was originally presented.

The respondents objected to the competency of the appeal, and argued ; The proper form of review of the Sheriff's deliverance was either a reduction or suspension. The Sheriff when acting under the 56th section was not acting in his judicial capacity ; it was a mere matter of chance that he was chosen under the Act as the person to appoint an arbiter ; it might equally have been any other person, e.g., the chairman of the Chamber of Commerce. Had it been provided that any such person was to appoint the arbiter, an appeal could clearly not have been taken. There was no record kept of the proceedings before the Sheriff, and the finding could not be extracted. The petition was not brought in the ordinary Sheriff Court form, and all the Sheriff had done was to exercise a discretion given him by the statute. An appeal from a Sheriff was only competent where in former days advocacy was competent, and advocacy was never competent in such circumstances as the present, where the Sheriff was exercising his discretion, and where no extractable judgment had been pronounced.¹ There was no instance of appeal in such cases ; all such findings had been reviewed by suspension or reduction.²

Argued for the appellants ;—The appeal was competent. Under the Act the Sheriff could only exercise the power of appointing an arbiter on certain contingencies arising, viz., on differences arising between the parties before the works commenced, and on the parties failing to agree upon an arbiter. Now, the company had never been asked to agree upon an arbiter, and therefore the Sheriff had no power to pronounce any finding. This was not a case of the Court interfering with the Sheriff's discretion, it was a case of the Court stepping in where a Sheriff had acted without having jurisdiction. The Legislature had invoked a well-known judicature in giving the Sheriff of the county the power of nomination, and it was therefore presumed that the ordinary forms in use in the Courts of that judicature would be used. In such cases advocacy would formerly have been competent.¹

LORD PRESIDENT.—In my opinion this appeal is incompetent.

The duty imposed on the Sheriff by the statute is that of nominating an arbitrator; and the question is whether, in the intention of the Legislature, this was to be a judicial proceeding, to take place in the Sheriff Court, and with a consequent right of appeal to the Court of Session. In its nature the nomination of an arbitrator does not seem a piece of business requiring or suitable to such procedure. Nor does the selection of the Sheriff, as the person vested with the choice, at all imply that he is to act in a judicial character. The Sheriff is an administrative as well as a judicial officer, and there are incumbent upon him numerous duties which are not performed in his Court. It seems to me that the matter now in question is not a piece of Sheriff Court business, and the mere circumstances that the party asking the Sheriff to name an arbitrator approached him in a petition, and that his nomination is expressed in the style of an interlocutor, cannot invest with a judicial character an act which has not that legal quality.

It is hardly necessary to say that if the Sheriff, as the donee of this power of nomination, has acted ultra vires, the parties have the same remedies as if the nomination had been with any other public officer or any individual. All that we have now to decide is whether the challenge of the nomination can be made by appeal, and in my judgment it cannot.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

Police—Public health—Assessment—Special sewer-rate—Jurisdiction—Ultra vires—General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), secs. 75 and 96 to 100.—In 1886 the police commissioners of a burgh imposed a special sewer-rate, under secs. 96 to 100 of the General Police and Improvement Act, 1862, on the owners of heritages within a district of the burgh. In 1891 a ratepayer within the district, who had paid the special sewer-rate for the previous years without objection, declined to pay the rate for 1891-2 (being the last year of the special sewer-rate). The police commissioners brought an action in the Sheriff Court against him for payment of the amount. Opinions (per the Lord Justice-Clerk, Lord Young, and Lord Trayner) that the questions raised could only be determined by a petition, under sec. 75 of the Act, to the Sheriff, whose decision under that section was final.

By the Hamilton Burgh Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. cap. cxxxvii.), sec. 136, 2D DIVISION. it was enacted that the burgh should, from and after 1st January 1879, be divided into two drainage districts, one of which—district No. 2—should consist of the district annexed to the burgh by the Act, and that the police commissioners should take the necessary steps for the efficient drainage of the annexed district, and for carrying out therein the provisions of clauses 96 to 100 of the General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862,* which Act was, by section 3 of the Burgh Act, declared, Sheriff of Lanarkshire.

* The General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 101), clause 75, occurring in Part I. of the Act, enacts,—“Accounts of all property, heritable and moveable, vested in the commissioners, shewing the nature of such property and of all money received and disbursed, shall be kept in books by the treasurer or collector as the commissioners may appoint, and all such books of accounts may at all seasonable times be inspected and perused without fee or reward by any person assessed, and also by any person entitled to any money due and owing on the credit of such assessment, and such persons may take copies of or extracts from any such books and accounts without fee or reward, . . . and in case any person who shall be assessed shall be dissatisfied with any accounts which shall have been made up as aforesaid, or with any of the items or articles contained in such accounts, such person may complain against the same by petition to the Sheriff, in which complaint shall be specified the grounds of objection to such accounts, items, or articles; and the Sheriff shall proceed to hear and determine the matter of such complaint, and his decision shall be final.”

Clause 96 (clauses 96 to 100 constituting subdivision 1 of section II. of Part II. of the Act) authorised the police commissioners to charge and assess rates on the owners of all lands and premises liable to contribute to rates for making new sewers special sewer-rates over and above any other assessments or rates, and such rates were to be called the ‘special sewer-rate.’

Clause 99 enacts,—“The commissioners . . . shall cause separate and distinct accounts to be kept of all moneys collected and received under any rate in each distinct district, and of all payments and disbursements in respect thereof, and they shall apply the moneys to be collected and received from each distinct district under any such rate as aforesaid for the several purposes to which the same may be lawfully applied under the authority of this Act, but so nevertheless that each district shall as near as may be bear its own expenses; and in case any such expenses shall apply to or be incurred in respect of two or more districts, the same shall be apportioned and divided between such districts in such manner as the commissioners shall consider fair and equitable.”

Clause 106 (occurring in subdivision 4 of section II. of Part II.) enacts,—“The said rates or assessments may be imposed and levied yearly, half-yearly, or at such other periods as the commissioners may think fit, and shall be payable at such times as they appoint; and at the meeting imposing the same the commissioners shall appoint a day on which such rates or assessments shall be payable, and another day on which appeals by any parties complaining that they have been improperly rated or assessed may be lodged with the clerk or collector, and another day or days on which appeals in reference to such rates or assessments shall be heard by the commissioners, and notice to each party intended except in so far as inconsistent with or varied by the Burgh Act, to be held to have been adopted in and to apply to the whole burgh.

Thereafter the police commissioners constructed a drainage system for district No. 2, and imposed a special sewer-rate on owners of 1s. per £1 per annum on the rental of all properties within the district. The special sewer-rate was first imposed in 1886.

In 1891 John Finlay, who, as factor, drew the rents of certain properties in district No. 2, and as such was the owner of these properties within the meaning of the General Police Act, 1862, declined to pay the special sewer-rate imposed on these properties for the year 1891-2—in all £54, 14s.

William Pollok and P. M. Kirkpatrick, the clerks to and as representing the police commissioners, thereupon raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Hamilton for payment of the amount of the rate.

Finlay, in defence, stated,—(Stat. 9) “ . . . The whole costs and charges of and connected with” the drainage of district No. 2 “ have already been paid and discharged by the special sewer-rates levied on and recovered from the owners of lands and premises within said district (including the defender) prior to the period to which the rate or assessment now sued for is applicable.” (Stat. 10) “ A considerable portion of the moneys entered and charged by the police commissioners as applicable to drainage district No. 2 does not apply to that district at all, but has been expended on drainage and other works executed by them outwith the bounds of that district, and for the expense of which the owners of lands and premises in said district (including the defender) are not liable.” (Stat. 13) “ Numerous other sums for payment of which the commissioners have no authority under the Burgh Act or the General Police Act to impose special sewer-rates on owners of lands or premises in district No. 2 have been entered and charged by them in the general drainage account applicable to said drainage district. A copy of said ‘ No. 2 Drainage Account ’ (annexed district) is herewith produced.” (Stat. 14) “ Further, since the commissioners constructed the new sewer or sewers in district No. 2, a large number of houses and other buildings have been erected in said district, and the commissioners have exacted and recovered from the owners thereof a very considerable amount in name of ‘ a reasonable sum of money for the use of the sewers,’ in conformity with section 190 of the General Police Act. These sums of money ought to have been credited to the drainage account of said district, thereby reducing the amount of the special sewer-rates, but instead of so doing the commissioners have applied the same to other purposes, contrary to the meaning and intent of the said General Police Act.” (Stat. 16) “ On a fair and equitable application of the sewer-rates, and the reasonable sums above mentioned, paid by the owners of lands or premises within the district in question, the defender avers that the whole expense of making and constructing new sewers in said district has not only been fully paid and extinguished by the special sewer-rates or assessments levied on them prior to the year 1889-1890, but that a considerable sum has been exacted from such owners, including the deto be so rated or assessed stating the particulars of the intended rate or assessment as regards such party, and specifying the several days fixed by the commissioners as aforesaid, shall be sent by the clerk or collector through the post-office at least two weeks preceding the day which may be fixed for hearing the appeal of such party, and the decision of the commissioners upon all such appeals shall be final, but the commissioners may rectify such rate or assessment so appealed against.”

fender, in excess of the amount which the commissioners were entitled by the statute to recover from them for that purpose." No. 17.

In answer, the pursuers, in substance, pleaded that these averments were irrelevant, at least as a defence to the present action. They stated that 1891-92 would be the last year of the special sewer-rate. Nov. 8, 1893.
Hamilton
Police Commissioners v.
Finlay.

On 4th April 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Davidson) pronounced this interlocutor:—(After certain findings not necessary to be quoted) "(4) Quoad ultra, finds that the charges made by the pursuers are proper, and within the powers conferred upon them by the said statutes: Therefore finds them entitled to the sums sued for in the prayer of the petition."

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry), on 10th July, adhered.

The defender appealed, and argued;—Section 75 of the General Police Act, 1862, did not apply to special sewer-rates, but only to the general rates leviable under the Act. It was true that special sewer-rates were not expressly excluded from the operation of section 75, but it was the fair inference from the relative position of the two sections in the Act. In any event, the question raised here did not belong to the class of questions contemplated by section 75, which, fairly construed, referred to ordinary objections as to the statement of the accounts, nor did it belong to the objections referred to in section 106, which related to objections to particular assessments upon individuals. The question here belonged to neither category, for it truly was this, whether the assessment for 1891-92 ought to have been imposed at all? If the defender's averments were well founded it ought not, and the pursuers in imposing it had acted ultra vires. Such a question was competently raised in an action for payment of the assessment.¹

The argument for the pursuers sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case must be dealt with here on the same footing as in the Court below, and on the record as stated there. What might have been the result as regards the rights of ratepayers who say that an assessment has been laid on without statutory authority, either because there is no authority at all to impose the particular assessment, or because it has been imposed on the wrong people, we are not here called on to determine. It may be that the question of the validity of such an assessment may be brought here by an action of reduction or otherwise. But I do not find any case of that description on this record. Going over the defender's statements step by step, I think that they amount to no more than a series of objections to the use made of the money raised by the assessments. It appears on the face of the Act of Parliament that as regards all the revenues of the burgh accounts are to be kept which are open to the inspection of the ratepayers, who may state objections to them in the manner provided by the statute. Mr Campbell attempted to draw a distinction between the present special assessment and the general revenue of the burgh, but he candidly admitted that there was no express provision excluding the application of clause 75 from assessments collected under clause 106, and I am unable to find anything from which by reasonable implication such an exclusion is to be implied. These assessments are just part of the burgh revenue, and objections stated to the accounts kept of them fall within the operation of clause 75, just like the accounts kept with reference to the other

Hamilton
Police Commissioners v.
Finlay.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that there is no ground for interfering with the judgment of the Sheriff here. The case relates to a special sewer-rate which has been imposed by the Police Commissioners of Hamilton upon the proprietors in district No. 2 of the two rating districts into which Hamilton is divided. That rate has been imposed by the commissioners since 1886, and we are informed that the rate for the year 1891-92, and payable on 15th December 1891, is the last that is to be imposed on district No. 2. The defender is a house-factor, who represents several owners of property in district No. 2, and he objects on their account to pay this last instalment. He paid the previous instalments without objection, but he now objects to the last, and generally on the ground that if the accounts were properly made up, so as to shew the works upon which the produce of the rates was expended, and also so as to give credit for certain special rates upon houses newly erected, it would be found that there was no balance due, with regard to which the commissioners are empowered under the statute to impose the special rate. Now, I do not think that, in answer to an action for recovery of a rate imposed in December 1891, this defence can be allowed. It is clear enough that a rate-raising and rate-spending body like the Commissioners of Police of Hamilton may be called upon to account for the employment of money which they have raised by assessment, and that any error which they may have committed, by applying the money to improper purposes, or by not crediting a particular district with money which ought to have been put to the credit of that special district, or any other error, may be rectified; and if the Act of Parliament does not make special provision for such rectification, I do not doubt that the common law will provide the means of correcting the error. In the present instance, I rather think that section 75 of the General Police Act of 1862 does provide a special method of rectification, by enacting that a person who has any objection to the accounts may appeal to the Sheriff, whose decision is to be final. That is a very reasonable and expedient provision, because it is certainly undesirable to have actions of count, reckoning, and payment, or of declarator in the Supreme Court, concerning such a matter.

Now, the accounts of these commissioners have been kept in the manner provided by the statute, and are open to the inspection of all persons assessed, and this particular defender could, in an application to the Sheriff under section 75, have stated any objections to the accounts that he thought fitting, so as to affect the balance which the commissioners are entitled to raise by means of assessment. He did not take that course. Then there is this further provision in the Act, that if any person objects to an assessment his objection is to be made the subject of an appeal to the commissioners whose decision is also declared to be final, but there was no such appeal by the defender. I am disposed, therefore, to hold that if his objections are to be taken as being objections to the accounts of the commissioners they cannot be considered in this Court, but only in an application to the Sheriff under section 75 of the Act; and that if the objections are objections to the assessment levied upon the defender, then they can be made only in the expedient and economical manner, both in time and in money, provided by the Act of Parliament.

Mr Campbell used the expression that the commissioners had acted ultra vires. Well, if the proper body to expend money expend it in an improper manner, by devoting it to an improper object, which they, in the exercise of an erroneous judgment consider to be a matter to which they may fairly devote the money, or if they make erroneous entries in their accounts, that is wrong, and you may say that it is ultra vires, but then if their action is wrong it is, I think, a wrong of precisely that character which, under this statute, if objection is taken, is to be the subject of litigation before the Sheriff, or of precisely that character which may be the subject of an appeal to the commissioners. I cannot hold that upon the mere use of the expression ultra vires we can entertain a defence of this character to an action for payment of this assessment. The inexpediency of such a course is obvious. The defender here is in no different position from all the other, I suppose numerous, ratepayers in this district No. 2 who are liable for this special sewer-rate. Their legal position is just the same as his, and if it is open to him to do so, they may all, by using the expression ultra vires, become defenders in an action for recovery of the assessment. Now, I do not think that could be allowed. If there had been no special remedy provided by the statute, then the common law would provide the means of calling the commissioners to account for their expenditure. But in this case I think that the statute has provided a special remedy.

Hamilton
Police Commissioners v.
Finlay.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—As I read the record, I understand that it is not maintained that the assessment in question is illegal,—that is to say, it is not disputed that the commissioners have power to impose it. The only ground which the appellant puts forward as exempting him from payment I understand to be this—that if the commissioners had properly applied the money in their hands, there would have been no need of an assessment. I think that that is not a good defence to an action for payment of an assessment. If the statement is true, it may possibly give the defender a right to repetition from the commissioners of the sums improperly paid by him, but it is not a ground which entitles him to refuse payment of the assessment in the first instance. I go no further than this.

LORD TRAYNER.—I think that the objections stated by the defender to the demand upon him resolve themselves into objections to the manner in which the commissioners have stated their accounts. I have gone over the statements of the defender, and I can find no other grounds for his defence than this, that if sums improperly inserted in the debit side of the accounts were deducted, and that if sums already paid were credited to the account, the assessment has been sufficiently provided for. I think that such objections to items of or omissions from the accounts are preeminently objections of the class contemplated by section 75 of the General Police Act, and under that section the judgment of anybody but the Sheriff is excluded.

Administration of justice—Custody of child—Contempt of Court—Sequestration of estate—Judicial factor.—A father presented a petition for the custody of his child, and obtained decree against A B, ordaining her to deliver the child to him. A B having failed to obey the decree, the father presented a second petition praying the Court to ordain A B to appear personally at the bar, and in the event of her failing so to do to sequester her estate, to appoint a judicial factor thereon, and to interdict the trustees on a trust-estate in which she had an interest from paying to or on behalf of A B any of the trust funds otherwise than to the judicial factor. A B having failed to appear at the bar, the Court, being of opinion that she was acting in contempt of Court, granted the petition.

1st Division. In September 1893 James Glen Edgar, plumber, Glasgow, presented a petition in the Bill-Chamber against Margaret Fisher, the child's maternal aunt, for the custody of his daughter Everina Burns Edgar.

Intimation and service were ordered by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills, and on 7th September the petition was served personally on Margaret Fisher. No answers were lodged, and on 21st September the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Kinnear), after hearing counsel for the petitioner on the question whether the Lord Ordinary on the Bills had power to entertain the application,¹ granted an order for delivery of the child to the petitioner.

On 20th October Mr Edgar presented a second petition to the Court in which he stated that, after service of the petition upon her, Margaret Fisher had left her home in Glasgow with the child, and that the petitioner had reason to believe that they had gone to England. The pursuer further stated that Margaret Fisher had a large interest in the trust-estate of her father, the late George Fisher.

The petitioner craved the Court to order intimation and service upon Margaret Fisher, and to ordain her to appear personally at the bar, and to bring with her and deliver up the petitioner's child; and in the event of her failing to appear on the day appointed, to sequester her whole property in Scotland, and to interdict George Fisher's trustees from making payment to her.

On 21st October, the Court ordered intimation and service as craved. As Margaret Fisher could not be found, personal service upon her was not effected. No answers were lodged.

On 4th November counsel for the petitioner moved the Court to conjoin the two petitions, and without ordaining Margaret Fisher to appear at the bar at once to grant sequestration as craved.² This course he stated was adopted in England in similar circumstances.³

The Court pronounced an interlocutor ordaining Margaret Fisher to appear personally at the bar on 10th November, and interdicting Mr Fisher's trustees from making any payment to her out of the trust funds until the further order of the Court.

Owing to Margaret Fisher's residence remaining unknown, it was found impossible to intimate this order to her personally. It was, however, intimated to her agent and to M'Killop and Dunbar, her co-trustees, and a copy was left at her usual residence in Glasgow. She made no appear-

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the respondent in this petition is in manifest contempt of Court, and she appears to have gone away for the purpose of avoiding the orders of Court. In those circumstances, I think the Court has power to sequester her estate.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following order:—" . . . The respondent Margaret Fisher having failed to appear in obedience to the order of the Court contained in the interlocutor of 4th November 1893, on the motion of counsel for the petitioner conjoin therewith the petition at the instance of the present petitioner dated 5th September 1893; sequester the whole property, means, estate, and effects situate in Scotland belonging to the respondent Margaret Fisher in terms of the prayer of the petition of date 20th October 1893, and the rents, income, or proceeds thereof, and nominate and appoint J. Judicial Factor—Petition for delivery of bond of caution—Remit to Accountant of Court—Procedure—Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 39), secs. 6 and 20.—In 1893 the judicial factor on a trust-estate, who was appointed in 1877, and whose factory did not fall under the Pupils Protection Act, 1849, presented a petition for delivery of his bond of caution, stating that his duties had come to an end, and that he had obtained a discharge from the beneficiary, which he produced. He did not ask for a judicial discharge. The Court refused to grant a warrant without first making a remit to the Accountant of Court to examine the factor's accounts.

Observed that the effect of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889, is to subject all factories alike to the supervision of the Accountant of Court, and that it is in his discretion to say whether a full audit may be dispensed with.

1st Division.
Ld. Kyllachy.

ROBERT EASTON AITKEN, C.A., Glasgow, who had been appointed on 3d February 1877 judicial factor to administer a trust fund of £300, presented a petition to the Court of Session for delivery of his bond of caution. He stated that the fund had been duly administered by him in terms of the trust-deed, and he produced a discharge by the beneficiary entitled to the fund, to whom it had been paid over on his coming of age.

No answers were lodged, and the petitioner moved for a warrant de plano to the Accountant of Court to deliver up his bond of caution.

On 8th August the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor, in which he remitted "to the Accountant of Court to examine and audit the account of the factor, with the relative vouchers, and to report; and in respect that the petitioner objects to the said remit as an innovation on the practice previous to the passing of the Judicial Factors Act of 1889, and desires leave to have the procedure authoritatively settled, grants leave to reclaim."*

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued;—It had been the invariable practice of the Court prior to the passing of the Judicial Factors Act of 1889, where an extrajudicial discharge was produced by the factor, and he did not ask a judicial discharge, but merely delivery of his bond of caution, to make the order de plano without a remit.¹ This practice had been departed from since the passing of the Judicial Factors Act of 1889, with the result that great additional expense was caused, especially where the factory had been in existence for some time, and that was a

* The Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 39), sec. 6, provides,—“In addition to the factors specified in the recited Act of 1849” [Pupils Protection Act] “the Accountant shall superintend the conduct of all other factors and persons already appointed or to be appointed by the Court.”

Sec. 20,—“Section 23 of the Pupils Protection Act shall be held to apply to all factories brought under the supervision of the Accountant by virtue of this Act.”

The Pupils Protection Act, 1849 (12 and 13 Vict. cap. 51), section 23, “And be it enacted in regard to all factories constituted before the passing of this Act that any settlement made of any such factory, though informal, shall be held as a prima facie discharge to the factor, and the Accountant shall not report the same as a subsisting factory . . . and in any such factory in which, though there has been no settlement, it shall appear that no benefit is likely to be derived by the parties interested in the estate from further proceeding therein . . . the Accountant shall . . . state in his report that further proceedings are for the present unadvisable.”

great hardship where the estate was a small one. In this case the fund was under £300, and the factory had been in existence since 1877, necessitating an examination by the Accountant of the accounts for each year since then. It was a different case where the factory had been under the supervision of the Accountant from the first, and the audit would only cover the portions of the year which had elapsed since the date of the last audit. Here the estate had been handed over, and no good purpose would be served by the audit.

LORD ADAM.—Prior to the passing of the Judicial Factors Act of 1889 the practice of the Court with reference to petitions of this kind varied according as the factor came under the provisions of the Pupils Protection Act or was outside that Act. If the factor was under the Pupils Protection Act his accounts were always remitted to the Accountant of Court to be audited, but if he did not come under that Act it was the custom to remit to an independent man of business to make that audit, if a judicial discharge was asked by the factor. If, however, the factor did not desire the security of a judicial discharge, but was content with a private or extrajudicial discharge by the beneficiaries under the trust, the Court was in the habit of dispensing with the remit, and de plano granting warrant for delivery of his bond of caution. I am of opinion that it was the intention of the Legislature, by the passing of the Judicial Factors Act of 1889, that all factors in future should be treated in the same way as those which were formerly under the Pupils Protection Act, viz., that there should be a remit to the Accountant of Court. I am informed that the practice since 1889 is in all such cases now to remit to the Accountant of Court, which makes the practice uniform. This, I think, was what was intended by that Act, and I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is right, and that the practice in future should be the same in all cases.

LORD M'LAREN.—I see no reason for introducing any difference of practice in regard to the auditing of such accounts. The general effect and design of the Judicial Factors Act of 1889 is to place all judicial factories under the supervision of the Accountant of Court, as in the case of factories under the Pupils Protection Act, and I am confirmed in this view by considering section 20 of the Judicial Factors Act of 1889, which deals with exceptional cases, by enacting that section 23 of the Pupils Protection Act shall be "held to apply to all factories brought under the supervision of the Accountant of Court." I think the present question has been provided for in the statutes, and it is for the Accountant of Court to consider whether there is any case for dispensing with a remit,—such as that the estate is so small that it is not desirable to incur the additional expense, or for any other reason which appears to him to be a sufficient ground for departing from the usual course. I see no grounds, therefore, for interfering with the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD KINNEAR and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

Poor—Residential settlement—Chargeability during absence—Rehabilitation—Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sec. 76.
—A woman who had a residential settlement in the parish of Greenock left that parish in September 1881. In April 1884 she became a proper object of parochial relief in the parish of Cardross. Cardross sent notice to the parish of Inverkip, the pursuer's birth parish, and to Greenock. Inverkip admitted liability, and supported the pauper till August 1886, and made no claim against Greenock. The woman supported herself from August 1886 till February 1887, when she again became chargeable. In a question between Inverkip and Greenock with regard to liability for the relief then given, held that the pauper having been absent from Greenock for four years and a day before the commencement of the second period of chargeability, she had lost her residential settlement there, the fact that during her absence she was for a time entitled to parochial relief, and obtained it from another parish, having no bearing on her Greenock settlement.

Beattie v. Adamson, November 23, 1866, 5 Macph. 47, distinguished.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.

THIS was an action at the instance of John Campbell, inspector of poor of the Inverkip district of the parish of Inverkip, against John Strachan Deas, inspector of poor of the parish of Greenock, for payment of £208, being the amount of the advances made by the pursuer on account of Mary Ann Hill from April 1887 to October 1891.

The facts, as stated in a minute of admissions for the parties, were as follows:—

The pauper, Mary Ann Hill, was born in 1856 in the parish of Inverkip. From 1863 she resided with her father in Greenock down to the date of his death in June 1881, by which time he had acquired a residential settlement there. At her father's death the pauper had also a derivative residential settlement in that parish.

In October 1881 she left Greenock, and she never afterwards resided there.

In April 1884 she became a proper object of parochial relief when in the parish of Cardross, and was received into the Dumbarton poorhouse. On 29th October a statutory notice and a formal claim for relief was sent by the Inspector of Cardross to Inverkip. The Inspector of Dumbarton also sent a formal claim to Inverkip and Greenock. In both instances Inverkip admitted liability. Greenock denied liability, and the claim against Greenock was formally withdrawn on 17th November 1885.

The pauper remained an inmate of Dumbarton poorhouse until August 1886, when she left in search of work.

On the 14th February 1887 Hill again became chargeable to the parish of Cardross, and was received into the Dumbarton poorhouse. Inverkip, on receiving a statutory notice and claim from Cardross on 12th March 1887, again admitted liability, and on the same day, for the first time, gave statutory notice to and claimed relief from Greenock. Greenock did not admit liability.

On 14th June 1887 the pauper left Dumbarton poorhouse, and continued from that date onwards to be a proper object of parochial relief. She moved about from parish to parish applying for and receiving relief, and on the relieving parishes claiming against Inverkip, their claims were admitted.

A second statutory notice was given by Inverkip to Greenock on 2d April 1891, and Greenock again denied liability.

The pursuer pleaded ;—(1) The parish of Greenock, as the parish of the pauper's settlement either derivatively from her father, or otherwise in respect of her own residence there, is bound to repay the said advances. No. 20.
Nov. 14, 1893.

The defender pleaded ;—(3) Any residential settlement, if ever possessed by the pauper in the parish of Greenock, having been lost by her absence therefrom for four years, the defender is entitled to absolvitor.* (4) In any event, the defender, having received no notice of the pauper's chargeability for the period between the date of her leaving Dumbarton poor-house and 2d April 1891, is not liable for said period. Inspector of Poor of Inverkip v. Inspector of Poor of Greenock.

On 16th November 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced an interlocutor in which he found, "in respect of the decision of the Court in the case of Beattie v. Adamson, 5 Macph. 47, that the pauper Mary Ann Hill's residential settlement in the parish of Greenock, which was acquired by continuous residence of the pauper's father prior to his death on 17th June 1881, has not been lost by non-residence, and still subsists," and decerned against the defender.†

* The Poor-Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83), sec. 76, enacts,—“That from and after the passing of this Act no person shall be held to have acquired a settlement in any parish or combination by residence therein, unless such person shall have resided for five years continuously in such parish or combination, and shall have maintained himself without having recourse to common begging, either by himself or his family, and without having received or applied for parochial relief; and no person who shall have acquired a settlement by residence in any parish or combination shall be held to have retained such settlement if during any subsequent period of five years he shall not have resided in such parish or combination continuously for at least one year: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be held to affect those persons who, previous to the passing of this Act, shall have acquired a settlement by virtue of a residence of three years, and shall have become proper objects of parochial relief.”

† “OPINION.—In this case the inspector of poor of the parish of Inverkip seeks to recover from the inspector of Greenock repayment of £208, 11s. 11d., being the amount of advances for parochial relief which the parish of Inverkip has made from time to time between 29th April 1887 and 31st October 1891, on behalf of a pauper called Mary Ann Hill.

“The defender's third plea in law is as follows :—(Quotes).

“The material facts of the case are as follows :—The pauper was born in the parish of Inverkip in 1856. Between the years 1863 and 1881 she lived with her father, William Hill, in the parish of Greenock; and at his death on 17th June 1881 she had through him a derivative residential settlement in the parish of Greenock.

“In October 1881 she left the parish of Greenock, and has never resided in it since.

“On 11th April 1884, when she was residing at Cardross, she applied for parochial relief, and on 19th May 1884 she was received into Dumbarton poor-house. It may here be said, once for all, that from that time forward she never ceased to be an object of parochial relief, and never was rehabilitated so as to be no longer entitled to ask for and receive relief. She wandered from parish to parish, always applying for and receiving relief; and on the relieving parishes claiming against the parish of Inverkip, as the parish of birth, their claims were admitted.

“It is admitted that the first statutory notice given by the parish of Inverkip to the parish of Greenock was on 12th March 1887, more than five years after the pauper ceased to reside in Greenock. The question is whether the pauper is to be held to have lost her residential settlement in Greenock by having failed during the period of five years subsequent to October 1881 to reside continuously for one year in that parish; or whether the fact that within the four years immediately after October 1881 she applied for and obtained parochial relief pre-

No. 20.

The defender reclaimed, and the case was twice discussed in the Inner-House. At the first hearing the defender, on the assumption that the vented the loss of her residential settlement in Greenock, although no statutory notice was given by Inverkip to Greenock, and no admission of liability was made by the latter parish.

"During the first discussion in the Procedure-roll I referred the parties to the case of Beattie v. Adamson, November 23, 1866, 5 Macph. 47, which seemed to me to be directly in point. Repeated examination of that case has satisfied me that the same point was there expressly decided adversely to the argument of the present defender; and sitting alone I feel bound to follow that decision, although but for it I should have been disposed to come to a different conclusion.

"The material facts in Beattie v. Adamson were these:—A girl, Elizabeth Clark, born in 1845, resided with her father, an able-bodied man, in the City Parish of Glasgow, where he acquired a settlement by residence. In May 1854 he removed with his family to Barony Parish. In September 1856 he deserted them in Barony Parish and went to England.

"In November 1856 Elizabeth was admitted to the Barony poorhouse, where she remained. On 12th June 1860 Barony Parish sent a statutory notice to the City Parish. The latter denied liability on the ground that Alexander Clark, the father, having lost his settlement in 1859, the settlement was lost both for himself and for his children. They also pleaded that as Clark was an able-bodied man, neither he nor his children were proper objects of parochial relief.

"It is not necessary to follow the case through all its stages. The Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff both assoilzied the City Parish. The cause having been advocated to the Court of Session, the Lord Ordinary, Lord Barcaple, also assoilzied the City Parish, holding that by 12th June 1860, when the first statutory notice was given to the City Parish, Alexander Clark had lost his settlement in that parish, 'and that at the date of the said statutory notice, the said Elizabeth Clark had not either in her own right or in right of her father a legal settlement in the City Parish of Glasgow.' This judgment was recalled by the Second Division of the Court—Lord Cowan dissenting.

"It will be seen from the opinions of the Judges, that two questions had to be considered. The first was whether Elizabeth Clark was to be regarded as being a proper object of parochial relief in her own right. The majority of the Court, on the strength of a minute of admissions which had been lodged by the defender, held that she was a proper object of parochial relief in her own right, to the effect of making her settlement independent of the retention or loss of her father's settlement. With that question we have nothing to do here.

"But holding that she was a proper object of parochial relief in her own right, the majority of the Court further held, that although she had not resided in the City Parish for upwards of five years, her settlement in that parish had not been lost, because in November 1856, when the settlement in the City Parish still subsisted, she became a proper object of parochial relief in Barony Parish.

"I do not find in the report in Macpherson any record of an argument having been addressed to the Court upon the distinction between the two portions of the 76th section of the Act 8 and 9 Vict. c. 83, and perhaps this may account for the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglist) treating that question so briefly. He says, (page 52),—'If her father had received parochial relief in another parish, a failure to reside would not have altered his settlement. Is it otherwise in regard to the child?' And again,—'One view of the Lord Ordinary deserves attention at all events from its novelty. He seems to think that the liability of the City Parish must depend not on the question, when did the child become chargeable, but, when was the statutory notice given to the City Parish. I am quite unable to see any grounds for that opinion. The object of a statutory notice is not to create a settlement, it is merely a compliance with a provision of the case of Beattie v. Adamson, 5 Macph. 47, on which the Lord Ordinary No. 20. founded his judgment, was an authority against him, argued that that Poor-Law Act, that until a relieving parish gives notice, it shall have no right to recover from the parish of settlement the sums advanced. The giving or withholding notice has no effect on the law of settlement. There can be no doubt of the general principle, that the settlement of the pauper when relief is first given, remains the settlement so long as the pauperism continues.

"Lord Cowan, however, who dissented, went very fully into the question. He did not attach the same meaning to the admission in the defender's minute, and therefore was for holding that the father's settlement having been lost by non-residence, Elizabeth Clark had no residential settlement in the City Parish when the statutory notice was given.

"Although, such being his view, he did not find it necessary to express a positive opinion upon the other question, he thus states his views upon it,—'I am unable,' he says, pp. 54-55, 'to dispose of this case on that ground; and therefore I do not require to consider whether the fact of relief having been furnished by another parish during the four years and a day—admitting it to have been to a person so destitute as to require relief from the parish where she for the time resided—could have the effect of obviating the statutory provision that "no person who shall have acquired a settlement by residence in any parish or combination shall be held to have retained such settlement if, during any subsequent period of five years, he shall not have resided in such parish or combination continuously for at least one year."

"'Were it necessary to decide this question I would feel it to be attended with very great difficulty. The words of the statutory provision are not qualified by any condition whatever. The first branch of the section, having reference to the acquisition of a settlement through five years' residence, expressly provides that the person shall have resided for the five years continuously, without having recourse to common begging by himself or his family, and without having received or applied for parochial relief. And in the proviso saving the rights of paupers who prior to the passing of the Act had resided for three years in a parish, it is added, "and have not become proper objects of parochial relief." The part of the statutory provision with which we have to do contains no similar condition. It provides, in absolute terms, for the release of the parish from liability, if during any subsequent period of five years the person shall not have resided in the parish continuously for at least one year.

"'Absence from the parish for five years without such residence is enough to put an end to the residential settlement. It appears to me that this provision cannot be got over by an offer to prove that the pauper had, in another parish at a greater or less distance, been maintaining himself by begging or by having received or applied to some other parish for parochial relief. I cannot import those conditions which are in the first branch of the statute, nor the words which occur in the proviso, into the second branch of the enactment, in itself subject to but one condition. And I hesitate to think, that although the pauper may have been recognised in another parish as an object of parochial relief, and have got such relief without intimation to and without the knowledge of the parish, this of itself is sufficient to keep up the residential settlement, although during the whole period of five years the pauper has never been within the parish, and no chargeability in respect of him or her has been attempted to be fixed upon its funds.

"'There can be no question that the statutory notice is required for the primary purpose of fixing from its date the right to be relieved of advances made to paupers whose settlement is in a different parish from the relieving one. The question of settlement being acquired or not retained depends upon considerations apart from the giving or withholding of notice. But in such a question as we have to deal with in this case, where relief has been given during the currency of four years and a day, while the residential settlement was yet entire, the giving of notice during that period might have important effects in fixing chargeability on the parish of the pauper so relieved. For, having got

No. 20. decision was unsound and should be reconsidered. At the second hearing the question was argued whether Beattie v. Adamson could be distinguished from the present case.

the notice of chargeability, the parochial inspector was bound either to have got the pauper removed to his own parish, or at least to have provided for his maintenance in the parish of his residence. The pauper must thus have become permanently chargeable during the subsistence of his residential settlement, and after that the settlement could not be lost by non-residence, the pauper being supported all the while by the funds of his proper parish, though not resident in it. It is quite a different case when nothing has been heard of the pauper during the whole five years of his absence. The statutory exemption of liability may be well pleaded in such a case, even although some other parish, without fixing the chargeability of the pauper upon the residential settlement, may have come under advances for his support. The parish of the birth must then be resorted to for relief; and should it happen that the pauper has no parish of birth in Scotland, then the relieving parish, as in other cases of the like kind, must bear the burden.'

"Lord Benholme and Lord Neaves concurred in the Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion that the mere fact of a person becoming a proper object of parochial relief in another parish was sufficient without notice to prevent the loss of a residential settlement. For instance, Lord Benholme says (p. 55),—'It is only when a man is not receiving relief—when he remains able-bodied, that his absence for more than one year out of every five causes the loss of his previously acquired industrial settlement. But if a man falls into poverty and gets relief, I do not see that his subsequent non-residence can affect his settlement . . . (p. 56). The date of the notice is not the proper date. The important date is the time when the pauper became chargeable, not when chargeability was announced to the parish of settlement.'

"Such being the grounds of decision, I cannot but hold the case to be directly in point, and as it has never been expressly overruled, I feel bound to follow it.

"As I have already indicated, I should, in the absence of that decision, have been prepared to decide in favour of the defender. Lord Cowan's views as to the meaning and effect of the 76th section of the Poor-Law Act, which I have intentionally quoted at length, so fully express the interpretation which I am disposed to put upon it, that I do not think it necessary to state my own views at any length. I think there is a marked and intentional difference between the two parts of the 76th section of the Poor-Law Act. The part of the clause which deals with the acquisition of a settlement is fenced with certain conditions which are inserted to prevent the acquisition of a residential settlement by persons who beg or require and apply for parochial relief. Now the things which are declared to disqualify and prevent the acquisition of a settlement, viz., begging or receiving or applying for parochial relief on the part of such persons, are matters which are necessarily within the knowledge and under the notice of the parochial authority of the parish of residence.

"Again, as regards the loss of a residential settlement, the one thing to be looked to is continued absence. The parish of residence has nothing to do with, and knows nothing of, the way in which the person who has left it is living and maintaining himself, or is being maintained. Accordingly all that the statute requires to be proved in order to infer loss of settlement is absence for the requisite length of time.

"That seems to be a reasonable construction of the clause, and it must be remembered that the latter provision as to loss of settlement was enacted in order to amend the rule of the older poor-law, that a residential settlement could not be lost until a new one was acquired: The operation of the amending clause would be limited indeed if loss of a settlement were held to be prevented or arrested whenever the person in question was proved to have begged or asked for relief in another parish during the first four years of absence.

"In the case of Johnston v. Black, 13th July 1859, 21 D. 1293, the Court,

The defender argued;—If the Lord Ordinary was right in holding that the question was foreclosed by Beattie v. Adamson,¹ then that decision was unsound and at variance with the provisions of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, and the question should be reconsidered. Section 76² of the Act clearly distinguished between the kinds of residence necessary for the acquisition and for the loss of a settlement. Certain conditions as to not begging, &c., were attached to the former, but not to the latter, which depended solely upon whether or not the pauper had been in fact resident for one year continuously during the five years subsequent to the acquisition.³ If, in fact, he had been absent for four years and a day, it followed; therefore, that the settlement was lost. The fact that a pauper received relief in one parish could not be held constructive residence in another. At all events, the parish of residential settlement was by their decision, countenanced a qualified construction or limitation of the second half of the 76th section. The judgment proceeded on the footing that if before a residential settlement has been lost by non-residence for four years and a day, the person in right of it becomes a proper object of parochial relief, and is relieved by another parish, and if the parish of residence receives statutory notice of such chargeability, and admits liability, the residential settlement will not be lost, although the pauper continues to reside outwith the parish of residence. The ground of judgment apparently was that the parish of residence (Ayton) having admitted liability, it became its duty to remove the pauper, and if it chose to allow the pauper to remain in the relieving parish and pay for him there, the pauper must be held to have been constructively on the roll in the parish of residence from the date of the notice, or at least from the date of admission of liability. Lord Colonsay says (p. 1296),—‘It is contended that all that the statute requires in order to destroy a settlement is absence for five years, or, as it has been construed, absence for any time more than four years. I think it would be very difficult to maintain that proposition abstractly to its greatest extent. If a party has removed from a parish—from Ayton to the parish of Coldingham,—becomes a pauper at the end of a year or two years, is put upon the roll in Coldingham, relief afforded him, and liability admitted by Ayton, I hold him to be in the same position as if he was on their roll.’ The judgment, it will be seen, proceeded expressly on the ground that Ayton, the parish of residence, admitted liability within the four years.

“The case of Johnston v. Black has had a curious record. It does not seem to have been quoted or referred to in Beattie v. Adamson; while in the later case of Cochrane v. Kyd, 16th June 1871, 9 Macph. 836, it was viewed with considerable doubt, although it was not nearly so strong a decision as that in the case of Beattie v. Adamson, which, in its turn, was apparently not alluded to in Cochrane v. Kyd.

“I observe that Mr Guthrie Smith, in his work on Poor-Law, pp. 355 to 357, regards the decision in Johnston v. Black as allowing the greatest qualification of the 76th section permissible; while he simply notes the facts of the case of Beattie v. Adamson and the decision of the Court without comment.

“I have not been given, and I have not found, any further light on that decision (Beattie v. Adamson), and I can only say that, in my opinion, it requires reconsideration.

“I understand that the pursuer is content, if successful, to restrict his claim to £200, 15s. I repel the fourth plea in law for the defender, because, in my opinion, the pauper continued to be a proper object of parochial relief continuously after May 1884, such short intervals in the administration of relief as occurred being due merely to her wandering from parish to parish, and from one poorhouse to another.”

not liable unless it had received the statutory notice within four years and a day from the time the pauper left it.¹ Here Inverkip did not give notice until March 1887. The case of Beattie v. Adamson was not against the defender here, for the facts were not the same. In it there was no break in the chargeability, and it only decided that the pauper's settlement was fixed when the chargeability began, so that it could not be changed so long as that chargeability subsisted. It did not follow that when, after rehabilitation, a subsequent chargeability began, the four years' absence necessary for the loss of the residential settlement was to be counted from the cessation of the first chargeability instead of from the leaving of the parish. There was no warrant for such a view in the statute, which, on the contrary, pointed clearly to the date of the pauper's leaving the parish as the only terminus a quo. When a pauper became chargeable the question of liability fell to be decided with reference to the date at which that chargeability commenced, and not with reference to any previous period of chargeability.² In Innes v. Ironside,³ as in Beattie v. Adamson, there was only one period of chargeability. In Johnston v. Black,⁴ the decision proceeded on an admission of liability. Besides that decision had been doubted.⁵ In the present case, when the second period of chargeability began there could be no doubt that the pauper had been absent for upwards of four years from Greenock, and that was conclusive of the question.

Argued for the pursuer;—The decision in Beattie v. Adamson,⁶ was fatal to the defender's case if well decided. That decision was sound, and supported by other decisions.⁷ The dicta of Lord Cowan and the Lord Ordinary (Barcaple) in it were only obiter so far as adverse to the pursuer in the present case, their judgment being based on other grounds.

The pauper here had a residential settlement in Greenock in 1881. It could only be lost by absence for four years and a day before she became a pauper. On her becoming a pauper in 1884 Greenock was therefore her settlement, and it continued to be her settlement so long as her pauperism lasted. As she had never been rehabilitated it was her settlement still. *Crawford v. Beattie*⁸ was not adverse, for there the pauper had been four years and ten months absent before becoming a pauper. A pauper could neither gain nor lose a settlement. Section 76 of the Poor-Law Act contemplated the same kind of residence as regards gaining or retaining a settlement.⁹ A pauper could not retain a settlement by living on charity for twelve months in the parish of settlement.

Notice of liability to the parish of settlement had to do only with the amount of the liability. The question was when did pauperism commence. Neither had admission of liability any effect in enabling a parish to escape liability. The maxim quod fieri debet infectum valet applied. If otherwise, a parish would be tempted to resist liability till four years and a day had run. But in Innes' case it was decided that if a parish ought to have admitted liability it was the same thing as if it had actually admitted it. No. 20.

When the pauper's chargeability ceased in August 1886 Greenock continued to be the settlement for four years and a day. It was settled law that such new period began to run on chargeability ceasing.¹ This was the basis of decision in Cochrane v. Kyd. A settlement could neither be gained nor lost by piecing together detached periods of industrial residence. If, therefore, during the six months following August 1886 the pauper was rehabilitated, Greenock was still her settlement in February 1887, when she was permanently pauperised. But intervals of a few weeks or months did not amount to rehabilitation.²

The admission of liability by Inverkip to the parishes that gave temporary relief to the pauper could not enure to Greenock.³ Inverkip was the birth parish, and had, therefore, no claim to resist liability to any parish except Greenock.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This is an action brought by the parish of Inverkip against the parish of Greenock to recover the amount of certain advances made, in respect of a pauper of the name of Mary Ann Hill, from 29th April 1887 to 31st October 1891.

The parish of Inverkip is the parish of birth of the pauper. It is not disputed that the pauper had at one time a residential settlement in the parish of Greenock, and the question is whether or not the pauper had retained or lost that settlement when the advances in question were made to her.

The material facts are not in dispute, and will be found in the joint minute of admissions by the parties.

It appears that the pauper was born in the parish of Inverkip in 1856, that she resided with her father in the parish of Greenock from 1863 to 1881, where he had acquired a residential settlement, and that, on his death in June 1881, she then acquired a derivative residential settlement in that parish.

It further appears that she left Greenock in September or October 1881, and that she has never since resided in that parish.

It further appears that in April 1884 the pauper became a proper object of parochial relief when residing in the parish of Cardross, and that on 29th October 1884 statutory notice and a formal claim for relief were sent by that parish both to Inverkip and Greenock; that Inverkip admitted liability, that Greenock denied liability, and that the claim against Greenock by Cardross was formally withdrawn on 17th November 1885.

It further appears that the pauper continued to be a proper object of parochial relief until 19th August 1886, when she left Dumbarton poorhouse in search of work.

Presumably she had found work and became self-supporting, because we hear no more of her until the 14th February 1887, when she again became chargeable to the parish of Cardross. On 12th March 1887 Cardross gave notice to Inverkip and Greenock. Inverkip admitted liability, Greenock did not.

I do not think it necessary to trace the history of this woman further, as from this time onwards she appears to have continued to be a proper object of parochial relief.

From the facts, as I have stated them, it would appear that there is no evidence that the pauper received relief or was a proper object of parochial relief during upwards of five months from August 1886 till February 1887. I think that the presumption is that she was during these months self-supporting, and that the effect of that was to rehabilitate her from her previous state of pauperism. I think, accordingly, that the question which we have to decide in this case is, what was the parish of settlement of the pauper on the 14th February 1887, when she for the second time became chargeable to the parish of Cardross, and whether she had at that date lost or still retained her residential settlement in the parish of Greenock.

That depends on the construction of section 76 of the Poor-Law Act of 1845. The first part of that section provides for acquisition of a settlement by residence, and the second for the retention of a settlement so acquired, and enacts that "no person who shall have acquired a settlement by residence in any parish or combination shall be held to have retained such settlement, if, during any subsequent period of five years, he shall not have resided in such parish or combination continuously for at least one year."

In this case the pauper left Greenock in October or September 1881, upwards of five years before February 1887, the date when she became chargeable as a pauper, and never afterwards resided there. It appears to me, therefore, that she has not fulfilled the condition on which alone she was entitled to retain her settlement in that parish, viz., residence for one year of the five years occurring subsequent to her leaving it.

But it is said by the pursuer that she was in receipt of parochial relief during a part of these five years, and that, if the time during which she so received relief be deducted from the statutory five years, it will be found that the pauper had not lost her residential settlement by reason of non-residence; and he claims to have this deduction of time made, on the ground that the pauper was a proper object of parochial relief, and that in law a person, while a proper object of parochial relief, can neither acquire nor lose a settlement.

The facts are as stated by the pursuer, but I do not think that his proposition in law is well founded.

He maintains, however, that it was so decided in the case of Beattie v. Adamson, and the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that that case is directly in point, and has decided the case adversely to the defender on its authority, at the same time expressing a strong opinion that, but for that case, he would have arrived at a different result.

But his Lordship's opinion as to the authority of Beattie v. Adamson is founded on a view of the facts in this case which I do not think is correct, and which I think cannot be sustained. "On 11th April," he says, "when she,"—that is, the pauper Hill,—“was residing at Cardross, she applied for parochial relief, and on 19th May 1884 she was received into Dumbarton poorhouse. It may be here said, once for all, that from that time forward she never ceased to be an object of parochial relief, and never was rehabilitated so as to be no longer entitled to ask for and receive relief.”

If that was the true state of the facts, they would have been similar to those in Beattie v. Adamson, and I should have come to the same conclusion as his Lordship, because I think that what that case decided was, in the words of the Lord President, "that the settlement of the pauper when relief is first given remains the settlement so long as the pauperism continues," and this, he says, is a general principle of which there can be no doubt. I think that Beattie v. Adamson did no more than apply that rule to the facts of that case, and I think it is a sound rule, and should not be disturbed.

But, as I have pointed out, the pauper in this case ceased subsequent to 1886 to be a subject of parochial relief and had been rehabilitated. We are dealing with the settlement of a pauper in a new pauperism commencing in 1887, and the question is as to the effect to be given to a previously existing state of pauperism in determining that settlement. We are not dealing with facts emerging during an existing pauperism, as in Beattie v. Adamson.

No doubt in that case there are observations by the Judges which touched the question, particularly by Lord Benholme, to the effect that it is only when a man is not receiving relief that his absence for more than one year out of five causes the loss of his previously acquired industrial settlement, and by Lord Cowan to an opposite effect. But I think that the question was neither raised nor decided in that case, and that it is not an authority ruling the present case. That being so, I am of opinion, for the reasons fully and clearly stated by Lord Cowan and by the Lord Ordinary, and which need not be repeated, that the pauper having been absent from the parish of Greenock continuously for upwards of five years has lost her residential settlement in that parish.

With reference to the case of Johnston v. Black, the ground of judgment is, I think, correctly stated by the Lord Ordinary, viz., that it proceeded on the fact that the parish of Ayton had admitted liability within the four years, and that the Court held that the pauper was in the same position as if he had been on their roll, and resident in the parish. It would appear that some doubt has been thrown on the authority of that decision, but however that may be, it is an essentially different case from this, in which liability was repudiated, and that repudiation acquiesced in.

The only other case to which I would refer is that of Crawford v. Beattie, in 24 D. 357.

In that case the pauper had a residential settlement in the Barony Parish of Glasgow. In 1851 he left that parish. In 1854 he became a lunatic, and was supported in an asylum by his friends for one year and ten months, when he became a pauper. The Court held that he had lost his residential settlement in the Barony Parish. In giving judgment, the Lord President said,—“The full period of time prescribed by the statute having elapsed betwixt the date of Biggar's (the pauper) migration and the date of his becoming chargeable, the only question in which the Barony Parish can, under the 76th section of the statute, have an interest is, whether during that interval he did or did not reside in the Barony Parish continuously for at least one year.”

So I think here that the only question in which the parish of Greenock has an interest is, whether the pauper resided continuously in that parish for one year after she left, and as that question cannot be answered in the affirmative, she cannot be held to have retained her settlement, and that consequently the interlocutor should be recalled, and the defender assoilzied.

LORD M'LAREN.—I concur.

LORD KINNEAR.—I concur with Lord Adam, and it is satisfactory to

No. 20. know that the Lord Ordinary would have come to the same conclusion if he had not thought himself precluded by the decision in Beattie v. Adamson from giving effect to his own opinion. I agree with Lord Adam that that decision is not in point. There certainly are observations to be found in the opinions of the learned Judges, and particularly in the opinions of Lord Cowan and Lord Benholme, which may seem to support the interpretation of the decision which the Lord Ordinary has adopted. But then Lord Cowan dissented from the judgment, considering that it necessarily involved propositions which I think the majority of the Court would have agreed with him in rejecting. Lord Benholme's observations must be read with reference to the special facts of the case and to the previous opinion which had been delivered by the Lord Justice-Clerk, the late Lord President. It appears to me that the true grounds of judgment must be sought in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk and in the interlocutor of the Court; and going to these sources I agree with Lord Adam that the decision does not support the doctrine which the Lord Ordinary supposes, viz., that the mere fact of a person obtaining relief during the statutory period of non-residence will prevent the loss of a residential settlement. The points which were raised for decision in the case of Beattie v. Adamson are very clearly brought out in the Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion. In the first place, the Court held, as matter of fact, that the child of an able-bodied man had become in its own right a proper object of relief in respect of the state either of her body or of her mind, or of both. The child being a proper object of relief in its own right, the question came to be whether a derivative settlement which she had acquired through her father when she first obtained relief had been lost by her father's subsequent non-residence; and, apart from the specialty I have just mentioned—with which we have no concern here—the case appears to me to have decided three things. In the first place, that when a child has acquired a derivative settlement from its father that becomes its own settlement to all intents and purposes. That proposition had been established by previous decisions. It is the first step in the argument of the Lord Justice-Clerk towards the conclusion at which he ultimately arrived. Second, that no loss of settlement by an able-bodied father can in any way affect the settlement of the child who has become a proper object of parochial relief. And third, that the settlement of a pauper, being a proper object of relief, remains his settlement so long as the pauperism continues. I do not think that any other legal propositions but these are laid down in the opinion of the Lord Justice-Clerk. He begins by considering the special question which I have adverted to, whether the child was a proper object of relief in its own right or not, and then having answered that question in the affirmative he goes on to ask what was the child's settlement when she first obtained relief. As to that there was no question. Then he says,—“But then it is said further that in 1888 or 1889 her father lost that settlement by allowing five years to pass by without residing twelve months in the City Parish.” And his answer to the argument founded upon that proposition is that if the child had followed the father's settlement there might have been a question. Then he says,—“No loss of settlement by the father who continues able-bodied can in any way affect the settlement of the child who has become a proper object of relief. Therefore, it appears to me that the City Parish was the settlement of the child when she became chargeable, and will remain so as long as she continues chargeable.” Then his Lordship goes on in the last sentence of his opinion to lay down the general principle that the settlement of the pauper when relief is first given remains the settlement so long as the pauperism continues. The interlocutor contains a series of findings to the same effect, and it is quite impossible to extract from any of them any support whatever for the conclusion which the Lord Ordinary rightly rejects, that the mere fact of a person receiving parochial relief in one parish is sufficient to prevent the loss of a residential settlement previously acquired in another. Now, that decision being inapplicable, because the pauperism, as Lord Adam has explained, had ceased for a time, I agree with his Lordship that there can be no question at all as to the proper application of the statute to the circumstances of the present case.

Bill of Exchange—Denial of signature—Suspension—Caution.—A person who had been charged upon a bill bearing his name as acceptor presented a note of suspension of the charge on the ground that he had not adhibited or authorised the signature.

Nov. 14, 1893.

Kechans v.

Circumstances in which the Court passed the note without caution.

THOMAS BARR, wine and spirit-merchant, Glasgow, was charged at the instance of William Kechans, merchant, Lanark, to pay the sum of £1000, being the amount of a bill at twelve months, dated 3d June 1892, upon which his name appeared as an acceptor, along with those of George Moffat and of three other persons. He brought a suspension of the charge, in which he alleged that he had not adhibited his name to the bill, or authorised anyone to do so for him.

Bill-Chamber.
1st Division.
Lord Low.

On 28th June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Low) ordered answers, and appointed "the charger to produce the bill charged on, and the complainer to produce genuine subscriptions in real transactions bearing his signature of date prior to the charge."

In his answers the charger denied the complainer's material averments, and "explained that, in the beginning of June 1892, George Moffat . . . was indebted to him in a sum of £1000. For this sum the respondent agreed to draw upon Moffat a bill of exchange, dated 3d June 1892, payable twelve months after date, on the condition that certain friends of Moffat's should sign the bill as co-obligants. The bill in question was accordingly sent to Moffat for acceptance by him and his friends, and, in due course, the respondent received it back accepted by Moffat, the complainer, and the other three persons mentioned. The respondent had no reason to doubt the genuineness of any of the signatures. Moffat had previously granted bills in favour of the respondent, for sums due by him, and had obtained the signatures to said bills of the same parties, including the complainer, as co-acceptors with him. . . . On 20th June the protest was duly registered in the Books of Council and Session. The acceptors of the bill, including the complainer, were then charged on the extract registered protest, to pay the sum therein, with the result that this suspension has been brought, being the first intimation to the respondent that the validity of any of the signatures was challenged. If the complainer did not in fact adhibit his signature to the bill in question, as to which the respondent has no knowledge, and makes no admission, it is averred that he authorised this signature to be adhibited. At all events the complainer became aware, long before it became due, of the existence of said bill, and of the fact that his signature was on it as an acceptor, but he took no exception to same, and only challenged it after Moffat, who was his son-in-law, had been sequestered. He thereby ratified and adopted his signature, assuming it to be unauthorised, as genuine, or, at all events, he is now precluded, as in a question with the respondent, from pleading that the signature is not binding."

He further explained at the bar that he had held two other bills purporting to be signed by the complainer, which had been acknowledged as valid instruments, but he admitted that the signatures upon them did not resemble that upon the bill founded upon.

The complainer produced a sheet of paper, upon which he had written subsequent to the date of the charge his signature, and that signature was manifestly unlike the signature upon the bill founded on. He explained that he was a very old man, that he could not write well, and that consequently he had no earlier signatures to exhibit; that in the case of the other bills he had authorised the bank to accept the signature of his wife, but that here he had given no such authority.

On 18th July the Lord Ordinary passed the note without caution.

The charger reclaimed, and argued;—The Lord Ordinary had proceeded on the older cases,¹ in which the Court had passed simpliciter bills of suspension, where they were satisfied from inspection that the bills charged on were forged. The modern view, however, must be given effect to, which was that the inference to be drawn from such inspection alone was not sufficiently strong to warrant passing a bill without caution.² If the complainer admitted that he had authorised the signature by his wife of the other bills, the onus lay upon him of proving that he had not authorised the signature upon the bill in question.

Argued for the complainer;—The Lord Ordinary was right in not requiring caution, looking to the special circumstances of the case.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think we may adhere to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor without infringing any of the general rules applicable to cases of this kind.

The complainer alleges that the document in question is a forgery, and upon the Lord Ordinary requiring him to produce genuine subscriptions in real transactions bearing his signature of date prior to the charge, he makes an explanation which accounts for the absence of documents of that character. He says that he is a very old man, that he does not write well, and that he is not in the habit of signing documents of the character required by the Lord Ordinary. He, however, produces in default a sheet of paper, on which he has written his signature; it is manifestly unlike the signature upon the bill on which the charge proceeded.

Now, the attitude of the respondent turns out to be more complicated than it appeared to be on the record. The respondent is in possession of two bills dated prior to the one in question, each of which he held or holds as a valid instrument, and on both of them there is something which purports to be the signature of the complainer; and the respondent is constrained to say that the two signatures do not resemble the signature upon the bill upon which the charge proceeded.

Kechans v.
Barr.

That being so, and looking to the tone of the record, I cannot say that I read the case upon the ordinary footing of a man asserting that the signature upon a bill in his possession is a genuine signature; and that, coupled with the explanations made at the bar, seems to warrant the Lord Ordinary in passing the note without caution.

Lease—Heir—Executor—Rent legally due prior to heir's succession, but conventionally payable thereafter—Title to sue—Removing.—Where a tenant is bound to pay rent at a certain term, the landlord then in possession is entitled to enforce the obligation notwithstanding that he may be liable to account for the rent recovered to the representatives of his predecessor.

In March 1893 the proprietor of an estate to which he had succeeded in June 1892 raised an action under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (1) for the removal of a tenant on the ground that he had failed to pay the first half year's rent for crop and year 1892 due under his lease at Martinmas 1892; and (2) for payment of the said rent. The defender maintained, inter alia, that the pursuer had no title to sue in respect that the rent in question, though conventionally payable at Martinmas 1892, was legally due at the preceding Whitsunday, and had vested therefore in the last proprietor, and fell to be paid to his executor. Held that the pursuer being in possession of the estate when the rent became payable in terms of the lease had a good title to sue for removal and to enforce payment of the rent, and that the tenant had no concern with any question of accounting between him and the representatives of the last proprietor.

ON 26th June 1892 Mrs Peareth Lennox succeeded, as heir of entail, to the lands of Woodhead and Antermomy.

1st Division.
Sheriff of Stirlingshire.

In March 1893 she brought an action under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, sec. 27,* in the Sheriff Court at Stirling against Andrew Reid, the tenant of her farm of Inchbreak, concluding for his removal from that farm at the ensuing Whitsunday term, and for payment of £80, being the half year's rent payable by him under his lease at Martinmas 1892, but still unpaid.

It appeared that the tenant's entry under his lease was at Martinmas

* Section 27 of the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 62), provides,—“When six months' rent of the holding is due and unpaid it shall be lawful for the landlord to raise an action of removing before the Sheriff against the tenant, concluding for his removal from the holding at the term of Whitsunday or Martinmas next ensuing after the action is brought, and unless the arrears of rent then due are paid or caution is found . . . the Sheriff may decern the tenant to remove . . .”

No. 22. 1889 to the arable lands, and at Whitsunday 1890 to the houses and grass lands. The rent for the farm was £160, payable in equal portions at the terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday in each year, the first half year's rent being payable at Martinmas 1890. The tenant made no payment at the term of Martinmas 1892.

Nov. 14, 1893.
Lennox v.
Reid.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue.

On 13th April 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Buntine) repelled this plea, and allowed a proof as to the amount of rent actually in arrear.

On 1st June 1893, after proof, the interim Sheriff-substitute (Mitchell) found that the full half year's rent of £80, payable at Martinmas 1892, was still unpaid, gave decree for that amount, and ordained the defender to remove.

On 26th June 1893 the Sheriff (Lees) adhered, with the variation that the term of removal should be fourteen days after the date of the interlocutor.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) No title to sue. The rent in question, if still due, was payable to the executor of the late proprietor, for although conventionally payable at Martinmas 1892, it was legally due at the preceding Whitsunday (before the pursuer had succeeded to the estate), and had therefore vested in the late proprietor.¹ Even if it were held that the rent was not legally due at Whitsunday, still the pursuer was only entitled (under the Apportionment Act*) to that part of it which effeired to the period between 26th June and Martinmas 1892, i.e., less than six months, and the Agricultural Holdings Act required that his rent should be in arrear for six months before a landlord could sue a removing under it. But assuming that the pursuer was entitled to sue the removing, he had no right to the rent in question, which clearly belonged to the late proprietor, and the defender was only bound to pay to his proper creditor.

Argued for the respondent;—The defender had failed to make payment of six months' rent at the proper term, and the landlord's title to remove him was therefore clear. He was also entitled to enforce payment of the rent. It might be that under the Apportionment Act the executor of the last proprietor would be entitled to a portion of the rent recovered, but with that the defender had nothing to do. That Act was concerned with the claims of heirs and executors inter se, and did not affect the right of the proprietor for the time to enforce the obligations of a lease. Even if the whole of the rent in question had vested in the last proprietor, the same principle applied, for although the pursuer might have to account for the rent to his executors, still he was in titulo to receive payment of it from the tenant in the first instance.

At advising,—

LORD KINNEAR.—This is an action for removal of a tenant, founded on the 27th section of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, and for payment of £80 of rent alleged to have become due at Martinmas 1892. It is not disputed that if the rent sued for were in fact due to the pursuer, the conditions of the statute would be satisfied. But the defender pleads that the pursuer has no title to sue for rent payable at Martinmas 1892. The defender's plea is founded on the hypothesis that the rent exigible at Martinmas 1892 belongs to the executor of the late proprietor. The pursuer's averment is that the rent for crop and year 1892 was payable in equal portions at Martinmas 1892 and Whitsunday 1893, and this is not disputed. But the defender maintains that the legal terms were No. 22.

 Whitsunday and Martinmas 1892; and therefore that as the portion conventionally exigible at Martinmas was legally payable at the previous Whitsunday, Nov. 14, 1893.
 it vested in the late proprietor, who survived till the 26th of June 1892, and is Lennox v. Reid.
 now payable to her executor, and not to the pursuer as heir of entail in possession. I express no opinion as to the respective rights of heir and executor. These may depend on the practice of the estate, or solely on the application of general rules to the special conditions of the lease. However that may be, the executor is no party to the process, and we cannot determine the measure of his right in his absence. But assuming for the purpose of the argument that in the division of rents between heir and executor the whole amount payable at the Martinmas term, after the late proprietor's death, must fall to the latter, the pursuer has, nevertheless, in my opinion, a perfectly good title to enforce the obligations of the lease, and the tenant has no concern with any question of division or apportionment between her and her predecessors. The supposed claim does not arise under the Apportionment Act, but it is a claim of precisely the same nature as that which the Apportionment Act gives to the executor for the rents accruing between Whitsunday and the 26th of June. It is a claim available against the heir in possession to account for the rents which she may levy. But the executor is not put in possession of the estate either by the Act or by the common law, and the proprietor in possession for the time being has an undoubted title to levy the rents. His right to do so is expressly reserved by the statute, in so far as regards apportioned rents. But in this respect the Act only follows the rule of common law. The general rule is that the contract of lease is transmissible to the respective successors of the contracting parties; and that, to use the words of the first Lord Curriehill, "when such transmission takes place, its obligations are prestable, not by or to the original parties or their legal representatives as such, but by and to the parties who shall be in the respective positions of lessor and lessee, or landlord and tenant at the dates when these obligations become prestable." As between landlord and tenant it is of no consequence whether the conventional terms correspond with the legal terms or not. It is the conventional terms, or in other words the terms of their contract which regulate their rights and liabilities; and if a tenant is bound by his contract to pay rent at a certain term, the obligation is prestable at that term to the landlord then in possession, irrespective of the obligations of the latter to the representative of the predecessor. If the defender had been interpellated by the executor from making payment to the pursuer, the question might have been different. But it is not suggested that the executor has made any claim against him, and if such claim were to be made there can be no question that the landlord's discharge would give the tenant a sufficient answer.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is important that it should be understood that the contract of lease is a real contract, and that the respective obligations of landlord and tenant are prestable by them and their heirs, and are therefore exigible by the heirs of the original parties when owing to death there comes to be a change of ownership. It would be especially inconvenient to tenants, and it might be fraught with injustice to their interests if tenants who were ready to make a payment of their rent to the proper party were obliged to inquire into the testamentary arrangements of a deceased proprietor, and to discover who—whether in intestacy or under a settlement—would be eventually, and as in a question

No. 22. of succession, entitled to a bygone rent. It is much more convenient and is in accordance with the settled principles of the law that the tenant should be entitled to pay over such a rent to the successor in the lands. The principle is not confined to the contract of landlord and tenant, but applies to other relations, e.g., superior and vassal, and indeed to all contracts which are properly real contracts.

Arbitration—Corruption—Act of Regulation—Arbiter's fee—Personal objection.—An arbiter who had accepted a reference without stipulating for any fee intimated to the parties that an award had been signed, and requested payment of a fee of £300 before they uplifted the award. Each of the parties paid one-half of the fee without protest.

In an action by one of the parties for reduction of the award on the ground that the arbiter had acted corruptly in the sense of the Act of Regulation in demanding payment of a fee as a condition of allowing the award to be uplifted, held, that as the pursuer had paid his half of the fee without objection he was barred from challenging the award on the ground stated.

Arbitration—Ultra fines compromissi.—A contract for the construction of certain harbour works contained a clause referring to an arbiter named all disputes as to the rights or obligations of either party under the contract, or in any way connected therewith. A dispute arose as to which of the parties was liable in the cost of removing certain silt which had accumulated on part of the rock which the contractor was bound to excavate, but which he refused to excavate until the employer removed the silt. This dispute having been submitted to the arbiter, he pronounced an award, in which he ordained the contractor to excavate the rock, "this work to be done immediately after the removal of the silt"; found that the silt fell to be removed at the expense of the employer, and ordained him to remove it within one month, failing which the contractor was not to be bound to excavate the rock.

The employer brought an action for reduction of the award on the ground that the arbiter had no power to ordain him to execute works. Held that the award was not ultra vires, in respect that the order on the pursuer was not obligatory but was merely a condition which he must fulfil before enforcing the order on the contractor to excavate the rock.

Arbitration—Award—Reduction—Personal objection.—In the pleadings before an arbiter, under a reference in a contract for the construction of harbour works, the employer objected to a claim by the contractor on the ground that the claim was excluded by a special agreement between the parties. The contractor denied the existence of such an agreement. The arbiter sustained the contractor's claim.

In an action at the instance of the employer for reduction of the award on the ground that the claim was excluded by the express words of the contract, held that the employer having based his case before the arbiter on the alleged special agreement, was barred from pleading the contract as a ground for reducing the award.

In September 1888 George Pirie, contractor, Aberdeen, entered into a contract with Thomas Duff Gordon Duff, of Hopeman, in the county of Elgin, to execute certain works at the harbour of Hopeman. The specification, which was incorporated with the contract, contained a clause (quoted below),* under which disputes between the parties were referred to John Willet, Mr Duff's engineer, whom failing, to William Smith, engineer, Aberdeen.

Duff v. Pirie.

A variety of reasons of reduction were stated, of which the following are now reported:—

I. The decree-arbitral of 3d June 1892 contained, inter alia, the following findings:—"Sixth—Rock Excavation.—I ordain the second party, during and after removal of the silt specified in article seventh hereof, to bore, blast, and remove the remaining rock excavation below low-water level down to the specified depth of three feet below low water, this work to be done immediately following upon the removal of the silt or sufficient portions thereof to facilitate the work of boring and blasting. Seventh—Silt.—I hereby find and determine that the accumulated silt lying on the rocks yet to be excavated in the entrance channel of the harbour falls to be lifted at the expense of the first party, and ordain him to do so within a period of one month from the date of these presents, which period I reserve right to extend on cause shewn, failing which the second party shall not be bound to implement article sixth hereof."

The pursuer maintained that these findings were ultra vires of the arbiter, in respect that in the sixth finding "he makes the defender's obligation to remove the remaining rock excavations below low-water level conditional upon the silt specified in article seventh being removed by the pursuer, notwithstanding that by the contract the defender is absolutely bound to make said excavations, and to remove said silt"; further, in the seventh finding, "he ordains the pursuer to remove certain silt within a month from the date of his decree, thus going entirely beyond the scope of the contract, which imposes no obligations to perform works on the pursuer"; and further, "he takes upon himself to relieve the defender from his contract obligation mentioned in the sixth finding, unless the pursuer implements the arbiter's said incompetent order within the time which he has chosen to fix."

It appeared that the parties were at issue before the arbiter as to which of them was liable in the expense of removing the silt referred to in these findings, the pursuer maintaining that it fell to be removed by the defender under his contract, and the defender that the silt, having accumulated in consequence of operations by the pursuer outside the contract, fell to be removed by the pursuer.

In the action the defender maintained that the findings were intra vires, their effect being simply to sustain his contention.

II. The decree-arbitral of 3d June also contained the following:—"I further decern and ordain the first party [Duff] forthwith to pay to the second party [Pirie] the sum of £1257, 7s. 1d., as a further interim payment, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date hereof until payment."

The arbiter issued no note or explanation of the method by which he reached this figure, but the pursuer undertook to shew, by comparing the sum awarded with the total of the contractor's claims, that the arbiter must have included, at least to the extent of £298, certain claims by the defender, which, as the pursuer contended, were excluded by the express terms of the contract.

(1) The first of these claims was for a sum of £573, 6s., in respect of alleged rock excavations above low-water level made in excess of 8630 cubic yards, which, as the pursuer averred, was to be taken as the quantity to be excavated under the contract (which was for a lump sum), whatever the actual quantity excavated might be.

The schedule of quantities annexed to the specification set forth, inter alia, that the sandstone rock excavations amounted to 8630 cubic yards. No. 23.

 The specification further provided as follows:—"It is stipulated and agreed to that the contractor shall verify the levels of the ground if he thinks proper, and satisfy himself as to the dimensions, character, and nature of the whole works, and obtain his own information on all matters which can in any way influence his tender; and his signature to the specifications, schedule of quantities, and drawings is given and shall be accepted as full evidence of his adoption of the same and his acknowledgment of their accuracy and sufficiency. . . . Detailed schedules of the work specified are provided, which schedules are believed to be accurate, but at the same time are not warranted to be correct, and no claim of any kind shall be made or allowed, though the same shall be found inaccurate, contractors being bound to satisfy themselves as to their completeness and accuracy before making any offer."

Nov. 14, 1893.
 Duff v. Pirie.

In the record before the arbiter the pursuer did not found on the provisions of the specification just quoted, but averred that shortly after the commencement of the works a dispute arose between the parties as to the quantity of rock to be excavated above low-water level, and that after referring the matter to a neutral engineer it was, by letters passing between the parties, "definitely settled that the quantity of rock to be excavated corresponded with the quantity scheduled, namely, 8630 cubic yards."

In the action the pursuer maintained that the claim for £573, 6s. was absolutely excluded by the provisions of the contract and by the special agreement, and consequently that it was ultra vires of the arbiter to sustain the claim.

The defender denied the existence of the arrangement averred by the pursuer, and maintained that the dispute fell within the clause of reference.

(2) The second claim under the present head was thus stated by the defender in the record before the arbiter,—“The second party also claims the following items for work done which was carried away by the sea owing to the faulty designs of the first party's engineer, and the practical impossibility of building certain parts of the works in accordance with the original plans and specifications, viz. :—

“Cost of recovering and repairing crane washed down from north pier,
 October 1890, £110 0 0

[Then followed other similar items.]

[Total] £460 0 0”

The pursuer maintained that this claim was excluded by the following clause in the specification:—"The contractor shall undertake and be held liable for all sea risks of whatever description during the progress of the works, he being held to have satisfied himself as to the sufficiency of the designs on making his tender."

The defender further did not admit that the arbiter had sustained either claim, and maintained that it was "premature for the pursuer to object to the money decerniture being ultra vires of the arbiter. Both decrees-arbitral are interim ones, and the total sum decerned for does not exceed the whole of the defender's claim."

III. On 3d June 1892 the clerk to the reference wrote to the pursuer as follows:—"I now beg to intimate that the decree has been signed by the arbiter of this date. In accordance with the usual practice, I presume you will put me in a position to pay his fee before taking the decree out of his hands. . . . His account, according to usual engineering charges, would amount to £338, 16s., which he restricts to the sum of

No. 23. £300. . . .” Referring to this letter the pursuer averred, that in the belief that the decree therein mentioned was exhaustive of the matters submitted, and under pressure put upon him by the arbiter to pay one-half of the fee, as a condition of the decree being delivered up, the pursuer was compelled to pay one-half of the fee, being £150; that on obtaining the decree, the pursuer discovered that it was not exhaustive of the submission, in respect of various matters set forth; and therefore that, “in demanding payment of a fee, after the arbitration had reached such an advanced stage, but while he himself contemplated further procedure therein, in concealing from the pursuer that such further procedure was contemplated, and in leading him to believe that the document to be issued upon payment of the fee was a final decree, the arbiter was guilty of corruption within the meaning of the Act of Regulations.”

Nov. 14, 1893.
Duff v. Pirie.

In answer, the defender averred,—“That the pursuer voluntarily agreed to pay one-half of the arbiter’s fee along with the defender, and further, that until the adjustment of the record herein pursuer never raised any objection to his payment of the arbiter’s fee.” The defender therefore pleaded;—(7) The pursuer having paid his share of the arbiter’s fee, and appeared and pleaded before the arbiter after he had so done, he is barred from objecting to the decrees on the ground that the arbiter had fixed a fee to be paid to him.

On 16th February 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced an interlocutor sustaining the reasons of reduction with reference to a matter not now reported, and, quoad ultra, repelling the reasons of reduction, and assolzieing the defender, “reserving all competent objections to the final award and decree-arbital when issued.” *

* “OPINION.—The pursuer in this case is Mr Duff, of Hopeman, the proprietor of the harbour of Hopeman in Morayshire, and the defender is the contractor for certain recent extensions of the harbour works. The object of the action is to reduce two interim decrees-arbital pronounced by the arbiter nominated in the contract; the grounds of reduction being generally, that the arbiter has exceeded his powers, has ignored the express terms of the contract, and has moreover been guilty of corruption in so far as, having accepted the reference without stipulating for remuneration, he demanded, before issuing his second decree-arbital, a fee of large amount fixed by himself, and payable by the parties in equal shares.

“There has as yet been no proof, but I have heard a prolonged argument in the Procedure-roll, each party asking a judgment on the record and productions, which latter include the contract and relative specifications, and also the proceedings before the arbiter in the reference.

“I have found the case to be attended with difficulty, and I have hesitated a good deal as to my judgment. I have not much doubt that the arbiter has taken considerable liberties with the contract; and I cannot regard lightly what appears to have happened about his fee. But what I have had to consider is, whether his action has been such as to invalidate his award, and I have also to consider how far the pursuer’s challenge is premature, or on the other hand, comes too late.

“Perhaps I ought in the first place to deal with the matter of the arbiter’s fee. I confess that if I had to decide this objection on its merits, I should have some doubt whether, as the case stands, I was in a position to do so. I observe that the arbiter has not been called as a party to the action, and if this particular objection was to be urged he ought to have been so. Moreover, I am not sure that I can take it as admitted that the demand complained of, which is contained in a letter from the clerk to the reference, was authorised by the arbiter. But in the view which I take, it is not necessary to decide how far these difficulties are insuperable, or indeed to decide anything as to this part of the arbiter’s conduct; for it appears to me that the objection urged, even if well

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The 6th and the 7th findings were both bad, and ought to be reduced—the 6th because it was condifounded, was capable of being waived ; and I think it clear that both parties did waive any right which they, or either of them, may have had to bring the reference to an end on receipt of the communication which is complained of. It appears from the proceedings that they not only paid the fee asked without objection, and took up the award, each party taking his chance of its contents, but that after the award was issued, both parties appeared and pleaded before the arbiter, at all events on certain questions relating to costs. Indeed it is stated, and so far as appears correctly, that no challenge on this score was intimated or even indicated until the adjustment of the record in the present action.

“ I cannot hold that in the circumstances the pursuer can, in a question with the defender, urge this ground of objection now.

“ I must, at the same time, take leave to say that I must not be understood to give any countenance to the argument submitted by the defender to the effect that it is quite lawful and proper for an arbiter, who has accepted a gratuitous reference, to demand, towards the close of the proceedings and on the eve of issuing his award, a fee for his trouble fixed by himself. I was told that such is the practice in England, and it may be so ; for such abuses are difficult to check, inasmuch as from their very nature they tend to secure their own impunity, and can but seldom come under the cognisance of the Courts. But whatever may be the practice in England, I am at least confident that no such practice exists in Scotland. If it does so, I have never heard of it, and I should be very sorry to hear of it now. One thing I think is certain, that as the law of Scotland stands, such a proceeding on the part of an arbiter would most probably be held to amount to corruption. In the case of Blair, January 12, 1738, Elchies, voce Arbitration, 3, the Court reduced an award on the ground of corruption, because the arbiters refused to give up their award until they got payment of the fee demanded by them, which one party refused but the other agreed to give. And in the more recent case of Fraser, May 26, 1838, 16 S. 1049, the opinions of the Judges shew, I think, pretty plainly that the result in that case would have been the same but for the specialties—(1) that the arbiters had stipulated for remuneration, not indeed strictly before acceptance, but yet at the outset of the submission ; and (2) (what was greatly relied on), that the remuneration demanded was not fixed by the arbiters themselves, but was remuneration left to be fixed by a neutral authority. I think this last case by no means detracts from the general rule ; and for my part I should be sorry if any laxity were permitted in such a matter ; for nothing could, in my opinion, be of worse example than that an arbiter, having undertaken a submission without stipulating for remuneration, and having thereby agreed to accept such remuneration as the parties might send him, should nevertheless, towards the close of the proceedings, and while he still has the parties in his power, demand from each of them a sum of money fixed by himself, to which he has no legal claim, and should propose to enforce this exaction by declining otherwise to issue his award, that is to say, to perform his duty under the reference.

“ So much for the pursuer's challenge on the head of corruption. I may next consider the point taken by the defender, that the two awards being only interim awards, and being, therefore, open to be reconsidered in the final award, it is incompetent to reduce them now. Now, to some extent I think this argument has force. In a case of this sort it is always open to the Court to refuse to interfere until the pursuer has exhausted his ordinary remedies ; and where an interim decree pronounced in a submission is challenged upon grounds which are doubtful, or which involve inquiry, and where, at the same time, the matter of complaint admits of being adequately redressed in the final award, I should certainly refuse to try a question which may ultimately be found to be unimportant. But, on the other hand, an interim award may sometimes be in substance a part award. It may in its nature be incapable of after correction. Or, again, while capable of correction, it may be so plainly and obviously bad that tional and inconclusive,¹ the 7th because it ordained the pursuer to execute works, which the arbiter had no power to do. It was plain under the

the party aggrieved is entitled to obtain redress at once. It is, therefore, I think, impossible to lay down any general rule with respect to the challenge of interim awards. The principles which I have tried to indicate must be applied to each case as it occurs. We shall see by-and-bye how far they help in the disposal of some of the questions which are here raised. . . .

"With respect to the second award, there are several of the pursuer's objections which I cannot entertain. In particular . . . (2) It is also complained that the arbiter has ordered the pursuer to remove certain silt from the harbour, as preliminary to the completion by the defender of the excavations under the contract. It appears to me that this is matter rather of form than of substance. What is meant by the award plainly is, that in the judgment of the arbiter the pursuer is responsible for the silt, and that the contractor is not bound to go on with his work until it is cleared away. There is really no order on the pursuer to execute new works. He may execute the work ordered, or not execute it, as he pleases. And that being so, I can see nothing wrong. The arbiter, I must suppose, has held it proved that the silt in question came, as the defender contends, from the blasting operations ordered by the pursuer outside the harbour, and outside the contract. As to this, he may have been right or wrong; but he was entitled to judge. . . .

"It remains to consider the other and last objection, which is this:—The arbiter has decreed against the pursuer for payment of a sum of £1257, 7s. 1d. 'as a further interim payment.' He does not explain how this sum is reached; but the pursuer undertakes to shew, by comparing the sum awarded with the total of the contractor's claims, that the arbiter must have included, at least to the extent of about £298, certain claims by the contractor which are expressly excluded by the contract. These claims are (1) for certain excavations within the contract limits, and necessary to deepen the harbour to the contract level, but in excess of the estimated quantity of excavation contained in the schedules; (2) for the loss of a certain crane, and other losses sustained by the contractor from what were plainly sea risks during the execution of the contract. The pursuer says, and I think with force, that if the arbiter entertained those claims, or either of them, he did not merely misconstrue the contract, but ignored or defied it, and that this, if it does not infer corruption, at least involves a breach of an essential, although implied, condition of the contract of reference.

"Now, if I were bound to hold that the arbiter had in fact sustained either of the two claims in question, I should have great difficulty in upholding the award. At least I should have great difficulty on the materials before me, or upon any explanations which the defender has been able to offer. But there here comes in the circumstance that this is an interim award—that the arbiter is not before me—and that he has not had an opportunity of explaining on what principle or on what calculation he has arrived at the sum of £1257, 7s. 1d. which is in question. It may be that the fact is as the pursuer says; but on the other hand, it is at least possible that the arbiter has included some other items, as, for instance, the expense, or part of the expense, of the works ordered by him under these interim decrees-arbitral. Or it may be that there has been simply a miscalculation which can be set right in the final award. Now, while anything of that kind is possible, I should be unwilling to make the assumption which the pursuer suggests—an assumption which would reflect seriously on the arbiter, and might be doing him great injustice. Accordingly I do not feel bound at this stage to follow the pursuer into the analysis and calculation on which this objection rests. I prefer to assume—what I think from the arbiter's position I am justified in assuming—that if there is an error in this matter it will be corrected; and that the final award will be one which, in this and other matters, will respect the contract, and do justice between the parties. . . ."

contract that the duty of excavating the rock in question fell to the defender, and it was also his duty to remove the silt, for he undertook all risks occasioned by the action of the sea. He ought therefore to have been ordained absolutely to excavate the rock; instead of which, the arbiter had taken it upon himself to make the defender's duty of excavating the rock conditional upon the pursuer removing the silt within one month. This was not a case in which a valid portion of an award could stand as being separable from an invalid portion.¹ (2) The decree for £1257 was bad, either because the arbiter had thereby given effect, at least to the extent of £298, to one or other or both of two incompetent claims, or because he had awarded a larger sum than the defender claimed.² The claim for £573 was negatived by the express provisions of the contract under which the defender accepted the schedule quantities as correct, and the claim for £460 was met by the clause in the contract under which the defender undertook all liability for sea risks. For the arbiter to sustain either claim was ultra vires; and if so, the decree for £1257 must be set aside in toto, the arbiter having lumped together competent and incompetent money awards.³ The Lord Ordinary, while of opinion that it would have been ultra vires of the arbiter to sustain either of these claims, had refused to grant decree of reduction partly on the ground that the award was an interim one, and partly on the ground that the arbiter had not been asked to explain his award. But the award of 3d June, though styled an "interim decree-arbitral," was truly a final award as regarded these claims, if the arbiter had sustained them.⁴ Nor was it necessary to examine the arbiter, it being clear on the face of the proceedings that the arbiter had either awarded more than was claimed or had sustained incompetent claims. But it was quite competent to examine an arbiter as to the meaning of his award,⁵ and if that was thought necessary here, the pursuer should have been allowed an opportunity of doing so, instead of being at once put out of Court. (3) For an arbiter, who had accepted a gratuitous reference, to demand a fee as a condition of issuing his award, amounted to corruption in the sense of the Act of Regulation, especially where as here the award was an interim one. The pursuer had not waived his right to take this objection merely by paying his share of the fee.⁶ The fact that an arbiter had acted ultra vires did not entitle a party to decline to proceed with the reference.⁷ It was not necessary to call the arbiter as a defender;⁸ but the pursuer had no objection to having the action intimated to him.

Argued for the defender;—(1) The 6th and 7th findings were unobjectionable. The parties were at issue as to which of them was responsible for the removal of the silt, and they submitted this dispute to the arbiter, who sustained the defender's contention, and had given effect to his opinion in the findings in question. The 7th finding did not, properly speaking, ordain the pursuer to remove the silt, but merely intimated that if he did not do so the defender was not bound to do the excavation. Such a finding was perfectly competent under a wide clause of reference like the present, where the arbiter had a free hand to adjust the rights and obligations of either party, and was not bound strictly by the record as in a judicial reference.¹ (2) It was not ultra vires of the arbiter to sustain either the claim for £573 or that for £460. With respect to the former, the question submitted to the arbiter was whether the parties had come to a special agreement to take 8630 cubic yards as the quantity to be excavated under the contract, and if the arbiter had sustained this claim, he must be held to have done so on the ground that no such agreement had been proved. It was too late therefore for the pursuer to question the award on the ground that the claim was excluded by the express terms of the contract. Even if the arbiter had sustained the claim on the ground that it was not so excluded, such an award, while it might be wrong in law, was not so erroneous as to be ultra vires. So also if the arbiter had sustained the claim for £460, that award was not ultra vires. The question was whether certain damage had been caused by "sea risks"; and this question being referred to the arbiter, he had, as the pursuer maintained, decided it in favour of the defender. But the question whether any particular damage had been caused by sea risks was a question of fact, the determination of which was certainly within the powers of the arbiter, and there was nothing to shew that to sustain the defender's contention was so wrong as to be ultra vires. It was, however, by no means clear that the arbiter had in fact sustained either claim, and in order to justify a decree of reduction, without having any explanation from the arbiter, it must be plain ex facie of the proceedings that the arbiter had included incompetent claims. This was an interim decree, and if it erred merely in being for too large a sum that could be set right in the final decree. (3) The demand of a fee by the arbiter did not amount to corruption. Had either party refused to pay, that would not in any way have affected the award, which was signed before the demand was made. In any case the objection came too late, the pursuer having paid his share of the fee without objection.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that in the matter of the arbiter's fee the pursuer's challenge of the award is precluded by his own conduct. His Lordship's strictures on the proceedings ascribed to the arbiter are highly salutary; and it does not detract from my concurrence in these remarks if I add that I do not at present see how an extortionate demand for a fee made after an award has been honestly resolved on and signed can react on the award so as to render it corrupt and reducible. The Lord Ordinary's ground of judgment, viz., bar, being sufficient, it is not necessary further to examine the question.

Turning to the various objections to the two awards, I shall take first the award of 15th March 1892, making only this one general observation that the reference clause in the contract is one of great and remarkable latitude. [After considering grounds of reduction not now reported]—

The next point in dispute is the seventh head, and the form in which the arbiter has put his decision gave rise to a plausible argument for the pursuer.

The matter stands thus : The contractor said that the execution of some extra work which had been ordered by the pursuer had caused an access of silt in a part of the work where rock had yet to be excavated. Now, the arbiter had a long proof on the questions of fact as to the origin of the silt, and he came to be satisfied that the defender was right in his view, and that its amount was such as to render it a new obstacle in the way of the excavation of the rock, unforeseen and unprovided for in the contract. His view was therefore that the contract did not apply to the existing circumstances. This being so, he might, I think, have found that in the events which had happened the contractor was not bound to do the excavation ; and this is what he has virtually though not expressly done. It is true that he in words ordains the pursuer to remove the silt, and on this being done, ordains the defender to excavate the rock. Now, if this order on the pursuer had been expressed as obligatory, or, in other words, if the contractor could, under this order, have forced his employer to remove the silt, it might be difficult to maintain that it was within the arbiter's powers. But then the closing words of this seventh head contemplate the employer not choosing to remove the silt, and prescribe the consequence, which is merely that then the contractor shall not be bound to excavate the rock. I consider, therefore, that the order comes to no more than this, that if the pursuer likes to remove the silt, then and only then the defender must excavate the rock. I have only to add on this head that the pursuer joined issue and went to proof on the questions raised on the record about this silt, and cannot now impugn the arbiter's power to decide them.

The remaining question is as to the decree for £1257, 7s. 1d. The pursuer alleges that in granting this decree the arbiter has taken into account two claims, both of which he maintains to have been ultra fines compromissi. Whether either of those things was taken into account there is unfortunately nothing to shew, and it is to be regretted that in dealing with a matter of considerable complexity and magnitude the arbiter did not, either in his award itself or by issuing notes of proposed findings, let the parties see what he was giving this money for. It was argued indeed—and the Lord Ordinary has taken that view—that this being an interim award there would be an opportunity for the arbiter in his final award reconsidering any disputable question and rectifying any error in the award under consideration by ordering repayment. I am not satisfied, looking to the claims and procedure and also to the structure of this award itself, that the decree would be held to have only this provisional character, and that it was not, while entitled “interim,” a determination of the merits of the claims dealt with. I do not pronounce on this, but the point is so far from clear that if I had thought that the pursuer had succeeded in shewing that the arbiter could not legally take into account the two claims which he suspects to compose part of the lump sum awarded, I should have considered it necessary to ascertain whether in fact they had been taken into account by the arbiter. I have come to think, however, that the pursuer has failed in this contention, and that, even assuming that the items challenged have been computed, this would not expose a final decree, and does not expose this decree, to reduction.

Now, the first of those heads of challenge relates to £573. The contract was for a lump sum, and in the schedule of quantities certain excavations were stated at 8630 cubic yards. The contractor claimed payment for more than 8630, because he said more had been done, and he was entitled to be paid for

No. 23. it. The answer made by the pursuer was that it had been settled by agreement, pending the work, that the quantity of rock to be excavated corresponded with the quantity scheduled, viz., 8630 yards. The case of the pursuer was thus rested not on the terms of the contract, but on the terms of the subsequent letters, or, in other words, the legal view now maintained was waived. The question thus submitted to the arbiter was clearly within his competence to decide. I may add that if the question had been one of the construction of the contract, I am not satisfied that a decision adverse to the pursuer would have been illegal even if legally erroneous.

Duff v. Pirie.

The other claim for loss of a crane and other articles seems to have been considered by the arbiter without objection by the pursuer to the competency of the proceeding, and I am disposed to think that he cannot now impugn it as ultra fines compromissi. But as the pursuer, in order to make good his objection to the award, required to prove the incompetency of both this claim and the claim previously considered, it is not necessary to examine this matter in detail.

The result of my opinion is that the Lord Ordinary's decree of partial reduction should be recalled, and the rest of his interlocutor adhered to, the absolutor being extended to the whole conclusions of the summons.

LORD M'LAREN and LORD KINNAR concurred.

LORD ADAM was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, in so far as it sustained the reasons of reduction, and quoad ultra adhered.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.

By bond and disposition in security, dated 13th, and recorded 21st May 1874, Hugh MacBean, oil and colour manufacturer in Glasgow, acknowledged to have borrowed and received the sum of £3000 from the trustees of William Bankier, merchant in Glasgow, which sum he bound himself to repay at Martinmas 1874, with interest at 5 per cent during the not payment, and in security of the said personal obligation he disposed to and in favour of Bankier's trustees, heritably but redeemably on payment of the principal sum with interest, yet irredeemably in the event of a sale in virtue of the powers thereof, certain subjects in Glasgow extending to 870 square yards.

By disposition, dated November 1874, MacBean sold the security subjects to George Jeffrey, teacher in Largs, for £4400, Jeffrey, in satisfaction of the price, paying £1400 to MacBean and freeing and relieving him, as by acceptance of the disposition he bound himself to free and relieve him, of the bond and disposition in security, which bond and disposition in security, and the whole obligations therein contained, it was by the disposition agreed should transmit against Jeffrey and his heirs and successors whomsoever.

In March 1876 Jeffrey sold the security subjects, which, after various transmissions, were bought by George Eadie, builder, Glasgow, in March 1877. Each of the successive purchasers was taken bound to pay the sum in the bond, and when Eadie acquired the subjects, they were still burdened with the bond, and also with two postponed bonds, for £880 and £550, which had been granted after MacBean had sold the subjects.

Immediately after acquiring the subjects, Eadie borrowed £3000 from the North Albion Property Investment Company, Limited, for which he granted a bond dated 5th, and recorded 6th June 1877, and in security disposed a piece of ground extending to 552 square yards, being part of the subjects disposed in security to Bankier's trustees.

By deed of restriction dated 2d and 5th, and recorded 16th October 1877, Bankier's trustees, upon the narrative that Eadie had applied to them to release part of the subjects held by them in security under the bond granted by MacBean, but without any consideration being paid to them therefor, declared a portion of these subjects, extending to 325 square yards, to be released and disburdened of the security constituted by that bond.

Thereafter, by assignation dated 18th February, and recorded 4th March 1880, in consideration of the sum of £3000 paid to them by the North Albion Investment Company, Bankier's trustees assigned and disposed to that company the bond and disposition in security granted by MacBean and the subjects thereby disposed in security, but excepting always from the said subjects the 325 square yards released by the deed of restriction in 1877.

On 1st September 1892 the North Albion Property Investment Company, founding on the personal obligation in the bond of 1874, brought an action against John Wilson, C.A., Glasgow, curator bonis to Hugh MacBean, and also against MacBean, concluding for payment of £3000, being the principal sum due under the bond, together with £172 as arrears of interest.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers are entitled to decree against the defender Hugh MacBean, and also against the defender John Wilson as his curator bonis, in respect of the obligation undertaken by the former in the said bond and disposition in security, for the principal sum therein contained and the interest thereon, all as concluded for, with expenses. (3) The pursuers' right to enforce the personal obligation undertaken by the defender Hugh MacBean in the said bond and disposition in security granted by him is not prejudiced by the renunciation by Mr Bankier's trustees of part of the security subjects contained in said bond and disposition in security. (4) The pursuers are not bound, on payment only of the amount due under the bond of 1874, to grant an assignation of the security subjects contained in the said bond, in respect that the said subjects are also held by the pursuers in security of another debt, and that the pursuers would be prejudiced by the keeping up of the security created by the said bond of 1874, or at least have an interest to object to that security being maintained. (5) Separatim. In any view, the pursuers are entitled to recover payment of the sum sued for, under deduction of a sum equivalent to the value of the part of the security subjects released as aforesaid.

The defenders, who stated (what the pursuers did not deny) that they had no knowledge of the granting of the deed of restriction by Bankier's trustees, pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The authors of the pursuers, as creditors

(3) The defenders ought to be assoilzied, in respect that the pursuers are not in a position to assign to the defenders the said bond, together with the subjects disposed by Mr MacBean in real security of the payment thereof, in exchange for payment of the sum contained in the bond.

On 8th February 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) sustained the defences, and assoilzied the defenders.*

* "OPINION.—This case raises some interesting and novel questions.

"1. The leading question which was argued is whether the granter of a bond and disposition in security who has sold the security subjects after granting the bond and disposition is entitled, when called upon by the creditor to pay the debt in full under his personal obligation, to demand from the creditor an assignment to the bond. Owing to various transmissions the narrative in the record is somewhat complicated, but, stated shortly, the essential facts of the case are as follows :—

"A borrows £3000 from B, and grants a bond and disposition in security in the usual terms, the security subjects extending to 800 square yards of ground. A then sells the security subjects to C under burden of the bond, the sum in the bond being treated as part of the purchase-price. C afterwards applies to B to restrict the bond in order to enable C to sell 300 square yards free of the bond. B agrees to do so without receiving any consideration, and the bond is accordingly restricted to 500 square yards. B thereafter assigns the bond so restricted to D, who had previously obtained a postponed bond over the 500 square yards still covered by the original bond by A.

"The heritable subjects having depreciated in value, D demands from A, the granter of the first bond, full payment of the debt. A declines to pay, on the ground that D, as a condition of receiving payment, is bound to assign to him the bond which he granted to B, and that as it can no longer be assigned in its entirety, A is freed from his obligation.

"I do not profess to give a complete statement of the facts or figures, but it is sufficient to shew how the questions arise. D represents the present pursuers, and A, the defender Hugh MacBean.

"The position maintained by the pursuers is this, that under the original bond and disposition in security the creditor had two separate and distinct remedies—one, the personal obligation of the debtor, the other the heritable security; that he might use the one or the other just as he found convenient; and that if the debtor sold the security subjects the creditor might, if he chose, discharge the bond in whole or in part, and thus free the lands, while at the same time the personal obligation of the debtor remained intact.

"The defender, on the other hand, maintains that an assignment of the bond, a reconveyance of the security, is the counterpart of payment; and that if the creditor has disabled himself from reconveying, the original debtor is liberated.

"Before I proceed to consider the legal aspect of the case, I propose to inquire what would be the practical result to the parties of sustaining the one contention or the other.

"To deal first with the defender's view. So long as the security subjects remain in the hands of the debtor the question cannot arise. If the debt is paid up the security is discharged.

"The difficulty arises when the debtor sells the security subjects. So long as the bond remains undischarged the subjects are to that extent diminished in value; the seller cannot obtain full value for the subjects. He accordingly conveys the subjects under burden of the bond, receives so much less money, and for greater security takes the purchaser bound to relieve him of the debt, and to agree that the debt shall transmit against him. All this appears on the face of the recorded deed. The result of this is that, although the debtor remains liable, if called upon by the creditor to pay, he has not only the personal obligation of the purchaser but also the value of the heritable subjects between him and ultimate loss.

"On the other hand, the creditor has not merely the original debtor's personal obligation and the security of the heritable subjects unimpaired, but also the personal obligation of the purchaser, for which he had not bargained.

"That is the result from the defender's point of view.

"Again, according to the pursuers' argument, the result would be that the original debtor would be entirely deprived of the benefit of the security subjects, and might in certain events be compelled to pay the debt twice over. As I have pointed out, the price which a seller receives who sells property under a bond is diminished by the sum covered by the bond; and if he is afterwards called upon to pay the debt in full, and the purchaser is bankrupt, and he is deprived of all relief from the sale of the security subjects, he will simply have paid the debt twice over. That is what the pursuers' counsel maintains to be the law.

"This statement of the case shews, I think, that the result contended for by the pursuers would be productive of great hardship to the original granter of the bond, while the creditor would suffer no prejudice if the defender's contention were sustained. It remains to be considered whether the defence is warranted by the law of Scotland.

"I think it may be taken that there is no express decision or authority in the law of Scotland directly in point. On the other hand, certain English cases have been quoted, in which it is maintained the point was expressly decided in favour of the defender's view. I shall afterwards consider these cases in detail.

"To deal first with the law of Scotland. In the absence of express decision or authority, the question must be decided upon principle. I think it is to be solved by considering the nature of the contract between the original debtor and the creditor. The security which the debtor grants and the creditor accepts is really a pledge for payment of the debt; and the law of the contract of pledge—viz., that the pledgee must apply and use the pledge only for the purpose for which it is given—rules the present case. It is not necessary to refer in detail to the history of redeemable securities; but if it is attended to, it will be seen that a wadset, of which the modern heritable security is a development, is simply a pledge of land in security of debt, the lands pledged having to be reconveyed and restored to the debtor on payment of the debt. Now the creditor's obligation under the contract of pledge is to restore the subject of the pledge on payment of the debt. The right of property remains with the pledger, subject to the burden, and the creditor has no right of use during his possession of the pledge. The subject of the pledge cannot be sold without the order of a Judge; the seller cannot sell at his own hand—Bell's Pr., secs. 206, 207.

"It will be seen that these limitations of the pledgee's powers in regard to the subject of pledge find their counterpart in some at least of the rules applicable to the use which the holder of heritable security is entitled to make of his right. If the creditor demands payment of his debt while the security subjects remain in the original debtor's possession and the debt is paid, the security as an accessory obligation is discharged, or at the request of the debtor it is assigned to a third party. If payment is not made, and the creditor sells under his bond and recovers full payment, the personal obligation is discharged, and the creditor accounts for the surplus, if any. So far there is no difficulty; the creditor can only use and deal with his security as a pledge.

"If, again, the debtor sells the security subjects under burden of the bond, the bond which the creditor holds still remains a security for payment of the original debtor's debt. The debtor remains bound; the creditor, who is not a party to, and cannot be prejudiced by, the transmission, does not accept the purchaser in his room—although the purchaser also may be bound if by his title the obligation transmits against him; and I do not see why the creditor's rights the debt, was under no further obligation than to grant a discharge of the bond; he was under no obligation to reconvey the subjects disposed in in regard to the use of the security should be enlarged by the fact that the debtor has transferred the estate to another. Practically, the position is the same as if originally the debtor had assigned in security a bond over another person's land, in which case the creditor could not, I take it, have discharged the bond without liberating his debtor.

"If, when the lands are in the possession of the purchaser, the creditor proceeds to sell under his bond and recovers full payment of his debt, I do not understand it to be maintained that the original debtor is not thereby liberated. The pursuers' counsel, however, carried his argument so far as to maintain that the creditor was entitled, if he chose, to discharge his bond altogether with or without consideration, without regard to the interests of the original debtor. If this were so, the creditor might transact with the purchaser or with postponed bondholders for the discharge of the bond; discharge it for something less than the sum in the bond, and still claim full payment—not merely the balance—from the original debtor. If the creditor could discharge the bond without consideration, he could also transact for its discharge. I see no distinction between those proceedings, and either in my opinion would be a violation of the condition under which the creditor obtained the security.

"It may be that, when the creditor proceeds to sell, it is not necessary that he should give notice or premonition to the original debtor. But neither is he under any obligation to give notice or premonition to postponed bondholders; and yet he is bound to account to them and all interested for the price realised, and to carry through the sale with a just regard to the interests of all concerned. It would be strange if the one person to have no voice in the matter were the original obligant, who is still liable for payment of the full debt.

"I do not think that the authorities quoted for the pursuers conflict with the view that the sale of the subjects under the bond does not affect the rights of parties in the security. The case chiefly relied on is the University of Glasgow v. Yuill's Trustee, 9 R. 643. In that case two points were decided. First, that where it is agreed in gremio of the conveyance that the personal obligation in a bond and disposition in security shall transmit against a purchaser of the heritable subjects, the effect of such transmission is that it operates as if the purchaser had granted a bond of corroboration without any discharge of the personal obligation of the original debtor. The creditor, who is no party to the transaction, and who cannot be prejudiced by it, nevertheless gets an additional obligant; but the original debtor is not discharged.

"The second and more important point decided was one which turned upon the law of bankruptcy and the Bankruptcy Statutes. Yuill in 1876 granted a bond and disposition in security in favour of the University of Glasgow for £9000. Thereafter in 1877 the security subjects were acquired by David Horne, under burden, inter alia, of the University's bond for £9000, and in the conveyance to him it was agreed that the personal obligation should transmit against him in terms of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874.

"Yuill thereafter became insolvent, and his estates were sequestrated and a trustee appointed. The University of Glasgow claimed to be ranked on the bankrupt estate for the full amount of the debt and interest; and the question was whether they were or were not bound, under the 65th section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, to deduct in claiming the value of their heritable security. The trustee in Yuill's sequestration rejected that claim, in respect that they had not, for the purpose of ranking, valued and deducted the security subjects, and had not exhausted or discussed the said property and David Horne the disponent. The University appealed to the Sheriff, who recalled the trustee's deliverance, and ordained him to admit them to a ranking in terms of their claim, and this judgment was affirmed by the First Division of the Court. The Lord President Inglis's opinion is valuable as containing an exposition of the rights of a secured creditor in common law when his debtor becomes insolvent. He states the following rules of ranking as well settled:—'First, a creditor security. It was true that the discharge was put on the record, but that was not as being a reconveyance; its object merely was to divest the who holds personal or real securities other than that of the bankrupt and his estate, is entitled so to use his various securities as to make them all available to the fullest extent so as to operate payment in full, but no more. Second, if co-obligants, whether as joint debtors or as principal and cautioners bound to the creditor, are all bankrupt, he is entitled to rank on the estate of each for the full amount of his debt, so as to operate full payment out of the combined rankings. Third, if a creditor has, in addition to the personal obligation of his debtor, a security over some subject not belonging to his debtor, he is entitled to realise the full value of his security; and supposing that does not satisfy his claim, to rank on his debtor's estate for the full amount of his debt. And fourth, it is important to observe that it makes no difference though the real security is over a part of the insolvent debtor's estate. He may exhaust that security, and rank, not for the balance, but for the full amount of his debt, on the remainder of the insolvent's estate pari passu with the unsecured creditors, so as to operate full payment of his debt.'

"It will be observed that the right of a creditor who holds a security, whether over the estate of his debtor or that of a third party, is simply to operate payment in full of his debt, from both sources. In order to secure this, he is entitled to rank upon the bankrupt estate, without deduction, for the full amount of his debt. To this extent he has an advantage over unsecured creditors, but at most he will only obtain a dividend upon his debt, and the remainder he may, if he can, recover out of his security. But he is only entitled to use those two remedies to the effect of getting full payment of his debt. This is well expressed in the passage from Bell's Commentaries which the Lord President quotes,—'Bell's Commentaries, 7th edition, p. 419—It is of some consequence to determine what shall be the effect in bankruptcy of a creditor secured over a particular estate drawing, or being entitled to draw, a large part of his debt out of that estate, preferably to the personal creditors, when he comes to demand payment of what remains still due. It is the right of a creditor by the common law of Scotland to demand payment of his whole debt under the obligation of his debtor, and this right does not bar him from claiming the full benefit of any pledge or security which he may hold, provided from both sources he does not derive more than full payment of his debt.'

"The only question remaining was to what extent the common law had been altered by statute. That depended upon the terms of the 65th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, under which a creditor who holds a security over any part of the estate of the bankrupt is bound, in order to be ranked to draw a dividend, to deduct the value of his security from his debt and specify the balance. The question to be decided was whether Yuill, having conveyed away the security subjects, the bond which he had granted when he was owner of the subjects or the estate over which the security was constituted could be held to be part of the bankrupt's estate within the meaning of the statute. The question is one of considerable nicety, because if the creditor in a heritable security is bound while the debtor remains solvent to count and reckon with the debtor for the heritable security, the security or right to demand an accounting for its value is in a sense part of the debtor's estate; and there is room for argument that its character is not altered by the debtor's bankruptcy. But the Court took a strict view of the matter. They were dealing with a question in bankruptcy where the creditor was unable to obtain full payment under the debtor's personal obligation, and they were construing a statute which to a certain extent restricted the creditor's rights at common law. The view which they took was that the property referred to in the statute depended upon true ownership, and that as the security subjects, if liberated from the security, would not have been part of the bankrupt's estate available for distribution among his creditors, the value of the heritable security did not fall to be deducted by the creditor in his claim. I do not, however, find in the opinions of the Judges any countenance for the view either that the creditor creditor of any power of dealing with the estate. His right was to obtain payment of his debt, and he was entitled to make that right effectual, could operate more than full payment out of the ranking and the security together, and certainly I find no authority for the contention that a security-holder dealing with a solvent debtor is entitled to recover full payment from him, and refuse him the benefit of the security which was given for the sole purpose of securing payment of the debt.

"It was also pleaded for the pursuers that where a creditor has two obligants bound as full debtors, he may discharge one without losing his recourse against the other. This does not, in my opinion, touch the present case, which I think turns upon the nature of the transaction between one of the principal obligants and the creditor. It is to be remembered that we are here dealing with a question between the parties to the original transaction, or, what is the same thing, between one party to the original transaction and the assignee of the other.

"Therefore, if the case has to be determined on principle according to the law of Scotland, I am prepared, although not without hesitation, to sustain the defender's contention upon this point.

"I am confirmed in this view by the English decisions quoted for the defender, in particular the leading case Palmer v. Hendrie, 27 Beavan, 349, and 28 Beavan, 341, and the recent case Kinnaird v. Trollope, L. R., 39 Chan. Div. 363. No doubt the law of England upon this subject must be received with caution, but I do not think that these decisions proceed on any technicalities of English law, but upon broad principles of equity which are equally applicable to a kindred question in Scotch law.

"In certain respects a mortgage differs from a heritable bond, but the differences are more in form than in substance. Under a mortgage the legal estate or fee passes to the mortgagee, and the mortgagor is left with only an equity of redemption. But he is usually left in possession of the lands, and he has power to grant further mortgages over the equity of redemption or to assign it absolutely. Thus, in substance, he is practically in the same position as the owner of lands who has granted a heritable security. Again, the mortgage, although in form a conveyance of the fee, is really nothing more or less than a security. On payment of the debt, the mortgagee is bound to reconvey the lands, and if he sells them to pay his debt, he must account to the mortgagor. If he forecloses in default of payment, it seems that he is entitled to retain the lands, even although they are of greater value than the debt; but if, after foreclosing, he finds that the lands are not sufficient in value to cover the debt, he cannot sue the mortgagor for the balance on the covenant or personal obligation, except on condition of reopening the foreclosure and reviving the equity of redemption.

"I understand that the following points are established by the decisions:—

"1. If the mortgagor has assigned the equity of redemption absolutely, he is still entitled to a conveyance of the legal estate if sued on the covenant; and if the mortgagee has parted with the whole or part of the legal estate, he is thereby disabled from suing the mortgagor on the covenant.

"2. If, after the mortgagor has assigned the equity of redemption, the mortgagee obtains from the assignee a second mortgage, he is still bound, if he sues on the covenant, to convey the legal estate to the mortgagor, on payment of the debt for which the first mortgage was granted, subject to such equity of redemption as may be subsisting in the assignee or any other person; and he is not entitled, as a condition of such conveyance, to demand payment from the mortgagor of the sum covered by the second mortgage.

"In the case of Palmer v. Hendrie the facts were these,—Palmer, the plaintiff, in 1847 mortgaged some leasehold property to Hendrie for £800, and he covenanted in the usual terms to pay the mortgage money. After part of it had been paid off, Palmer agreed to transfer the equity of redemption to Overton & Hughes, who were solicitors. Accordingly, by an indenture, dated in February 1850, Palmer assigned the property to them, subject to the mortgage, and either by proceeding against the debtor under the personal obligation in the bond or by proceeding against the security subjects, or he might make Overton & Hughes covenanted to pay the mortgage and to indemnify the plaintiff therefrom. After this Hendrie executed certain deeds by which he and Overton & Hughes granted under-leases of part of the property at peppercorn rents, and by these transactions considerable sums by way of premium were received and retained by Hughes. Overton's interest in the mortgaged property was transferred to Hughes, who, in 1858, absconded, and was declared bankrupt.

"In January 1859 the executors of Hendrie commenced an action at law against Palmer upon his covenant to recover £300, alleged to be due on the mortgage. Palmer then filed a bill against the executors, submitting that in equity he had been relieved from all liability upon the covenant for payment of the mortgage money contained in the deed of 1847.

"The opinion of the Master of the Rolls, Sir John Romilly, on a motion for an injunction in the action, so fully explains the law of England in regard to the rights of mortgagor and mortgagee in such circumstances, that I now quote it at some length. He says (p. 351),—'I am of opinion that there can be no question as to the relative rights and obligations of a mortgagor and mortgagee. A mortgagee may pursue all his remedies at once; he may bring actions of covenant and ejectment, and at the same time proceed to foreclose the mortgage. If he forecloses it, and afterwards sues on the covenant, he thereby opens the foreclosure; but if he sues on the covenant, and does not get fully paid, he may still go on and foreclose the mortgage. But after he has once been paid in full, under the covenant, he cannot touch the estate, and is precluded from all proceedings afterwards. These, then, are the relative duties and reciprocal obligations between mortgagor and mortgagee. The mortgagee has a right to make use of all his remedies against the mortgagor for obtaining payment of his money; but as soon as the mortgage money has been fully paid, he is bound to deliver over the mortgaged estate to the mortgagor. The question is, whether, when the mortgagee has made it impossible to restore the property mortgaged, he can proceed against the mortgagor to recover the amount of the mortgage money. He can, undoubtedly, at law, sue upon the covenant, and consequently the executors of Hendrie are, at law, entitled to recover from the plaintiff the unpaid mortgage money; but the mortgagees must perform their reciprocal obligations: they are bound, on payment, to restore the property to the mortgagor; and if it appear, from the state of the transaction, that, by the act of the mortgagee, unauthorised by the mortgagor, it has become impossible to restore the estate on payment of all that is due, I am of opinion that this Court will interfere and prevent the mortgagee suing the mortgagor at law. Suppose a mortgagee has conveyed away the property without receiving any consideration for it, can he afterwards sue the covenantor, who, on his part, is unable to redeem the property, there being none left to redeem? What is there in this case to take away the plaintiff's right to redeem the property, or his right to compel the defendants to restore it on being paid? I see nothing in the case to do it.'

"He then deals with the argument for the defendant to the effect that the plaintiff (the mortgagor), by conveyance of the equity of redemption, was precluded from calling for a conveyance of the legal estate, having ceased to have any interest whatever in the mortgaged property. On this subject he says (p. 352),—'It is argued that, by the conveyance of the equity of redemption, the plaintiff is precluded, under any circumstances, from calling for a conveyance of the estate. But it is to be observed that the transferees became liable to pay the mortgage money, and that they covenanted to indemnify the plaintiff therefrom. Hendrie was no party to the deed, and his executors insist that it was not binding on them, and that they have a right to sue the plaintiff on the covenant in the mortgage deed. But he has since admitted the transaction, and granted leases of the property at nominal rents, and has either received the purchase-money for the leases or has allowed Overton & Hughes to do so. I think his executors cannot now repudiate the transfer and avail themselves of it, for the purpose of saying, on the one hand, that it relieves them from their obligation to restore the estate, and on the other that they can still sue for the mortgage money.'

No. 24. use of both remedies provided that he did not in cumulo recover more than the full amount of his debt with any interest that might be due.¹

"The proceedings on the hearing are reported in 28 Beavan, 341. The Master of the Rolls adhered to his former opinion, and the only passage in the opinion then delivered that I need quote is the following. He says (p. 343),— 'If a man mortgages property, and afterwards sells the equity of redemption to a third person, who then sells the property with the concurrence of the mortgagee, such mortgagee cannot, if he has allowed the purchaser of the equity of redemption to receive the purchase-money, sue the original mortgagor for the amount of the money which he has thus allowed to be paid to the purchaser of the equity of redemption. That is one of the first principles of equity.'

"The result was that defendants were perpetually restrained from all proceedings at law in respect of the mortgage debt and interest.

"The case of Palmer v. Hendrie was followed in 1888 by the case of Kinnaird v. Trollope, L. R., 39 Chy. Div. 636. The facts of the case closely resemble those of the present, as will appear in the following passage in the rubric,— 'In 1870 the defendants mortgaged property to the plaintiffs to secure £12,000 and interest, and entered into the usual covenants for payment of principal and interest. In 1872 the defendants, for value, absolutely assigned their equity of redemption to A B, and he covenanted to indemnify them against the £12,000 and interest. In 1875 A B further charged the property to the plaintiffs to secure £8000 and interest, covenanting that it should not be redeemable, except upon payment of the £8000 as well as the £12,000. A B afterwards became insolvent; and the property having depreciated in value, the plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants, on the covenant contained in the mortgage of 1870, to recover the £12,000 and interest.' The defendants were willing to pay the £12,000 and interest, but upon condition that the plaintiffs assigned to them the mortgage of 1870 as security for the £12,000 in priority to the plaintiffs' charge for £8000 created by the indenture of 1875.

"It will be seen that in Kinnaird v. Trollope the mortgagee had not parted with any part of the legal estate, but he had obtained from the assignee of the equity of redemption a further charge on the property, and he maintained that he was not bound to convey or assign the legal estate to the mortgagor, except on payment not only of the sum covered by the first mortgage, but also the sum lent to the assignee of the equity of redemption. The decision in Kinnaird v. Trollope is chiefly of importance as bearing upon the second point in the present case; but the decision of Justice Stirling proceeds upon a thorough examination of the previous authorities, including Palmer v. Hendrie, and the principles thereby established or recognised. The following part of his opinion bears on this point. He says (pp. 645, 646)— 'Then, does it make any difference if, after the assignment of the equity of redemption, the assignee mortgages either to the original mortgagee or to some other person? I think not. Such a mortgage creates in the new mortgagee a fresh interest in the equity of redemption; but it does not, in my opinion, impose any additional burden or liability on the mortgagor. On this part of the case Palmer v. Hendrie again throws some light. It was there held that the mortgagor on paying off the mortgage debt is entitled to have the property restored to him unaffected by any acts of the mortgagee unauthorised by the mortgagor. The necessary authority might be derived either (as in the case of Rudge v. Richens) from the powers conferred by the mortgage deed, or from the direct concurrence of the mortgagor, or possibly otherwise; but it was held in Palmer v. Hendrie that the mere concurrence of the assignee of the equity of redemption in acts which were not within the powers conferred by the mortgage was insufficient. It was argued in the present case that by absolutely assigning the equity of redemption the mortgagor authorised the assignee to deal with it as his own property, and consequently to raise money on it. If this argument be well founded, I have difficulty in seeing why the dealings which formed the subject of decision in Palmer v. Hendrie should not have been held to be authorised by the mortgagor. Such authority as was conferred by the assignment did not, in my judgment, extend to raising money on behalf of the mortgagor, or to making his right of redemption more burdensome to him than it would otherwise have been. The assignee could only raise money on his own behalf, and could not by so doing impose (as against the mortgagor) an additional burden on the mortgaged property.

"The result was that the plaintiffs (mortgagees) were held entitled to judgment for £12,000 as the sum in the first mortgage, with interest, but only upon terms that they reconveyed the property to the defendants, subject to such equity of redemption as might be subsisting in any person or persons other than the defendants themselves.

"It seems to me that, mutatis mutandis, these decisions are directly in point. In both cases the mortgagor was completely divested of his estate in the lands. He had parted with the legal estate to the mortgagee, and with the equity of redemption to the assignee. And yet it was held that he could not be called upon to pay under the covenant or personal obligation which still subsisted in favour of the mortgagee, except on condition of having the legal estate reconveyed to him, subject to the equity of redemption with which he had parted.

"In parting with the equity of redemption, the mortgagor did what in Scotland would be equivalent to selling the lands under burden of the bond. What he was entitled to receive back from the mortgagee on payment of the sum in the first bond was in point of form the legal estate subject to the assignee's equity of redemption; but in substance that is equivalent to an assignation of a heritable security.

"It therefore seems to me that, after making all allowance for certain peculiarities in the law of England applicable to mortgages, the decisions to which I have referred are directly in point. The principle which underlies them is that a mortgage is a pledge; and that it is a term or condition of the bargain between mortgagor and mortgagee—which is unaffected by subsequent transmission of the equitable estate by the mortgagor, or transactions between the mortgagee and the assignee of the equity of redemption—that the mortgagor shall not be called upon to pay under his covenant or personal obligation except on condition of the mortgaged property being reconveyed to him, subject to other existing equity of redemption.

"II. The pursuers' second answer to the defence is that they are not bound to assign the security, because they would be prejudiced by doing so, in respect that they hold a postponed bond over the security subjects, which are now not of sufficient value to meet both bonds. There can be no doubt of the pursuers' interest to refuse to grant an assignation, but in the circumstances it does not, in my opinion, constitute a legal excuse. As assignees of the original creditor, the pursuers are open to all defences and exceptions which could have been pleaded against the former. If I am right in the views which I have expressed as to the debtor's right to insist that the heritable security granted by him shall be in one way or another applied in extinction or relief of his personal obligation, he has no need to appeal to the equitable right which a person who pays a debt in full has to demand an assignation to the debt and any security which may be held by the creditor.

"In such a case, the person who pays the debt has had, strictly speaking, no previous right or interest in the security, and may not even have known of its existence. But the creditor is bound to grant an assignation if he has no good the personal obligation, the discharge disburdened the security subjects. The fact that the debtor had parted with the security subjects did not release him from the personal obligation, nor did it enlarge the creditor's obligation. If the debtor was called on to pay under the personal obligation, all that he could demand in consideration of payment was a discharge of that obligation. The effect of that discharge was to free the security subjects, but the benefit of this disburdening fell to the proprietor of the subjects, whoever he might be, and not to the debtor in the bond, who in selling the subjects had parted with all real right in them, and whose only remedy, if he had any, was a personal right of relief against the disponee of the subjects. Nor were the pursuers in equity bound to grant an assignation of the bond on receiving payment from MacBean, for MacBean was not a cautioner or volunteer, he was the principal debtor;¹ and further, in answer to such a claim the pursuers were entitled to plead that the granting of an assignation would be to their own prejudice as postponed bondholders.² The English authorities relied on by the Lord Ordinary could not safely be applied to this question, which was a pure question of Scots conveyancing. Even in England it had been held that reason for refusing. The right to demand it, however, is founded in equity, and therefore, if the creditor can qualify any substantial prejudice which will, or even may possibly ensue, he will be entitled to refuse. Upon this ground the case of Guthrie v. Smith, 8 R. 107, proceeded.

~~In the present case, the defenders' claim for an assignation is founded, not on equity, but on implied contract. If the creditor's rights in the security were limited, as I hold them to have been, he could not, by advancing money to the purchaser of the lands and taking a postponed bond over the security subjects, free himself from his obligation to apply the first bond to the purpose for which it was granted. On this subject I think the remarks of Justice Stirling in Kinnaird v. Trollope, which I have quoted, are closely in point. He says, — 'The assignee could only raise money on his own behalf, and could not by so doing impose as against the mortgagor an additional burden on the mortgaged property.'~~

"Applying those words to the case in hand, the creditor and the purchaser of the security subjects could not, without the consent or knowledge of the granter of the first bond, arrange that any additional burden should be placed upon the security subjects to the effect of prejudicing the original debtor's rights in the bond which he had granted. Of course the purchaser was entitled to grant, and the creditor to take, a postponed bond over the subjects on the ordinary footing of its ranking after the first bond; but what the pursuers now seek to do is to appeal to the fact of the creditor having, without the original debtor's consent or knowledge, acquired a postponed bond over the security subjects as a reason for refusing an assignation to the first bond, and, after obtaining full payment from the debtor, to apply the whole proceeds of the heritable subjects in part payment of the two bonds which they hold over them.

"No separate argument was addressed to me in support of the pursuer's fifth plea in law, which is to the effect that in any view they are entitled to recover payment of the sum sued for, under deduction of a sum equivalent to the value of the part of the security subjects released as aforesaid.

"It was not contended that if, as a condition of receiving payment from the defenders, the pursuers are bound to assign the bond, and were in a position to do so, there would be any conveyancing difficulty in the way of assigning it to or for behoof of the defenders.

"On the whole matter, I think that the defence is well founded, and that the defenders must be assoilzied."

a mortgagor was not entitled after payment of the debt to keep up a first mortgage without the consent of the puisne mortgagee.¹ No doubt in the case cited both mortgages had been granted by the same person, but the defender must be held to have granted the second bond for £3000, he having sold the property and so entitled the disponees to burden the property.

Argued for the defenders;—The debtor in a bond and disposition in security was bound personally to pay the debt, and in security conveyed heritable subjects to the creditor heritably but redeemably in the event of repayment of the debt with interest. On payment therefore the borrower was entitled to be discharged of his personal obligation, and also to be put into the same position as regarded the security subjects as he was before the bond was granted. In the ordinary case of the debtor remaining proprietor of the security subjects, a discharge of the bond effected both these results, without a formal reconveyance. But none the less was the creditor bound to reconvey the subjects on payment by the debtor, if a mere discharge was not enough. If, therefore, he was unable or unwilling to fulfil that obligation, he could not enforce the personal obligation against the debtor, on the general principle that one seeking to enforce a contract must fulfil his counter obligation.² As the pursuers' contract obligation was to reconvey the security subjects, they were not entitled to refuse to grant an assignation to the bond on the ground that such an assignation would be to their prejudice as second bondholders. It was true that a debtor who had granted two bonds over the same subjects could not on payment of the debt due under the first bond keep up that bond to the prejudice of the second bondholder.³ But MacBean was not the granter of the second bond here, nor had he assented to the granting of it. The argument, that by selling the security subjects and so putting the buyer in the position of being able to burden them further, the debtor must be held to have assented to what the purchaser did, had been expressly rejected in England.⁴ The English authorities did not depend on any peculiarities of English law,⁵ and were clearly in favour of the defenders.

LORD KINNEAR.—The Lord Ordinary has observed that the question in this case is one of novelty. But it depends upon clear and familiar principles, and I cannot say that their application to the circumstances of the case appears to me to involve any serious difficulty.

In May 1874 the defender Hugh MacBean borrowed £3000 from Bankier's trustees, and executed in their favour a bond and disposition in security in ordinary form, obliging himself to repay the loan, and disposing to the lenders a piece of ground in Glasgow, extending to 870 square yards, in security of the personal obligation.

In November 1874 the borrower MacBean sold the subjects under burden of the bond to George Jeffrey for £4400, £1400 being paid in money, and the purchaser undertaking to pay the balance of £3000 by relieving the seller of his bond in favour of Bankier's trustees. In addition to this obligation of relief the disponent agreed that the obligations contained in the bond should transmit against him and his heirs and successors, and that agreement appears in gremio of the conveyance in terms of the 47th section of the Conveyancing Act, 1874. There can be no question as to the import or legal effect of this transaction. The seller did not insist upon the price being fully paid up in order that his liability under the bond might be discharged, but relied upon the lands being sufficient to meet his creditor's claims. His personal obligation was therefore allowed to remain in force, but the debt was still secured upon the lands, and assuming the security to be sufficient he effectually protected himself against his disponent not merely by taking him bound in relief, but also by requiring him to undertake a direct liability to the creditor enforceable by diligence or otherwise in the same manner as against himself as the original grantor of the bond.

The lands were sold by Jeffrey, and after passing through various hands they were acquired in March 1877 by George Eadie. At that date they were still subject to the bond for £3000, which had never been called up, and they were further burdened with two postponed bonds for £800 and £550 for loans contracted by successive proprietors after they had ceased to belong to the defender. But nothing had been done to prejudice the security held by Bankier's trustees, or to alter in any way the mutual rights and liabilities of the creditor and debtor under their bond. Each new proprietor in turn had become bound to pay the debt, and so to relieve his predecessor. But the personal liability of the defender was still undischarged.

But the position of parties was materially altered by a subsequent transaction. Immediately after acquiring the property Eadie borrowed £3000 from the pursuers, the North Albion Company, and disposed in security a portion of the ground included in the defender's bond and disposition in favour of Bankier's trustees. The new bond was of course postponed to the first, and therefore the pursuers could take no benefit from their security until Bankier's trustees were fully paid. But, presumably for the purpose of improving their position, and at all events with that result, Eadie in October 1877 obtained from the trustees a deed of restriction whereby, without any consideration having been paid to them, they released a portion of the land, extending to 325 square yards, from the security constituted by their bond, and declared it to be redeemed and disburdened thereof.

In 1880 the pursuers purchased the right of Bankier's trustees for the sum of £3000—the full amount of their loan—and obtained from them an assignation and disposition of their bond and security excepting the portion which they had released. The pursuers, as assignees of the original bondholders, now sue the defenders for payment of the sum contained in the bond. But they are not in a position to reinvest him in that part of the security subjects which their authors have released, and they decline to reinvest him in the part which is still covered by their security. They maintain that their right to enforce his personal obligation is in no way prejudiced by the release, and that they are not bound to grant an assignation of the bond, because the subjects still affected by it are held by them in security of another debt so as to give them an interest to insist that it shall be discharged of the debt which they are now seeking to enforce.

I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the pursuers' position is untenable. The rights of debtor and creditor under the bond in question are in all material respects identical with those of pledger and pledgee. The bond and disposition in security constitutes a real contract by which the debtor conveys to his creditor a heritable subject, to be held by him in security of the debt, and to be redelivered on payment or satisfaction. It is quite true, as the pursuers' counsel maintained, that the creditor is entitled to the benefit of all his remedies so as to obtain full payment. He may enforce the personal obligation against the debtor without losing his real right over the subject of the security if his debtor does not pay in full. But his obligation under the contract is to restore the land on payment of the debt, and he cannot demand payment on any other condition. These are concurrent obligations, and if the creditor has disabled himself from performing his part of the contract by making away with the impignorated lands he cannot enforce the counter obligation against his debtor. The pursuers are in no better position than their authors by whom the subjects impignorated were conveyed without consideration to Eadie, and indeed they claim to take benefit from the renunciation in Eadie's favour as enlarging their security as creditors under his bond. Their contention therefore is that when lands have been conveyed in security of a loan, the lender may convey them without consideration to a third party, and may still enforce payment of the loan from the borrower without giving back the lands.

It was argued in support of this claim that the creditor in a heritable security is under no obligation to convey, but only to discharge the debt; that if the borrower has retained the property the discharge will operate a reconveyance to him; that if he has sold the property the discharge must of necessity operate in favour of his disponee, but that that is not the fault of the creditor, but the legal consequence of his own act. The conveyance, it is said, carries with it an assignation of the right to redeem, and entitles the creditor to transact with the assignee. But the debtor it is said is not only divested of his right to redeem, he is absolutely divested of the property affected by the security. The discharge or renunciation therefore, which is the only instrument which a security-holder whose right is determined is under obligation to grant, cannot operate in favour of the debtor, but only in favour of the disponee, to whom he has chosen to convey the lands. It follows that he cannot reacquire the right which he possessed when he executed the bond and disposition in security, nor can he acquire any new right in the lands except by an assignation of his creditor's right. But a creditor is under no legal obligation to assign to his debtor. The debtor's interest to obtain an assignation arises from a contract with which the creditor has no concern, and the right to demand it is admitted on a principle of equity only, and may be excluded by a counter equity in the creditor. But the pursuers hold the subjects in security for a separate debt and cannot be required to grant an assignation which may prejudice that security.

This reasoning appears to me to be fallacious from beginning to end. A heritable security may in general be extinguished by a discharge declaring the lands to be redeemed and disburdened, not because the creditor is not bound by his contract to reconvey, but because a formal disposition or resignation is unnecessary to operate a reconveyance. Before the present statutory forms were introduced it was settled law, as a consequence of the rule, that the feudal infeftment is merely accessory to the personal obligation, that the infeftment on a bond and disposition in security might be extinguished by a registered renunciation. But the creditor's obligation is not to be measured by the forms of conveyancing, but by the substance of his contract. And neither the common law nor the Acts of 1845 and 1868 relieve him of his obligation to redeliver the land, which he holds only in security of a debt, when the debt is paid in full. So long as the debtor retains the property that obligation will be effectually performed by executing a discharge in the usual form. But the obligation is not to disburden the lands, in whose hands soever they may be, but to redeliver them to the debtor when he is called upon to pay. And if the lands have been sold under burden of the debt, so that a mere discharge will not operate in the debtor's favour, he is entitled to demand an assignation and disposition, not upon any principle of equity, but because that is the appropriate instrument for giving effect to the creditor's obligation to give back the subjects which have been impledged to him when his debt is paid. It is true that the defender's right has been assigned, and if it had been assigned absolutely the pursuers and their authors would have been entitled to transact with the assignee. But it was obvious on the face of the titles that the assignation of the right to redeem was conditional on the disponees making payment of the debt and so discharging the defenders' obligation as well as disencumbering the lands. There is no difference in this respect between the position of the ultimate purchaser Eadie, with whom the pursuers transacted, and that of the immediate purchaser from the defender. The conveyance in his favour was under burden of the security, and by accepting it he bound himself to pay the debt, and so to relieve his immediate authors of their obligation to relieve the defender of all liability. He had no right therefore in the subject of the security, and could acquire none, which should be good against the defender, except by paying the debt or otherwise procuring a discharge of the defenders' liability under the bond. It is true that the redeemable right created by a bond and disposition in security is a mere burden on the fee, and therefore that a discharge of the security or the debt must necessarily disencumber the lands for the apparent benefit of the proprietor for the time being. But so long as it remains undischarged the redeemable right in security is held and may be transmitted as a separate and distinct estate; and whether the creditor who holds it has a right to transfer it to the actual proprietor of the feudal fee depends not upon the form of his title but upon his personal obligations by his contract with the debtor from whom he acquired. If he may dispose of it gratuitously to the prejudice of his debtor, it would seem to follow that he might sell it for a price, and I can see no ground of distinction in this respect between a discharge in favour of the feudal proprietor and an assignation in favour of a third party. The only difference is that the proprietor in this case had undertaken a personal liability for payment of the debt, and was entitled upon such payment to disencumber his estate. The creditor might therefore accept him as debtor in place of the defender if he thought fit, and this is what he has done in effect. I do not think it material whether Bankier's trustees should be held to have accepted Eadie as their debtor, and renounced by implication their claim against the defender, or to have exonerated the defender from liability by disabling themselves from performing their counter obligation. In either view they could not transfer their right in security to the defender's prejudice and still enforce payment from him under his bond. The English decisions to which we were referred afford valuable and interesting illustrations of a principle which is common to the laws of both countries. But the principle is not in controversy. No one disputes that a pledgee must give back the pledge when the debt is paid by the pledgor. The only question raised by the pursuers' argument is whether that general rule is not excluded in the case of a bond and disposition in security by technical rules of Scotch conveyancing. For the reasons already given, I am of opinion that that question must be answered in the negative.

LORD M'LAREN.—The history of the case and the bearing of the facts upon the question at issue are so fully explained in the opinion which has been delivered that it is not necessary that I should do more than briefly indicate the reasons which lead me to concur in the judgment proposed.

When a proprietor of lands and heritages grants a bond for borrowed money, and disposes his lands in security of his obligation to repay, he has two rights as against his creditor. First, he is entitled, on payment of the principal sum and interest, to be retrocessed, or to have the burden on the lands removed, which, according to our practice, is accomplished by means of a discharge of the bond noted in the Register of Sasines. Secondly, in case of default in payment, and the consequent sale of the lands under the power of sale contained in the bond, he (the debtor) is entitled to have the price of the entire subject applied by the creditor in redemption of the debt, so that he shall not be liable to be distressed for payment of any larger sum than the balance remaining due after the surplus proceeds of the sale shall have been so applied. So long as the debtor retains the property of the lands no question can arise, because the creditor's right is a redeemable right, becoming irredeemable only in virtue of a sale under the power, and the creditor cannot without the debtor's consent give away any part of the security or dispose of it by a private sale so as to give a good title to the disponee. But the debtor, after granting a bond and disposition in security, retains the power of selling and disposing of the subject under the burden of the bond because he is the proprietor, and when this is done, as in the case before us, the creditor may have two debtors—the purchaser, who is bound as a debtor in virtue of his agreement with the seller, and the original debtor, who continues to be bound in terms of his obligation until the creditor obtains payment or grants a release.

The sale of the subject under burden of the bond makes this difference in the relations of the original debtor to his creditor, that the original debtor is not, and cannot be, reinvested in the estate which he has sold as a consequence of payment in terms of his bond; he is only entitled to an assignation of the bond to the effect that he may take the place of the creditor in the obligation, while the purchaser holds the estate as before under the burden of the debt. This is merely a variation of the mode in which the right of the original debtor is explicated; the substance of the transaction is the same, for in either case the redeemable right to the lands is restored to the debtor when he repays the borrowed money and interest. Again, if the subject of the security comes to be sold under the powers of the bond, the original debtor may require his creditor to apply the proceeds of sale towards the payment of the debt, and he is only liable to the extent of the deficiency of the fund for payment after such application is duly made. So much I think is clear, and indeed cannot seriously be disputed. The heritable creditor cannot by agreement with the purchaser discharge the real security and at the same time require the original debtor to make full payment in terms of his personal obligation. Such a proceeding appears to me to be contrary to the most elementary notions of justice, as it is inconsistent with the contract of pledge and with the general law of rights in security. But if the creditor is unable to release the entire subject from the burden affecting it consistently with the retention of a right of action against his original debtor, neither can he release a part of the subject so as to defeat or lessen the right of his debtor to obtain an assignation of the security subjects in exchange for payment of the debt. If only a part of the lands be released the breach of contract is less in degree, but it is perfectly clear that the release is a breach of contract; and in my apprehension the only question is, whether such a breach of contract has the effect of disabling the creditor altogether from suing on his bond, or whether the effect is that the value of the subject released is to be ascertained and its amount imputed along with the proceeds of the sale of the remaining estate towards the extinction of that debt. This question indeed was not argued to us, and I only notice it in passing because it seems to me to be the true alternative, indeed the only alternative which deserves serious discussion.

My opinion is, that by releasing a part of the subject, however small, the creditor is disabled from suing the original debtor on his personal obligation. The creditor's obligation to restore the subject upon the borrowed money and interest being repaid is an obligation arising out of the contract of pledge whereby the lands are disposed in security heritably and redeemably. This obligation to restore is one and indivisible, and it is the counterpart of the debtor's obligation to repay, which is also indivisible. As the debtor while he retains the property has not the right in making a partial payment to demand a restriction of the security—I mean release of a part of the heritable subjects—so neither has the heritable creditor the right to grant a partial release to a purchaser, nor indeed to operate upon the subject of security in any way except by a sale in terms of the power. I can find no principle for converting the legal obligation of the heritable creditor to account for the proceeds of a sale into an equitable obligation to account on the principle of a valuation. If the principle of estimation of value were admitted in a case where only a part of the subject was released, it must also be applicable to the case of a release of the entire subject, and thus the right of the debtor to a retrocession would be converted without his consent into a right of a different nature, and one which it may safely be assumed he never would have agreed to accept when he granted the heritable security.

Now, in the present case it is admitted that the pursuers are not in a position to tender an assignation of the entire subject of the security, nor are they able to offer an assignation of the subject which they have released in exchange for so much of the debt as is not covered by the proceeds of sale of the remanent estate; and it follows, in my opinion, that the defender is entitled to be assoilzied from the action as laid. This will not in the meantime extinguish the bond or deprive the creditor of his recourse in case he shall be able to buy back the released subject before any steps are taken by the defender to have his liability as debtor in the bond determined. It may be that an obligant in such circumstances has the right to bring an action against his creditor tendering payment of the unpaid portion of the debt, and concluding for an assignation of the impledged subjects, or alternatively that he should be declared free from his obligation. Whether such an action could be successfully maintained it is not necessary now to consider, because the question cannot arise under an action at the creditor's instance. In the present action we only decide that the pursuer is not entitled to enforce the bond against the defender, because he does not offer, and is unable to offer, fulfilment of his counter obligation to restore or assign the subject of the security. No. 24.

Webster v. Incorporation of
Tailors of Ayr.

Trust—Trade incorporation—Widows' fund—Illegal resolution—Exclusion of new members.—In 1761 the Ancient Incorporation of Tailors in Ayr resolved that the whole stock of the incorporation, with the sums to be derived from the entries of freemen, should be joined together in a "scheme" for the benefit of the widows and orphans of such members of the incorporation as should contribute to the scheme, and for relief of such members when aged and infirm. After the first year members of the incorporation were not to be allowed to join the scheme when above thirty-six years of age. In 1805 the limit of age was changed to forty years.

In 1846 the Act 9 and 10 Vict. c. 17, abolished the exclusive trading privileges of the incorporation, and subsequently few persons joined it. In 1860 the members of the scheme, with the view of restricting the entry of new members in order to secure greater benefits for themselves, passed a resolution that no members should be allowed to enter the scheme above the age of thirty.

Held (1) that the powers possessed by the incorporation prior to the passing of the Act of admitting persons to the privilege of trading were held by them in trust for public purposes, and that the incorporation could not have refused admission to the trade of persons properly qualified; (2) that the relative scheme was a similar trust, and that the incorporation were not entitled, for the purpose of enlarging the benefits of present members, to impose restrictions on the entry of new members; and (3) that the resolution to exclude persons above thirty being passed for that purpose was illegal.

Trust—Administration—Illegal resolution.—A trade incorporation holding funds in trust for the benefit of existing and future members passed a resolution illegally restricting the admission of future members to persons under thirty years of age instead of under forty as formerly. Held that the incorporation were entitled to disregard the illegal resolution without formally recalling it.

ON 5th February 1761, the Ancient Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr passed the following Act:—"We, the Incorporation of Taylors in the burgh of Ayr, considering that the original and sole intention of paying in money to the common stock of said incorporation at the entry of freemen and journeymen and apprentices, was, and is, for the relief of the necessitous or poor of said trade. But as it hath often happened, this laudable design hath not been equally applied as the necessitys of severals have required not being made known to the incorporation; and as the common stock of said incorporation is now much advanced, We have devised a method which will be some small relief to the necessitys of the widows and orphans of the members of said incorporation, and also of those who may be rendered unable to work thro' sickness or old age. And this by a small contribution quarterly out of the pockets of the members of said incorporation, and abrogating the usual annual expenses of drinking at the election of a deacon or other affairs of said trade which came off the common stock: And therefore according to the powers and privileges vested in us as an incorporation for managing the said common stock, We do cheerfully and unanimously consent, statute, and appoint that the common stock presently belonging to said incorporation with the yearly interest thereof, and what shall be contributed by the members thereof now and hereafter shall be joined together and be a fund for payment of annuities to the widows and orphans of the members of said incorporation who shall adhere and agree to this scheme, and those who shall be sick and unable to work and maintain themselves thro' old age or infirmitys: And we agree to statute and appoint the following to be the conditions and regulations for promoting and executing this scheme."

By the regulations it was provided that all entry moneys, &c., paid by persons admitted freemen of the incorporation should "be put in and joined to the common stock of said incorporation to make up the fund hereby intended."

Existing freemen were to be allowed to accede to the scheme within twelve months. "After these twelve months no person, though admitted a freeman of the incorporation, shall be allowed to accede to this scheme who is above thirty-six years of age, and he must be free of any epidemical or consumptive disease."

It was further provided that after the scheme had existed for four years annuities of £3 should be paid to the widows and children of every freeman who had contributed to the fund. There was also a provision for payment of sick-money to members, and for pensions of 1s. per week to members disabled from work by old age or other infirmity.

In 1805 new regulations were passed under which the age above which no person was allowed to join the scheme was fixed at forty instead of thirty-six. It was also provided,—“Should it be found necessary for the advancement of this fund to alter any of these articles or regulations, the proposed alteration or amendment shall be laid before the managers, and if they approve of the same it shall be under discussion for three months, after which, if it shall be approved of by a majority of votes at a general meeting, it shall be enacted into a law.”

In 1846 the Act 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17, for the abolition of the exclusive privileges of trading in burghs in Scotland, was passed.

At a meeting of the members of the incorporation scheme, held on 30th September 1852, William Gunn made the following motion:—"In consequence of no person having entered into the incorporation scheme since the passing of the Act 9 and 10 Vict. c. 17, entitled," &c., "whereby the original uses and purposes of the incorporation, their 'exclusive privileges' and emoluments arising therefrom, were virtually put an end to; and that after having provided for the present aged members and widows, and future aged members and widows, and the orphans of all members, if any be, in terms of the present acts and regulations, the whole heritable properties and others of the incorporation scheme will in time fall to the longest liver of the present members: Therefore, to prevent this manifest injustice, I propose that after having served the above purposes the said whole properties and others shall belong to and become the absolute property of the whole living members and their heirs at the passing of said Act, share and share alike; and that the clerk shall get such deeds of conveyance of said properties as he shall judge proper, to the now living members of the incorporation scheme, and to the heirs or representatives of such members as shall have died since the passing of said Act, &c., . . . said deeds to be submitted for the opinion and revision of counsel, . . . which motion, having been seconded by the said James Loudon and approved of by the managers present, the meeting unanimously ordain that the same 'shall be under discussion for three months,' in terms of article 23 of the present acts and regulations." Webster v. In-

corporation of
Tailors of Ayr.

At a general meeting of the members of the scheme, held on 11th January 1853, the motion was unanimously approved of, and passed.

Thereafter, deeds of conveyance in favour of the members of the incorporation and the heirs of deceased members were submitted and ordered to be executed and recorded. One of the members, however, Peter Glass, dissented and obtained interdict from the Sheriff-substitute (J. Robison) against this course being carried out.

In 1855 two new members, James Cunningham and Archibald Rae, were admitted, and in 1856 the entry-money payable by new members was raised, and in 1859 resolutions were passed, giving to each member at the age of sixty a right to receive without inquiry as to health or circumstances an annuity on the ground of old age and infirmity.

At a meeting, on 8th March 1860, at which Rae, Cowan, Cunningham, Glass, and James Loudon, the whole members, were present, a resolution was passed, and confirmed on 12th June following, to the effect (1) that in future the old age annuity should be conferred upon all members "on attaining the age of fifty-six" years; and (2) that "no persons should be admitted members of the . . . scheme who are upwards of thirty years of age." No new members were in fact admitted between 1855 and 1890.

On 1st December 1890 William Sadler (one of the pursuers in the first action after mentioned) was admitted a member of the incorporation, Andrew Cowan and Rae being then the only other members. His claim to be admitted to the scheme fund was disputed, but by decree of the Court of Session dated 28th January 1892 it was declared that Sadler was duly admitted a member of the fund as from 1st December 1890, and was entitled to the privileges of the fund as from that date.

On 30th May 1891, prior to the date of this decree, Andrew Cowan and Rae held a meeting of the scheme fund at which Sadler was not present,—no notice of the meeting having been sent to him,—and they resolved to suspend the standing order of 1805, requiring three months' discussion before altering any rule, and raised the annuities to aged members from £55, which sum they were then paying themselves, to £90 for the future.

William Love and Matthew Morrison obtained decrees of declarator on 28th January 1892 that they were admitted members of the incorporation and scheme fund as at 1st June 1891.

On 13th June 1891, however, prior to these decrees, at a meeting at which Rae and Andrew Cowan were alone present,—Sadler, Love, and Morrison not being present, and not having received any notice of the meeting,—the standing orders that there should be three months' discussion of an alteration of articles were again suspended, the age above which members could not be admitted was altered from thirty years, at which it had stood since 1860, to forty years as originally fixed by the rules of 1805, the age at which members should be entitled to annuities was raised from fifty-five to sixty, and in pursuance of the enactment, on 16th June 1891, Webster and Finlayson, both of whom were over thirty years of age, were admitted members.

Webster v. Incorporation of
Tailors of Ayr.

On 13th July 1891 William Cowan, also over thirty, was admitted, Rae and Andrew Cowan being the only members present, and no notice of the meeting having been sent to Sadler, Love, and Morrison. At the next meeting of the incorporation the minute of 13th June was read and approved. Further, on 7th and 24th August 1891 meetings were held at which certain "acts and regulations" were passed and approved of as the "acts and regulations" regulating the affairs of the scheme fund in future and embodying the alterations of annuities above referred to. These proceedings bore to be unanimous, and the minute of meeting of 24th August 1891 bore that the revised articles and regulations were read over and signed by the deacon and other members present, being the whole members of the scheme except Sadler, Love, and Morrison.

On 29th March 1892 Sadler, Morrison, and Love, describing themselves as a majority and quorum of the members of the scheme fund, for themselves and as representing the scheme fund, raised an action against Andrew Cowan and Archibald Rae, two members of the fund, and against Alexander J. Webster, John Finlayson, and William Cowan as "pretended members," concluding for reduction of (1) the minute of 30th May 1891, whereby the annuities of aged and infirm members of said scheme fund were increased from £55 to £90 per annum; (2) the minutes of 13th June 1891, 16th June 1891, and 13th July 1891, whereby the age of admission to said scheme fund was altered, and defenders Cowan, Webster, and Finlayson were admitted members of the scheme fund; and (3) the writ or document titled "Acts and Regulations" of 24th August 1891; and further, for declarator that the last named three defenders were not members of the scheme fund.

The pursuers averred;—"After the passing of the Act 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17, fewer persons applied to join the incorporation and thus qualify themselves to enter the scheme. The defenders Andrew Cowan and Rae, together with the said deceased James Cunningham, the three youngest members of the incorporation and scheme, took advantage of this circumstance for the furthering of their fraudulent and collusive scheme for appropriating to themselves the whole benefits of said scheme fund. The alterations on the rules and regulations of said scheme fund, after narrated, which were proposed from time to time by the defenders Cowan and Rae and the said late James Cunningham, were designed and intended by them to aid and assist in carrying out said fraudulent and collusive scheme. . . . By such devices as these, viz., increasing the amount of entry-money to the scheme, putting off all applicants with the false excuse that an accountant was preparing a new scale of entry-money until after the applicant had passed the proper age for admission, and refusing to give applicants any information as to the regulations for admission, they discouraged applications; and though several persons duly qualified did apply for admission, the said defenders Andrew Cowan and Rae, along with Cunningham, continued to prevent any one being admitted subsequent to the year 1855. No new member was admitted after Rae and Cunningham became members, which was in that year,—thirty-seven years ago,—until pursuers were admitted." They further averred that the increasing of the annuities and the raising of the age limit from thirty to forty at the meeting to which none of the pursuers were called, the suspension of the standing orders, which required three months' discussion, and the admission of Webster, Finlayson, and William Cowan, were all steps taken by Rae and Andrew Cowan with the view of strengthening themselves in their policy of appropriating the whole benefits of the scheme fund. The pursuers also averred that the acts and regulations enacted on 7th and 24th August 1891 were illegal, as being passed without notice to the pursuers. No. 25.

Defences were lodged for Andrew Cowan and Rae, but subsequently they consented to decree of reduction. Nov. 14, 1893.
Sadler v.
Webster.

The defenders Webster, Finlayson, and William Cowan averred that they had no interest to defend the resolutions in favour of Andrew Cowan and Rae; that the pursuers had formed a scheme to obtain complete control of the affairs of the incorporation fund for their own exclusive benefit; that the scheme existed for the benefit of the whole trade in Ayr; and that the former attempts to exclude new members and the present attempt to extrude the defenders were illegal. Webster v. Incorporation of
Tailors of Ayr.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) In respect the foresaid minutes and regulations were passed by a minority of the members and without due and requisite notice to the pursuers, who are a majority of the members, the same should be reduced, as concluded for. (2) The said pretended minutes and regulations being contrary to the constitution and immemorial practice of said incorporation and scheme, and in fraudem of the rights of the pursuers and the other future members of said scheme fund, they ought to be reduced, as concluded for. (3) The resolutions in said minutes and the resolutions referred to having been passed and made by the defenders Andrew Cowan and Rae, and sanctioned by the other defenders, with the object of carrying out a fraudulent and collusive scheme by the defenders Andrew Cowan and Rae for appropriating to themselves the whole benefits of said scheme fund to the exclusion of others having just claims thereon, decree of reduction should be pronounced, as craved.

The defenders Webster, Finlayson, and Cowan pleaded;—(4) The said defenders William Cowan, Webster, and Finlayson having been duly admitted members of the scheme, they ought to be assollized, with expenses, from the conclusions of the summons. (6) The said resolutions of 8th March 1860 having been in fraud of the purposes of the scheme and of the rights of the defenders as future tailors in Ayr, are null and void; or otherwise, these defenders are entitled to have the same reduced and set aside.

On 3d November 1892 Webster, Finlayson, and Andrew Cowan raised a counter action against the whole Incorporation of the Tailors of Ayr, and also against William Cowan, Rae, Sadler, Matthew Morrison, and William Love, as individuals, to have it declared that they were duly admitted members of the incorporation and of the scheme fund by the minutes of 13th June, 16th June, and 13th July 1891; and, if necessary, for reduction of the minutes of 8th March and 12th June 1860, whereby the maximum age for admission for members to the scheme fund was reduced from forty years to thirty years.

The pursuers, inter alia, averred that the resolutions in 1860 were passed and confirmed in pursuance of a fraudulent scheme devised by the members who were then in the administration of the affairs of the society to appropriate the benefits of the fund to themselves and to prevent the admission of new members.

A proof was allowed in both actions.

The import of the proof fully appears in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), where the material parts of the evidence of Rae and Cowan are quoted.

On 1st February 1893 the Lord Ordinary in Sadler's action pronounced this interlocutor:—"Reduces, decerns, and declares in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons, except as regards the minutes of the scheme fund, dated respectively 13th June 1891, 16th June 1891, and 13th July 1891, whereby the age of admission to the said scheme fund

* "OPINION.—This action has two objects. The first is to cut down certain increased annuities granted by the corporation scheme to its older members. The second is to exclude from the benefits of the corporation scheme the three defenders Webster, Finlayson, and Cowan. The pursuers are three individual members of the corporation and of the corporation scheme who, if I may use the expression, have fought their way into membership by recent legal proceedings; and the action takes the form of a reduction of certain minutes and regulations by which the annuities in question were increased, and of certain other minutes by which the admission of the three defenders was effected.

"There is now no question as to the first set of minutes—that is to say, as to the first object of the action. The older members, who alone had an interest to defend, have consented to decree as craved, and the other defenders have in this matter the same interest with the pursuers. The controversy is therefore confined to the validity of the proceedings by which the defenders Webster, Cowan, and Finlayson have been admitted to the benefits of the corporation scheme.

"The ground of objection to their admission is this, that at the dates of their respective applications they were over thirty years of age, and that according to the then rules of the scheme no member was eligible who had passed that age. The pursuers complain that this being the rule, the corporation, by the proceedings complained of, first altered the rule in an irregular manner, and then admitted the pursuers as if the rule had been lawfully altered.

"Had the question, in my view, depended on the regularity of the proceedings by which the thirty years' limit of age was altered, as it bears to be by the minute of 13th June 1891 (being the second minute under reduction), I should, I confess, have had some difficulty. The original rules of the society, as established in 1761, provided that the same might be altered at any time by a majority of the members. But by the rules of 1805, which appear to have been in force as from that date, it is expressly enacted that 'any alteration or amendment shall be laid before the managers, and if they approve of the same, it shall be under discussion for three months, after which, if it shall be approved of by a majority of votes at a general meeting, it shall be enacted into a law.' As the facts stand, there is no doubt that this standing order was not obeyed. Before, therefore, I could sustain the regularity of the proceedings complained of, I should have to affirm (1) that it was open to the members of the scheme by the unanimous vote of any meeting to suspend the standing order; and (2) that it made no difference that the rule was altered in the absence of, or without notice to, the pursuer Sadler, who, although not a member at the time de facto, must be held to have been a member de jure, inasmuch as it has been since found by a judgment of this Court that he was duly admitted to the scheme as from 1st December 1890. Now, as I have already indicated, I should have hesitated to affirm either of those propositions. I am not sure that I could affirm the first; and I do not at present see how I could, in any view, affirm the second. The principle upon which it is held that the ordinary acts of public bodies are not affected by disputes as to the election or qualifications of members does not, I am afraid, apply to such proceedings as those in question.

"But the defenders contend that the regularity or irregularity of the proceedings is not really, in this case, material. They say (what is not disputed) that, but for the age limit referred to, they were entitled to admission,—just as much entitled as the pursuers,—and their case is that the age limit, which is said to exclude them, was an unlawful limit—a limit which had been unlawfully imposed, and which the corporation was not only entitled but bound to rescind. In this view, the alteration of the rule of which the pursuers complain was, the defenders say, a mere matter of form—the corporation being entitled to disregard the rule, and it being therefore of no consequence whether they repealed it formally or informally.

Webster v. Incorporation of
Tailors of Ayr.

"Now, I do not at all doubt that this reasoning is quite sound if its main premiss be once established, viz., that the rule by which the maximum age for entrants was fixed at thirty years was a rule which had been unlawfully passed. The real question is, whether that proposition can be made good, and that seems to depend upon this—whether certain resolutions passed by the members of the scheme, so far back as 8th March and 12th June 1860, were lawful and valid resolutions?

"The history of that matter seems to be this: The original rules of the scheme provided that members might be admitted up to thirty-six years of age. This was altered in 1805 to forty years, and up to 1860 there was no attempt to disturb the limit of age thus fixed. But after 1846, when the exclusive privileges of municipal corporations were abolished by the Statute 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17, the numbers of this corporation, as of similar corporations, began to dwindle. The old members died out, and few new members joined either the scheme or the corporation itself. Consequently, it happened that by the year 1853 there were only about half-a-dozen members in existence, and these members, perhaps not unnaturally, began to consider that the corporation funds were their private property, which, subject to existing claims, they might, if they chose, divide. In this view there was, in the year I have mentioned (the year 1853), an attempt made to divide the funds openly and directly, and this having been frustrated by the action of a dissenting member who appealed to the Sheriff, a second and more artistic plan was adopted, for the purpose of securing what I have no doubt the members concerned thought their just rights, or, at least, the legitimate advantages of their position.

"It is to this chapter in the history of the corporation that the resolutions of March and June 1860, to which exception is now taken, belong. These resolutions were passed, the defenders say, as part and parcel of a concerted plan, which they call fraudulent, but which I prefer to call unlawful, for excluding new members from the scheme, and appropriating its benefits to the one or two old members who by this time formed the corporation. The course which seems to have been followed was this:—In the first place, certain additions were made to the entry-money payable by new members. This occurred in 1856. Next, in 1859, resolutions were passed giving to each member at the age of sixty a right to receive without inquiry an annuity on the ground of old age and infirmity. Then followed in 1860 the resolutions in question, which, on the one hand, conferred right to an annuity at the age of fifty-six, and, on the other hand, closed the society to all entrants over thirty years of age. Lastly, there ensued a deliberate and sustained course of action, whereby from the year 1855 to 1891, all applications for admission were either refused on the ground of age, or staved off on the ground that the corporation was in course of consulting an actuary with respect to the future terms of admission. The result, on the whole, was that during the thirty-six years in question (from 1855 to 1891) no new members were admitted—the first to be admitted being the present pursuers, who fought their way in, as I have already mentioned, but who now turn round and seek to exclude the defenders, taking up the position that, while everything else during the period in question was unlawful, and even fraudulent, there was one thing which was lawful, viz., the reduction of the maximum age for entrants.

"The defenders, as I have said, contend that the whole of these proceedings, including very specially the reduction of the maximum age for entrants, were truly part and parcel of the same concerted scheme; and that the object in view throughout was the unlawful object which I have already stated. I have come to the conclusion upon the evidence that in this contention the defenders

No. 25. decerns in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons: Finds it unnecessary to pronounce any decree in terms of the reductive conclusions, and dismisses the same," &c.

Webster v. Incorporation of

are right. In the first place, the pursuers themselves make the following averment in condescendence 3,—‘After the passing of the Act 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17, fewer persons applied to join the incorporation, and thus qualify themselves to enter the scheme. The defenders Andrew Cowan and Rae, together with the said deceased James Cunningham, the three youngest members of the incorporation and scheme, took advantage of this circumstance for the furthering of their fraudulent and collusive scheme for appropriating to themselves the whole benefits of said scheme fund. The alterations on the rules and regulations of said scheme fund, after narrated, which were proposed from time to time by the defenders Cowan and Rae, and the said late James Cunningham, were designed and intended by them to aid and assist in carrying out said fraudulent and collusive scheme.’ They then go on to narrate certain minutes making the alterations referred to, and amongst those minutes are those of March and June 1860, which are now particularly in question. No doubt they do not recite the portions of the minutes which altered the age for entrants. They recite only the portions by which the age for annuities was reduced. But no reason is given for thus disconnecting the two portions of the minutes, and for assuming the existence of a different motive as determining the one alteration and the other.

“In the next place, Mr Rae, who has been the leading actor in these proceedings, was at the proof examined by the pursuers, and he made no concealment of what had been the views and objects of himself and his friends. He says,—‘Our privileges as an incorporation had been taken away by Sir Robert Peel’s Bill, and we did not wish to admit any more members to the scheme. That was the real truth of it, and the real object of reducing the age. That was my motive and the motive of the others, with the exception of Mr Cowan. Mr Cowan told me over and over again that it was illegal, and we could not do it.’ And again,—‘I thought, as our special privileges had been abolished, the scheme had become a private society. That was my view of it.’ Mr Cowan was examined for the defenders, and was to the same effect. He says,—‘The alteration was carried at a meeting at which Mr Glass, Mr Loudon, Mr Rae, and Mr Cunningham were present. I was against it, but I was outvoted. I think I entered my dissent. The object of the alteration was, I suppose, to shut up the society, and my object was to continue it for the good of old men connected with the trade and their widows.’ I am quite alive to the fact that Mr Rae’s attitude towards the pursuers is not friendly, and that it is open to suggest that the frankness of his statement may have had some connection with that circumstance. But still the fact remains that what I have read is his evidence, and that of Mr Cowan, and I am bound to say that, having heard them examined, I believed them both.

“In the next place, however, and finally, it appears to me that even discarding the pursuers’ averments, and rejecting the parole evidence, the case is one in which res ipsa loquitur. There is, I am afraid, no getting over the fact that during all those thirty-six years no single individual member was admitted—informal applications being staved off, and all formal applications being on one ground or another delayed. Neither can it be overlooked that during the period in question the annuities of the old members were from time to time largely increased. I cannot, I confess, resist the conclusion that, but for the legal proceedings adopted by the pursuers and those acting along with them, the various alterations made from time to time on the rules, including very specially the alteration in the maximum age for entrants, must have resulted sooner or later in the absorption of the funds by the surviving members. It was a pretty shrewd anticipation that the number would not be great of master tailors in Ayr desirous to join this scheme, and ready to do so, and to pay the entry-money demanded, while still under thirty years of age. Nor does it appear to me to help the pursuers, if, as they say, the real object of the thirty years’ rule was to form a complement to the provision that all members should obtain

Sadler v.

Webster.

LORD M'LAREN.—Your Lordships have now to consider reclaiming notes in two actions, the first being at the instance of Sadler and others, three members of the scheme fund of the Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr, the chief object of which is to reduce certain minutes of the scheme fund of the incorporation, whereby the defenders Webster, Finlayson, and William Cowan were admitted to the benefit of the scheme. The object of the counter action is to have it found and declared that the three persons last named were duly admitted to the scheme. Both actions contain conclusions for the reduction of previous minutes of the incorporation or scheme, and these are all auxiliary to the principal conclusions. In the view of the Lord Ordinary the parties Webster, Finlayson, and Cowan were properly admitted members of the scheme. I have come to the same conclusion, and on the same grounds, and if your Lordships agree with me, I propose that we should adhere to the Lord Ordinary's judgment in the first action, and that in the second action we should also adhere with a variation which only affects the form of the judgment.

Webster v. Incorporation of Tailors of Ayr.

The principle which underlies the whole of the reasoning on which the Lord Ordinary's judgment is based is that the corporation scheme is a trust, and that the members are trustees for themselves and the future members of the scheme. I shall consider this proposition first in order, because, if it is admitted or established that the schemes of trade incorporations for the benefit of aged members are of the nature of trusts for purposes of public utility, it follows that the existing members of such societies or quasi-corporations are not entitled to administer their affairs in such a manner as to secure to themselves the benefits of the trust to the exclusion of others of the class for whose benefit the scheme was instituted. If this be the true principle to be applied to the case before us, it is not difficult to shew that the grounds on which the desired exclusion of Webster and others from the Incorporation of Tailors is rested entirely fail.

On the question of fiduciary relation, the fundamental fact is that the Incorporation annuities on attaining the age of fifty-six. If that was the object, the pursuers' case, instead of being better, would, I think, be worse. It might have been lawful to assume that at the age of sixty-five, or even at the age of sixty, members of the scheme were no longer able to work at their craft. But a similar assumption with respect to all persons of the age fifty-six strikes me, I confess, as somewhat violent.

"But if the fact be that these resolutions of March and June 1860 were of the character, and had the objects which I have just described, is there any doubt that they were unlawful? I think not. The corporation scheme constitutes in my view a trust, the members being trustees for themselves and the future members of the scheme; and that being so, it must, I think, be held to have been a breach of that trust so to manipulate the rules and conduct the affairs of the scheme as to exclude or throw obstacles in the way of new members, and thus to appropriate the benefits of the trust to the trustees themselves. I rather think that this is the principle to which the pursuers themselves appealed when they sought entrance into the scheme. At all events it is a principle which I am prepared to affirm, and accordingly I propose to hold that de jure the age limit stood, and still stands, as it was fixed in 1805; that therefore there was no obstacle to the defenders' admission when they severally applied; that in rescinding the rule of 1860 and admitting the defenders, the corporation did no more than it was bound to do; and therefore that, on the whole, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. . . ."

corporation of

poration of Tailors of Ayr, on which this benevolent scheme was engrafted, was one of the ancient burghal trade societies or guilds which by our customary law possessed exclusive privileges of trading within the burgh. It is evident that such a system of trade organisation could not exist consistently with a right on the part of the members constituting the society at a particular time to close their doors against new applicants, and to appropriate to themselves the monopoly of the trade and custom of their burgh. Accordingly, in the older decisions regarding the constitution and rules of such societies, it is always assumed that qualified craftsmen are entitled to admission to the society or guild on proof of their ability to exercise the craft, and payment of the dues of admission. The burghesses had indeed a twofold interest in the due administration of the duties committed to the guilds, an interest that the guilds should be open to themselves and their families, and an interest that the guilds should be open to qualified tradesmen, and should not be allowed to degenerate into monopolies. Here then we find two of the elements of a public trust, a definite purpose, being a purpose of public utility, and a body of corporators entrusted with the duty of administration. When to these is added a third element, the existence of a fund appropriated to the relief of indigent members and the families of deceased members, we have all the distinctive marks of fiduciary relation which exist in the case of any ordinary charity or public endowment.

Now it may be that, since the abolition of the exclusive trading privileges of these burghal corporations, it might be difficult for an applicant to qualify an interest to acquire the status of a master tailor in Ayr, distinct from the prospective interest which he would take (along with that recognisable social position) in the funds of the scheme. But then that prospective pecuniary interest is in itself a title to a qualified applicant to vindicate his right of admission, as has been repeatedly held with reference to endowed schools and charitable institutions of all kinds, and, as we are informed, in a previous litigation regarding this very institution. Here, the persons whose rights are in dispute have been admitted, and this is also a title to maintain their position by an appeal to the purposes of the trust or scheme, as expressed in its articles and regulations.

Passing to the constitution of this particular trust, we find that, so early as the year 1761, it is set forth in the acts or minutes of the Incorporation of Tailors "that the original and sole intention of paying in money to the common stock of said incorporation at the entry of freemen, journeymen, and apprentices, was and is for the relief of the necessitous or poor of said trade." On this narrative, and for the relief of the widows and orphans of the members, and also of those who may be disabled through sickness or old age, by means of small quarterly contributions "and abrogating the usual annual expenses of drinking at the election of a deacon," the incorporation cheerfully and unanimously agreed that its common stock, with the yearly interest thereof and what should be contributed by the members, should be combined into a fund for these benevolent purposes. It is unnecessary to examine the details of the scheme, which is in substance and effect what would now be termed a trade insurance fund. But I note further that in 1805, the membership of the guild having meantime increased in numbers, this scheme was revised and put into the form of an articulate paper consisting of 23 articles, which paper is subscribed by the office-bearers as the "articles and regulations" of the scheme. The 23d article is important. It is in these terms,—“Should it be found necessary for the advancement of this fund to alter any of these articles or regulations, the proposed alteration or amendment shall be laid before the managers, and if they approve of the same it shall be under discussion for three months, after which, if it shall be approved of by a majority of votes at a general meeting, it shall be enacted into a law." The articles of 1805, with some amendments, constitute the existing law of the scheme.

Webster v. Incorporation of
Tailors of Ayr.

The matter in controversy, as explained by the Lord Ordinary, is confined to the validity of the proceedings by which the defenders in the first action, Webster, Finlayson, and Cowan, have been admitted to the benefits of the scheme. The objection to their admission is this,—That at the dates of their respective applications they were over thirty years of age, and that according to the then existing rules of the scheme, no member was eligible who had passed that age. The pursuers complain that the corporation first altered the rule in an irregular manner, and then admitted the defenders as if the rule had been lawfully altered. The defenders reply that according to the articles and regulations of 1805 (article 3) the age limit for admission was forty; that the reduction of the age limit from forty to thirty by the minutes passed in 1860 was a proceeding ultra vires and unlawful, which the incorporated society was entitled, if not bound, to disregard. Hence, it is argued, a resolution of the society to disregard the minutes of 1860, and to revert to the age limit fixed in 1805, is sufficient to displace the illegal enactment of 1860, and it is not necessary in order to restore the age limit of forty that the forms required in the case of a new law should be gone through; because, it is said, as soon as the illegal minutes of 1860 are rescinded the regulation of 1805 revives, and with it the right of admission to the scheme within the age of forty.

Now, on the main question, the illegality of the resolutions or minutes of 8th March and 12th June 1860, the case of the defenders, as stated in their 18th answer, and more fully developed in the 5th condescendence of their counter action, is this,—That the resolution in question was passed and confirmed in pursuance of a fraudulent design, devised by the members who were then in the administration of the affairs of the society, to appropriate the benefit of the funds to themselves, and to prevent the admission of new members.

As to the intention to appropriate the corporate funds there can be no doubt. It is recorded in the minute of meeting of 30th September 1852 that a motion was then submitted by Mr William Gunn narrating that no person had entered into the incorporation scheme since the passing of the Act 9 and 10 Vict. cap. 17, entitled "An Act for the abolition of the exclusive privileges of trading in burghs in Scotland"; and that, after having provided for the present aged members and widows and orphans, the whole heritable properties and others of the incorporation scheme will in time fall to the longest liver of the present members. It is therefore proposed to vest the property of the society in "the whole living members and their heirs, share and share alike," and that the clerk shall get the necessary deeds of conveyance prepared. This motion was approved by the managers present, and at subsequent meetings held in January and August 1853, the proposed resolution was confirmed; and thereafter deeds of conveyance in favour of the members of the incorporation and their heirs, said to be revised by an eminent Glasgow conveyancer, were submitted and ordered to be executed and recorded. These proceedings were stopped in consequence of an application to the Sheriff for interdict at the instance of a dissentient member.

It is alleged by the defenders that the members who failed in this direct

No. 25. attempt to appropriate the property of the society set themselves to attain the same result indirectly, by closing their doors against new applications. The Lord Ordinary has held that this allegation is proved, and that the reduction of the age limit was an incident of the illegal design. It does appear that in the year 1855 two new members were admitted. In 1856 the entry-money payable by new members was raised, and in 1859, resolutions were passed giving to each member at the age of sixty a right to receive, without inquiry as to health and circumstances, an annuity on the ground of old age and infirmity. In 1860 resolutions were passed, the first of which conferred right to an annuity at the age of fifty-six—and this proceeding is not defended—the second being the resolution in question altering the age limit for admission to the society. What followed may be stated in the words of the Lord Ordinary:—"Lastly, there ensued a deliberate and sustained course of action, whereby, from the year 1855 to 1891, all applications for admission were either refused on the ground of age, or staved off on the ground that the corporation was in course of consulting an actuary with respect to the future terms of admission. The result, on the whole, was that during the thirty-six years in question (from 1855 to 1891) no new members were admitted—the first to be admitted being the present pursuers, who fought their way in, as I have already mentioned, but who now turn round and seek to exclude the defenders, taking up the position that, while everything else during the period in question was unlawful, and even fraudulent, there was one thing which was lawful, viz., the reduction of the maximum age for entrants."

Webster v. Incorporation of
Tailors of Ayr.

I do not propose to enter more minutely into the documentary evidence in support of the Lord Ordinary's conclusions, because I concur unreservedly in his Lordship's view of the evidence. It is the less necessary that I should examine the proceedings very critically, since two of the members, Rae and Cowan, who took the chief share in the management of the society's affairs during the long period in which the society intercepted all voluntary admissions to its privileges, state with perfect distinctness what was the object of the resolution of 1860. Mr Rae was in favour of making the society a close corporation. Mr Cowan (who seems to have been in a minority of one on this question) was in favour of keeping the society open, as he says, "for the good of old men connected with the trade, and their widows"; but they are agreed that the motive of the resolution was, as it is put, "not to admit any more members to the scheme." The parts of their evidence which bear on this question are quoted in the Lord Ordinary's judgment, and the statements amount to a substantial admission of the truth of the defender's averments.

On 13th June 1891 the members of the society, having been brought to a more just conception of their duties and obligations towards the younger craftsmen of their trade, rescinded the resolution of 1860 by which the age limit was fixed at thirty. I think that the members of the society are entitled to the credit of having performed this act of justice spontaneously, and I sympathise in the Lord Ordinary's suggestion that their past course of action is to be attributed rather to mistaken notions as to their individual rights than to any wilful design to defraud the objects of the scheme. The only objection taken to the resolution of 13th June is, that it is prefaced by a resolution "that the standing order that three months' notice of an alteration in printed acts and regulations of 1805 of the incorporation scheme be suspended at this meeting."

The objection is at best a very technical one, because the standing order in question (Art. 23 of Act 1805), does not prescribe three months' notice, but only that the resolution shall be "under discussion" for three months, after which, if approved, it shall become law. Now, it is not alleged that at any time within three months a motion was made to disapprove of the resolution of 13th June, and I observe from the minutes that not only was the minute of 13th June read and approved at the next meeting, but within the period of three months, viz., on 7th and 24th August, when the revised acts and regulations were under consideration and approved, two opportunities presented themselves on which motions disapproving of the resolution in question might legitimately have been proposed. Moreover, the proceedings on these three occasions,—13th June, 7th and 24th August—bear to be unanimous, and on the last of these occasions the minute bears that the revised acts and regulations were read over and signed by the deacon and other members present, being the whole members of the scheme. I do not find these revised regulations in the printed papers, but if they do not expressly include the resolution of 13th June, they do so by necessary implication; because no benefit scheme could have any meaning or effect which did not fix either directly, or by reference to other documents, so important a point as the age at which the right of admission should cease. Then, as I have said, the proceedings were throughout unanimous; and there is authority for the proposition that a corporation, acting for a legitimate purpose, and within its powers, may dispense with formalities, provided the members are unanimous. If this principle be good for anything, it ought, at least, to cover the case of a society or corporation rescinding an unlawful resolution, which it is their duty to put out of the way at the first opportunity, when its illegality is brought to their notice.

Now, if I have rightly judged the facts of this case, there cannot be the smallest doubt that the resolution of 8th March 1860, reducing the age limit to thirty years, was an illegal act, in the sense of being an abuse of the powers of the then existing members of the body-corporate. It may here be observed that the 23d article of the scheme, to which I have already more than once referred, gives only a qualified power of altering the rules. It begins with the significant phrase, "Should it be found necessary for the advancement of this fund to alter any of these articles." But by the admission of the gentlemen who assisted at the passing of the resolution of 1860, this resolution was not passed with any view to the "advancement" of the scheme, but in the hope of putting an end to the scheme, and appropriating its revenues to their own purposes. The attempted alteration of the scheme was therefore not within the powers conferred by the 23d article, and while it may be that an action would be necessary to set it aside at the instance of an outside party, it appears to me that if the corporators themselves, who knew the motive of the resolution, and were aware of its illegality, and were unanimous in their wish to return to the path of legitimate administration, chose to treat the resolution as a proceeding ultra vires, they were justified in doing so without waiting the expiration of the period of three months which is prescribed as requisite in the case of passing a new law, or an alteration or amendment of the old laws. I do not look upon the proceedings at the meeting of 13th June 1891 as being of the nature of an amendment of the scheme falling within the provisions of the 23d article, but rather as the fulfilment of a necessary duty incumbent on the corporation, which is to be performed in the same way as any other corporate act, viz., in this case,

For these reasons, I propose that the interlocutor brought under review in the action at the instance of Sadler and others be adhered to. With respect to the counter action, the Lord Ordinary has found it unnecessary to pronounce a decree reducing the minutes of 8th March and 12th June 1860. While I do not dissent from the reasons which resulted in this finding, yet, as the rescission of these minutes was challenged by Mr Sadler and the two other pursuers, I think it was a proper step of procedure to bring these minutes under reduction, and that the minutes ought now to be reduced, in order that there may be no dubiety regarding your Lordships' opinion as to their essential nullity. With this variation, I propose that the interlocutor in the action at the instance of Webster and others should also be adhered to.

LORD ADAM, LORD KINNEAR, and the LORD PRESIDENT concurred.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note in the first action, and in the second action pronounced this interlocutor:—"Adhere to said interlocutor except in so far as it finds it unnecessary to pronounce any decree in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons, and dismisses the same: Reduce, decern, and declare in terms of the reductive conclusions of the summons; and decern," &c.

Lewis.

EDWARD DILLON LEWIS, Defender (Reclaimer).—McLennan.

Proof—Oral modification of written contract—Compromise of action by joint minute.—Held that it was incompetent to prove by parole evidence an alleged verbal agreement to vary the terms on which an action had been compromised in a joint minute signed by counsel.

1ST DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

IN an action raised by Messrs Hamilton & Baird, writers, Glasgow, against E. D. Lewis, residing at Erisca Castle, Argyllshire, to recover payment of certain sums, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) allowed a proof, which was fixed to take place on 18th May 1893.

Thereafter, counsel for the parties signed a joint minute in which they "concurred in stating to the Court that the parties had settled this action by the defender consenting to pay to the pursuers the sum of £700 in full of the conclusions of the summons, including expenses, on or before the 30th day of June 1893, and failing payment of the said sum of £700 sterling by the defender on or before that date, then the defender consents to decree being granted against him in favour of the pursuers for the sum of £950 sterling, with expenses, in full of the conclusions of the summons; and they concurred in craving the Lord Ordinary to interpose authority to this joint minute, and, quoad ultra, to assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the action, and to discharge the diet of proof fixed for the 18th day of May 1893."

On 17th May the Lord Ordinary allowed the joint minute to be received, and discharged the diet of proof.

On 6th July the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"In respect of the joint minute for the parties, and also in respect of the defender's failure to pay to the pursuers the sum of £700, including the expenses of the action on or before the 30th day of June last, decerns against him for payment to the pursuers of the sum of £950 sterling in full of the conclusions of the libel." No. 26.

The defender reclaimed, and lodged a minute craving to be allowed to amend his defences by adding a statement of res noviter veniens ad notitiam, with pleas in law relative thereto. Nov. 15, 1893. Hamilton & Baird v. Lewis.

In this statement the defender averred that before 30th June, the date fixed for payment of the £700 in the joint minute, Hamilton, as one of the partners of the pursuers' firm, had by arrangement a meeting with him and his solicitor at the Great-Eastern Hotel, London; that at this meeting it was agreed between the parties that in lieu of the payment of the £700, Hamilton, who was alleged to have full authority from the pursuers to settle the action, should accept certain guarantee policies which the National Insurance and Guarantee Corporation, Limited, were under obligation to grant to the defender; that Hamilton departed from the joint minute in so far as inconsistent with the terms of this agreement; that in breach thereof, and notwithstanding the protests of the defender, who had all along been willing to implement it, the pursuers induced the Lord Ordinary to pronounce the interlocutor reclaimed against.

The defender argued that he was entitled to prove by parole evidence the alleged agreement.¹

Counsel for the pursuers were not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The parties in this action settled the case by joint minute, signed by counsel, and the terms of the minute are quite unambiguous. It constituted a contract upon which the party entitled to implement was justified in taking decree.

The case now made is that a meeting between the parties took place in a London hotel, at which it was verbally agreed that a different mode of payment should be accepted by the pursuers from that proposed in the joint minute, and a parole proof is asked.

There is no warrant for allowing a party to get over a solemn contract by parole proof of communings of this sort.

I think the decree of the Lord Ordinary must stand.

LORD ADAM.—There was here a written compromise of the action. What is now averred is a distinct variation of the terms of the written contract, and that cannot be proved by parole.

LORD M'LAREN concurred.

LORD KINNAR was absent.

THE COURT refused the prayer of the minute, and adhered.

Trust—Charitable trust—Settlement of scheme—Nobile officium—Process—Multiplepointing—Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 16—Education (Scotland) Act, 1872 (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 62), sec. 38.—In 1869 the kirk-session of Old Monkland, by means of a sum of £750 raised by public subscription, built a school at Bargeddie in the parish, the title being taken in favour of the kirk-session, it being declared that the school “shall be conducted in all time coming in connection with the Church of Scotland,” and that the kirk-session should “have power to use the schoolroom at any time or times they may think fit for missionary meetings.”

In 1873 the school was acquired by a railway company under compulsory powers, but the kirk-session continued to use the school as tenants of the railway company, which did not require to demolish the building. The price was consigned in name of the kirk-session, who paid the rent to the company from other sources than the consigned money.

In 1892 the kirk-session brought an action of multiplepointing for disposal of the price and the accumulated interest thereon, in all about £2600.

Claims were lodged by the School Board of Old Monkland, who claimed the whole fund under the 38th section of the Education Act, 1872, and by the kirk-session of the quoad sacra parish of Bargeddie (which had been disjoined from Old Monkland in 1876), who claimed that so much of the fund in medio as might be required to carry out the purposes of the original scheme, other than educational, should be appropriated to them. The pursuers did not contest either claim, and merely desired exoneration. The Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor finding that neither party had a title to uplift the fund in medio, and that both claimants were agreed that the fund should be administered as an educational or educational and religious trust, in terms of a scheme; and remitting to a reporter to prepare a scheme. The reporter prepared a scheme whereby £500 of the fund was allocated to the kirk-session of Bargeddie, and the balance to the School Board of Old Monkland. The Lord Ordinary reported the scheme to the Court under the Trusts Act, 1867, sec. 16. The Court approved the scheme, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary, who thereafter pronounced an interlocutor ranking and preferring the claimants accordingly.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

IN 1869 the minister and kirk-session of the parish of Old Monkland set on foot a public subscription for the purpose of providing a school at Bargeddie, in the parish. Subscriptions to the amount of about £750 having been obtained, a site was purchased on which a school was subsequently built. The title to the site was a disposition dated 2d December 1869, and recorded 3d December 1873, in favour of the minister and elders of Old Monkland, forming the kirk-session thereof, “and their successors in office, in all time coming, in trust for behoof of the said church and parish,” it being declared “that the foresaid lands hereby disposed are so disposed solely for the purpose of being used as a site for a school, and pertinents; declaring also that the said school, which is to be called ‘Bargeddie School,’ shall be conducted in all time coming in connection with the Established Church of Scotland, and in conformity with the principles thereof, and that the kirk-session for the time being of the said church and parish of Old Monkland aforesaid shall have power to use the schoolroom at any time or times they may think fit for missionary meetings.”

In 1873 the Caledonian Railway Company acquired the buildings under compulsory powers, and the price was fixed at £1800. This money was consigned in bank in name of the minister and kirk-session as trustees. The railway company did not require to demolish the school buildings, which continued to be used for their original purpose by the kirk-session of Old Monkland, who paid a rent to the railway company. No charge for this rent was made either on the consigned money or on the interest thereof.

Old Monkland School Board
v. Bargeddie
Kirk-Session.

In July 1892 the minister and kirk-session of Old Monkland brought an action of multiplepoinding for determination of the right to the £1800 of consigned money, and to £880 of interest which had accrued thereon.

The pursuers stated that the school buildings had become dilapidated, and that the Government grant would be withdrawn unless new buildings were provided; that the fund in medio was claimed by the School Board of Old Monkland, and also by the kirk-session of Bargeddie quoad sacra parish (which had been disjoined from Old Monkland in 1876); and that the pursuers did not dispute either claim, and merely desired judicial exoneration.

The School Board of Old Monkland claimed to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio, founding on the 38th section of the Education Act, 1872,* and averring that, if preferred, they intended to apply the money pro tanto in building a new school.

The school board pleaded;—(1) The fund in medio being the proceeds of a school which has all along, since 1870, been used and recognised as a public school, the claimants should be ranked and preferred thereto. (2) In respect the pursuers do not object to these claimants being ranked and preferred to the fund in medio, the present claim should be sustained. (3) The subjects, of which the fund in medio is the proceeds, being destined solely as a site for a school and pertinents, and these claimants being charged with the duty of providing school accommodation within the parish, they should be ranked in terms of their claim.

The minister and kirk-session of Bargeddie quoad sacra parish claimed “that the fund in medio, or alternatively so much thereof as may be required to carry out the purposes of the subscription, other than educational, should be set aside, and a scheme adjusted at the sight of the Court for its management."

The minister and kirk-session of Bargeddie pleaded ;—(1) The purposes of the original subscribers not having been entirely educational, but including the use of the building for religious purposes connected with the parish of Bargeddie, the fund in medio, or alternatively so much thereof as may be required to carry out the said purposes, should be set apart, and a scheme adjusted at the sight of the Court for its management. (2) The claimants being now charged with the interests of the Church of Scotland in the quoad sacra parish of Bargeddie, have a title and interest to maintain the claim now submitted.

On 8th March 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that neither claimant has a title to uplift the fund in medio: Finds that both claimants are agreed that the same should be applied as an educational or educational and religious trust, in terms of a scheme to be fixed by the Court: Finds also that the pursuers and raisers, the holders of the fund, have stated no objection to this course, desiring only that the fund shall be applied so as to relieve them of responsibility: In these circumstances, remits to Mr Bremner P. Lee, advocate, to consider the record and appendix and whole proceedings, and to meet with the parties or their agents, and to prepare the draft of a scheme for the application of the fund in such manner as will most nearly serve the purposes which the subscribers to the school the price of which is in question had in view; and recommends to him to lodge the said scheme, if possible, by the first sederunt-day in May next, in order that the same may be discussed and reported to the Inner-House during next Summer Session."*

On 13th June Mr Lee reported in favour of allocating £500 to Bargeddie Kirk-Session, and the balance of the fund in medio to Old Monkland School Board.

On 29th June the Lord Ordinary pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having considered the report of Mr Lee, and neither party desiring to be further heard thereon, reports to the First Division of the Court the scheme set forth in the said report, and grants warrant to enrol in the Inner-House rolls."†

* The Trusts (Scotland) Act, 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. cap. 97), section 16, enacts,—“Applications to the Court under the authority of this Act shall be by petition addressed to the Court, and shall be brought, in the first instance, before one of the Lords Ordinary officiating in the Outer-House, who may direct such intimation and service thereof and such investigation or inquiry as he may think fit, and the power of the Lord Ordinary before whom the petition is enrolled may be exercised by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills during vacation, and all such petitions shall, as respects procedure, disposal, and review, be subject to the same rules and regulations as are enacted with respect to petitions” under 20 and 21 Vict. cap. 56, “provided that when, in the exercise of the powers pertaining to the Court of appointing trustees and regulating trusts, it shall be necessary to settle a scheme for the administration of any charitable or other permanent endowment, the Lord Ordinary shall, after preparing such scheme, report to one of the Divisions of the Court, by whom the same shall be finally adjusted and settled, and in all cases where it shall be necessary to settle any such scheme, intimation shall be made to Her Majesty’s Advocate, who shall be entitled to appear and intervene for the interests of the charity, or any object of the trust, or the public interest.”

† “NOTE.—As set forth in the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor of 8th March, all parties are agreed that the fund in medio must be applied as an educational or educational and religious trust, under a scheme to be fixed by the Court.

After hearing parties, the Court appointed intimation of the action to be made to the Lord Advocate.

On 20th July, the Lord Advocate having stated that he did not desire to intervene, the Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Having heard counsel for the parties on the report by Lord Kyllachy, and considered the cause, with the report by Mr Lee, No. 78 of process, find both parties entitled to their expenses out of the fund in medio, and approve of the apportionment of the said fund suggested in Mr Lee's said report, and accordingly adjust, settle, and determine that, after deduction of the said expenses, £500 shall be paid from said fund to the kirk-session of Bargeddie quoad sacra parish in order that they may apply the same toward building or otherwise acquiring a new Sunday school or mission hall to be held and used in connection with the parish church of said parish; and further, settle and determine that the remainder of the fund shall be paid to the School Board of the parish of Old Monkland to be used and applied by them for the ordinary educational purposes of the said last-mentioned parish, and decern: Remit the accounts of the above-mentioned expenses to the Auditor to tax and to report to the Lord Ordinary; remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed with the cause as may be just, with power to decern for the taxed amount of said expenses."

Thereafter, on 15th November 1893, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor ranking and preferring the Kirk-Session of Bargeddie to £500 of the fund in medio, and the School Board of Old Monkland to the balance of the said fund.

Dunlop v.
Donald.

Company—Winding-up by the Court—"Officer of company"—Managing director—Effects to which company prima facie entitled—Retention—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 100.—By sec. 100 of the Companies Act, 1862, the Court may, after making a winding-up order, require "any officer of the company" to transfer to the liquidator any "effects which happen to be in his hands for the time being, and to which the company is prima facie entitled."

A, the holder of certain patents, who had sold them to a company, and was under an obligation to assign them to it, became its managing director.

In a liquidation at the instance of a creditor of the company the liquidator presented a note under the above section craving the Court to ordain A to assign the patents to him. A maintained, first, that the petition was incompetent, in respect (1) that he was not an officer of the company, and (2) that the company was not prima facie entitled to the patents, which he held, not as an officer of the company but as an undivested seller; and second, that he was entitled to retain the letters-patent in security for the payment of the balance of the price.

Held (1) that A was an officer of the company in the sense of the section; (2) that the substantial right to the patents belonged to the company, and that the liquidator was entitled to a decree ordaining A to assign them; but (3) that

The only question therefore is as to the proportions in which the fund should be divided between the one set of purposes and the other. The Lord Ordinary thinks the reporter has reached a result which recommends itself as just and equitable, looking to the source from which the fund is derived. The Lord Ordinary's only doubt was whether the kirk-session had got quite enough; but they profess themselves satisfied with the report."

No. 28. A was entitled to a reservation of any claim to a preference in the liquidation for the balance of the price which he would have had if he had retained possession of the patents.

Dunlop v.
Donald.

ON 22d December 1890 Donald's Chlorine Company, Limited, was incorporated, and registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890.

1st Division.
Ld Stormonth-
Darling.

By the memorandum of association the objects for which the company was formed were declared to be, inter alia, to acquire, work, and develop the inventions and patents for the manufacture of chlorine, for which William Donald, residing at Saltcoats, held certain letters-patent. Power was further taken to adopt and carry out a memorandum of agreement dated 18th December 1890, entered into between Donald and John Nelson, as trustee for the company.*

After its incorporation the company adopted the agreement, and in

* By this agreement it was provided,—“Second, The vendor (Donald) agrees to sell to the company, and the second party, acting on behalf of the company, agrees to purchase the said inventions and letters-patent. . . . Third, The consideration to be given by the company to the vendor for the said inventions, letters-patent, and others, and for the obligations hereby undertaken by him, so far as not paid for by the salary and commission to be paid him under article twelfth hereof, shall be the sum of £20,000, which shall, to the extent of £18,800, be satisfied by the allotment to him, or his nominees, of 1880 fully paid-up deferred shares of ten pounds each of the company, having the rights specified in the said memorandum and articles of association, and to the extent of twelve hundred pounds sterling, by payment to him of (1st) a sum of seven hundred pounds sterling within thirty days after the registration of the company; (2d) the further sum of five hundred pounds sterling when one hundred tons of bleaching powder, under the said letters-patent, shall have been manufactured and bona fide sold by the company, but declaring that it shall be in the power of the company to make the said payment of five hundred pounds at an earlier date if they should be satisfied with the prospects of the company. . . . Sixth, The vendor shall shew a good title in his own name to the letters-patent agreed to be transferred, and shall, at the expense of the company, execute an assignation or assignations, and do all such assurances and things as may be necessary, or may reasonably be required, for transferring and vesting the letters-patent in the company, . . .” By the 10th article it was declared competent for the directors, with the consent of shareholders holding a majority of the shares of the company, to sell the patents, property, and assets of the company to an individual or another company, and provision was made for the distribution of the price obtained from such sale among the preferred and deferred shareholders. “Eleventh, In the event of a winding-up being resolved on in consequence of its being found that the business cannot be carried on with profit, or in any other case than that of a sale having been made of the patents, property, and assets of the company under the preceding article, the patent or patents shall be reconveyed to the vendor without any price being paid by him therefor; but all expenses connected with such reconveyance shall be borne by him. The holders of deferred shares shall have no right to vote in any question of winding-up under this article. In such event the directors shall have right to sell the works as a going concern, if they think proper, with right to use the patents in connection therewith, but subject to the condition that the vendor shall have a right of pre-emption at the price proposed to be taken from any third party. Twelfth, The vendor shall enter the employment of the company on the same being incorporated as manager or as managing director in the option of the company, and shall devote his whole time to the business of the company, and shall principally take charge of the technical and manufacturing department, and any other manager or secretary to be appointed by the company shall principally take charge of the commercial and financial department, subject always as regards the duties of both offices to the control and direction of the board of directors. . . .”

terms of article 3 thereof £18,800 of fully paid-up deferred shares were allotted, and £700 paid to Donald. No. 28.

On 6th June 1893 the Court, upon the application of a creditor, ordered that the company be wound up, and appointed William Dunlop, chartered accountant, Glasgow, to be official liquidator. Nov. 15, 1893.
Dunlop v. Donald.

At this date Donald had not assigned the patents to the company, and he declined to transfer them to the liquidator.

In these circumstances the liquidator presented a note under the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862,* in which he craved the Court to require Donald to transfer the patents to him. The liquidator founded in particular upon articles 2 and 6 of the agreement, and stated, inter alia, as follows :—"In pursuance of the objects of the company the directors have expended the whole of the subscribed capital of the company (£20,000), together with about £11,000 of borrowed money, upon the construction of works for the manufacture of chlorine upon Mr Donald's patented process. These works are not quite complete, but they can be completed now at a very trifling cost. It is very important in the interest of the creditors and shareholders that these works should be sold immediately as a whole, together with the absolute right to the patents, without which it will not be possible to obtain a full price for the undertaking of the company.

"The present note is accordingly presented for the purpose of having the said William Donald ordained to transfer the said patents to the liquidator forthwith.

"The said William Donald held the post of managing director of the said company from its commencement to the date of liquidation, and he is thus an officer of the company within the meaning of the said section."

Donald lodged answers, in which he stated as follows :—"It is admitted that the company was erecting works at Longford, Kilwinning. These works, which are the only works of the company, were not complete at the date of the liquidation. The respondent's patented invention had not been tried by the company, and no products had been manufactured or sold under his processes. . . . The patents now in question were not part of the estate of the company at the commencement of the winding-up. The personal claim of the company thereto under the said agreement was conditional and defeasible. The company have not paid the full price, at least £500 thereof remaining at this date unpaid, and have not fulfilled the inherent condition of the said agreement, requiring bona fide manufacture and sale under the respondent's processes. . . . Article 11 imposes an essential burden and condition on the rights of the company under the said agreement, and secures to the respondent the exclusive right to the patents in the cases therein provided for, one of which has now arisen. The respondent as vendor claims his right under this article, and refuses to convey patents which, in terms of the trust and the obligations thereby created in his favour, must be immediately reconveyed to him. . . . During the progress of the works now stopped the respondent acted for the company as technical adviser and works manager. . . . The respondent, whose quali-

 Nov. 15, 1893. The respondent pleaded;—(1) That the note is incompetent, inasmuch as the present case is not within the purview of section 100 of the Companies Act of 1862. (2) That the petitioner's averments are irrelevant and insufficient. (3) That the respondent is entitled under the agreement, and in the circumstances herein set forth, to refuse compliance with the demand made in the prayer of the note.

Dunlop v.
Donald.

On 20th July the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties, and considered the note for the official liquidator, and answers thereto by William Donald, Nos. 13 and 22 of process, requires the said William Donald, within twenty-one days, to transfer to the official liquidator the patents specified in the prayer of the said note, together with his rights and interests in the inventions for which applications have been made for patents, also as specified in said prayer, and decerns: And decerns and ordains the said William Donald, within the period before mentioned, to execute assignments with regard to the patents to which the same are applicable, and similar assignments with regard to the other patents before referred to, such assignments to be adjusted at the sight of . . . Reserving to the respondent, William Donald, any claim which he may make in the liquidation to a preference in respect of the unpaid balance of £500, mentioned in article third of the agreement, No. 17 of process, as if he had retained possession of the patents in question, and to the liquidator his answer to such claim: Finds the said William Donald liable to the official liquidator in the expenses caused by his opposition to the said note."*

* "NOTE.—In order to justify an application under the 100th section, all that is necessary is that there should be estate or effects in the hands of any one of a certain number of persons, including the officers of the company, to which the company is prima facie entitled. Now, I am very clearly of opinion that the patent rights, which form the subject of the present application, fall within that description. They are in the hands of Mr Donald, the original patentee, and he is an officer of the company, because he was its managing director. The company's right to these patents stands on an agreement between them and Mr Donald, which, by its second and third sections, provides for the sale of these inventions to the company at a certain price. The price was to be £20,000, and was to be satisfied to the extent of £18,800 by an allotment to Mr Donald of fully paid-up deferred shares, and by an immediate payment of £700. Both of these things have been done; the shares have been issued, and the £700 has been paid. To the extent of the remaining £500, the payment was made conditional on a certain quantity of bleaching powder being manufactured and bona fide sold by the company. That event has not taken place, because the company has been wound up on the application of a creditor before it proceeded to manufacture anything.

"Now, the only ground, so far as the agreement goes, upon which the respondent resists this application is, that he has certain rights under the 10th and 11th articles. By the 10th article the directors have power, with the consent of a majority of the shareholders, to sell the patents, and it does not seem to me that that clause in any way affects the present question, no sale having in point of fact taken place. By the 11th article it is provided that, in the event of a winding-up being resolved on, in consequence of its being found that the business cannot be carried on with profit, or in any other case than that of a sale having been made of the patents and assets of the company under article 10, the patents are to be reconveyed to the vendor without any price being paid. If this had been a voluntary liquidation a question of some difficulty might have arisen. But it is not a voluntary liquidation. I must assume that it was in the contemplation of both parties to the agreement that there might

William Donald reclaimed, and argued;—The application was incompetent under the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862, for (1) the respondent was not an “officer of the company” in the sense of the section. He was merely a practical chemist, and employed as such by the company; (2) he had no assets in his hands to which the company were “prima facie entitled.”¹ The patents in question belonged to him ab initio, and his relation to the company as regarded them was that of an undivested seller upon a contract of sale not yet fulfilled. It was an inherent condition of the contract that the company should have given the patented process a fair trial to prove its success or failure, and as that condition had not been purified, the respondent was entitled to retain his patents.² Further, part of the price agreed upon had not yet been paid, and he had a lien for this balance of £500. He was also entitled to retain the patents in virtue of article 11 of the agreement, which provided that they were to be reconveyed to him in the event of a winding-up, or “in any other case” than a sale of the assets of the company. In any event, the respondent’s averments must be remitted to proof, and in that case the 100th section was inapplicable.³

Argued for the petitioner;—The application was competent. The respondent was, as managing director, “an officer of the company,” within the meaning of the 100th section of the Act of 1862, and he held assets to which the company were “prima facie entitled.”⁴ Under the 6th section of the agreement he guaranteed his own title, and gave an absolute undertaking to assign the patents. In short, the articles of the agreement proceeded on the hypothesis that the property in the patents had passed from him to the company. Whatever right he had to the unpaid balance of £500 was preserved to him by the reservation contained in the Lord Ordinary’s interlocutor, in which, according to the true policy of the 100th section, the representative of the creditors was given instant possession of the property to which the company were prima facie entitled, with a reservation of all preferential claims on the part be a winding-up of a different kind. And that is what has happened. Creditors have stepped in, and have procured an order from the Court for the compulsory winding-up of the company, and accordingly the event contemplated by article 11, and upon which its whole provisions depend, has not taken place. In short, it seems to me that the agreement affords very clear prima facie evidence of the company’s right to these patents, and that neither article 10 nor article 11 affords any answer to the liquidator’s demand.

“It is further maintained by the respondent that at all events he has a right of retention of these patents at common law, as security for payment of the balance of £500 of the purchase price. Now, it seems to me that that question does not arise at the present stage, and it is not an impediment to my granting an order under the 100th section. It may be that the respondent has the right for which he contends, although on that point I express no opinion at all. But that is a question which may hereafter be raised in the liquidation, and the only concession which I think the respondent is entitled to at the present stage is, that his right to make that claim, notwithstanding his parting with the possession of the patents, should be reserved.”

 Nov. 15, 1893. Article 11 of the agreement clearly applied to a voluntary winding-up, Dunlop v. and was therefore inapplicable here.
 Donald.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right. In the first branch of the reclaimer's argument he has maintained that the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862, does not apply. But when his own position is ascertained, it becomes clear enough that he is one of the officers of the company, and his duties and functions do not seem at all to present any material element of difference from those of the class of officials enumerated in the words of the 100th section. I think that he, being the managing director of the company, is clearly within the section. I may observe that the case of the Oakwell Collieries shews that in the English Courts a director has been treated as falling within that section.

The next contention of the reclaimer is, assuming this application to be competent, that he is not bound to part with these letters-patent, except on payment of £500, which is the balance of the price remaining unpaid, the other portion of the price having been made good to him in the prescribed form of the contract,—that is to say, partly in shares and partly in cash.

Now, I note that the reclaimer has not contended that in the event which has happened he is entitled to hold the contract as rescinded, because his argument was founded solely upon his position in relation to this outstanding balance of the price. But then it seems to me that the course taken by the Lord Ordinary affords the appropriate solution of the question thus raised. The Lord Ordinary grants the prayer of the petition for delivery of the letters-patent, but he reserves "to the respondent, William Donald, any claim which he may make in the liquidation to a preference in respect of the unpaid balance of £500, mentioned in article third of the agreement, as if he had retained possession of the patents in question, and to the liquidator his answer to such claim."

Now that is a very careful and full reservation of the rights of the seller which he has urged at the bar, and for the course which the Lord Ordinary has taken, of granting the prayer under that reservation, his Lordship seems to have a very good precedent in the decision of the Second Division in the case of Robertson, 18 R. 1225, and also in the decision of Vice-Chancellor Hall in the case of the Oakwell Collieries, to which I have already referred. These cases make it sufficiently clear that the Court will grant an order of this kind, notwithstanding that there may have been made a claim of preference or security, the solution being found in the reservation of those claims for discussion, and if need be satisfaction in the course of the liquidation.

In my view, the rights of the parties under the contract stand thus,—I think it is manifest that when the agreement was entered into and the company were in a position to make forthcoming those 1880 fully paid-up shares, they were entitled to have the letters-patent assigned over to them.

It seems to be clear that the company's operations are in the contemplation of the contract to commence on their getting the patents, and their being in a position, therefore, to set agoing the working of the patents, and this £500 seems to me to be due at that stage of the proceedings, when ex hypothesi of the contract the letters-patent are in the hands of the company.

An alternative argument is founded by the reclaimer upon the 11th section of the agreement, but it seems to me that that section does not apply to the case which has here occurred. His demand under the 11th section is that he is entitled, or would have been entitled, if the patents had been already conveyed to the liquidator of the company, to get them back, because he says that, in some sense which is not very clearly explained, a winding-up has been resorted to.

Nov. 15, 1893.
Dunlop v.
Donald.

Now, it appears to me that the 11th section plainly contemplates the case of a winding-up resolved upon by the company. That section, looking back to the 10th, speaks thus,—“You may resolve to sell the patents, and in that case I shall assign, but if you have not decided to hand them over to someone else, but should have resolved by yourselves to stop working by winding-up, in that case the provision of section 11 is to apply.”

But I cannot apply the terms of section 11 to the case which has happened, for the company has not resolved to go into a voluntary liquidation, and they have not sold. It seems to me that this is a case unprovided for by the 11th section, and that the claim of the respondent cannot be given effect to. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The respondent seems to have been an inventor, and amongst other things, to have invented processes for the manufacture of chlorine, and he seems to have persuaded, and probably quite rightly, the company now in liquidation that the processes were of great value.

He entered into an agreement with them to sell these letters-patent which he had obtained to the company, with the view that they should find the funds necessary for their development. We have the agreement set forth at length in the appendix.

Now, it appears to set out that the one party agreed to sell and the other to purchase, that the price was to be paid in fully paid-up shares of the company, and a sum of £1200 in money, of which sum £700 was to be immediately payable on completion of the agreement, and £500 postponed until the results of the working of the patents should shew that they were successful by the production of a certain amount of money. Upon that event occurring this additional £500 was to be paid. We are told that the sum of £20,000 has been expended by the company in the erection of works for the purpose of manufacturing chlorine. That was the position of matters when an application was made for the compulsory winding-up of the company, and it is now in process of being compulsorily wound up. In these circumstances, I should say that it was part of the agreement—a necessary part—that the vendor should make up a title to his patents, and then and there transfer and assign these to the company. That de facto never was done; but nevertheless the company, as I have said, went on spending money as they did for the development of these patent rights. It was in that position of matters that the present application was made. It happens that, de facto, the patents have never been transferred to the company, and they remain in the name of Mr Donald, and it is in these circumstances that the liquidator betakes himself to the powers given him by the 100th section of the statute, and prays for an order to compel Mr Donald to transfer these patent rights to him which happen to be in his hands, and which the petitioner says he is prima facie entitled to. No doubt they happen to be in Mr Donald's hands, but I have little doubt in this case that the com-

No. 28. pany is prima facie entitled to the patents. I do not see how otherwise it
Nov. 15, 1893. could be held. Mr Donald was bound under his agreement to assign to them, Dunlop v. and they have expended all this money in developing them. That is the posi-
Donald. tion of matters. I think it is quite futile to say that these patents do not prima facie belong to the company.

It is contended by the respondent that this 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862, only applies to officers of the company, that Mr Donald is not an officer of the company, and therefore that this application is incompetent in so far as it applies to him. I concur with your Lordship in thinking that there is no doubt that Mr Donald is an officer of the company in the sense of section 100. He is the managing director under the articles of association, and in fact that has been made public. No doubt, as manager his powers are limited to the technical or manufacturing department, but I see no reason why the manager of a company is not an officer of that company. I think the case of the Oakwell Collieries is a direct authority upon that point. Therefore I have no doubt that Mr Donald here is an officer of the company in the sense of the 100th section. But then he says,—“I must be paid the full price of the articles sold. There is £500 of the price not yet paid which ought to be paid to me. I have a claim for that.” I think in that case that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary protects any rights which Mr Donald may have in respect of his claim for £500.

The only other matter to which I must refer is the argument as to the construction of the 11th section of the agreement. Upon that I entirely agree with your Lordship that it applies to the case of voluntary liquidation, and not to the case of compulsory liquidation, which this is. Upon these grounds I agree with your Lordships that the interlocutor should be affirmed.

LORD M'LAREN.—The relation of Mr Donald to the Chlorine Company which bears his name is one of a nature with which we are very familiar in company cases.

Mr Donald was the proprietor of various patent rights which he had taken out as his inventions. He entered into an agreement with a trustee for a company to be formed, and in the 4th article he agrees to sell to the company, and the second party, as trustee for the company, agrees to purchase these four patent rights. Then the price of the patents is to be paid chiefly in the form of fully paid-up shares of the company to be formed, Mr Donald undertaking that 20,000 preferred shares shall be applied for and taken up by individual companies or corporations, and being also bound to pay all the expenses incident to the formation of the company.

Now, I think Mr Campbell was well entitled to claim for Mr Donald all the protection which the law can give to any vendor who disposes of his right under such circumstances, because the inventor of the patents in this case must have had great confidence in the success of his process when for so small a sum as £1200 in cash he took upon himself this large expense with nothing more than a chance of sharing along with the other members of the company, if successful, the profits of the undertaking. Out of that £1200, £700 was to be paid at once, or within thirty days of the registration of the company, for the purpose, as explained at the bar, of enabling Mr Donald to defray the preliminary expenses. The remaining £500 was to be paid after the manufactory was established, and the business of the company in operation. Now, after the expenditure of all the capital that has been raised in putting up the necessary buildings and chemical apparatus, the company was brought to a stand by an application for a winding-up order at the instance of a creditor. In the liquidation this application is presented for an order under the 100th section of the Companies Act, 1862, to transfer to the liquidator the patent rights which are the subject of the agreement. Under the 6th article of the agreement the vendor guarantees his own title and gives an absolute undertaking to assign and make over these patent rights. Mr Donald could have had no answer to the demand of the company as soon as it was formed and registered, to execute the necessary transfers of the patent rights. But, doubtless because Mr Donald and the company had confidence in each other, he was not immediately called upon to assign the patents; and in point of fact the patents had not been assigned at the time when the company went into liquidation.

No. 28.

Donald.

It seems to me that much may be said for the case of the patentee to the effect that he is not bound to grant the required assignation to the liquidator of an insolvent company, except on the condition of receiving the counterpart of his obligation to assign, viz., the £500 which was to be paid to him in cash. But whether he is entitled to put forward this condition in answer to a demand under the 100th section is a different question. I agree with your Lordships that the policy of the 100th section is a policy which we find running through the various statutes relating to England and Scotland, which give facilities for the winding up of estates of insolvent persons and companies, and the meaning of this section is that the representative of the creditors is to be put into immediate possession of property to which the company has a substantial right, reserving, if necessary, all preferential claims which may affect it.

The Lord Ordinary has reserved to Mr Donald his claim and to the liquidator his answers, and it does not appear to me that Mr Donald's right of retention, if he has such a right, is in any way prejudiced by the order which the Lord Ordinary has pronounced.

On the other hand, I am unable to accept the argument founded on the 11th section of the agreement to the effect that in the event that has occurred Mr Donald was entitled to be retrocessed. I do not read this section as contemplating the case of a creditor's liquidation at all, and if it had, I should have had the very gravest doubt whether an undertaking of this kind could stand, because I cannot conceive that it is in the power of the parties to an agreement to provide that in case of insolvency the property of one of them shall be passed to the other for the purpose of preventing its being distributed amongst creditors.

For these reasons I also am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be affirmed.

The note having been passed and interim interdict granted, a record was made up.

The railway company did not state that the conveyance of the lands

* The Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sec. 70, enacts,—“The company shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals, under any land purchased by them, except only such parts thereof as shall be necessary to be dug or carried away or used in the construction of the works, unless the same shall have been expressly purchased; and all such mines, except as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be excepted out of the conveyance of such lands unless they shall have been expressly named therein and conveyed thereby.”

Section 71 enacts,—“If the owner, lessee, or occupier of any mines or minerals lying under the railway, or any of the works connected therewith, or within the prescribed distance, or, where no distance shall be prescribed, forty yards therefrom, be desirous of working the same, such owner, lessee, or occupier shall give to the company notice in writing of his intention so to do thirty days before the commencement of working; and upon the receipt of such notice it shall be lawful for the company to cause such mines to be inspected by any person appointed by them for the purpose; and if it appear to the company that the working of such mines, either wholly or partially, is likely to damage the works of the railway, and if the company be desirous that such mines, or any parts thereof, should be left unworked, and if they be willing to make compensation for such mines and minerals, or such parts thereof as they desire to be left unworked, they shall give notice to such owner, lessee, or occupier, of such their desire, and shall in such notice specify the parts of the mines under the railway or works or within the distance aforesaid which they shall desire to be left unworked, and for which they shall be willing to make compensation; and in such case such owner, lessee, or occupier, shall not work or get the mines or minerals comprised in such notice; and the company shall make compensation for the same, and for all loss or damage occasioned by the non-working thereof to the owner, lessee, or occupier thereof respectively. . . .”

in which the rock was situated in their favour contained an express conveyance of the mines and minerals therein, but they maintained that the rock was not included among the minerals excepted from their conveyance by the 70th section of the Railway Clauses Act, 1845. They further averred that Bain was not entitled to work the rock in respect it was not included in his lease. They then made this averment—(Stat. 5) “ . . . In any event the respondent was not entitled to give the said notice, and is not entitled to act thereupon. It is believed and averred that his intimation was given merely with a view of exacting a payment from the complainers to which he is not entitled. The lessee is bound under the said lease, and at common law, to work the Haughyett Quarry in a regular and proper manner. . . . If he works in accordance with the said stipulation he will carry forward the workings on which he is at present engaged in the opposite direction from the complainers’ railway and works. The stone in the vicinity of these workings is of the same or superior quality to that which is immediately alongside of and under the complainers’ railway works and lands, and is much more accessible and less expensive to work than the stone last mentioned. If the respondent proceeds with the working of the quarry in accordance with the said lease he would not in any event, whatever might be the rights of parties in the said rock, be in a position to give notice to the complainers in terms of section 71 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845, for very many years. It is believed, however, that with a view of rearing up a fictitious claim against the complainers, and not in the regular and workmanlike manner of working the present quarry in terms of said lease, the respondent proposes to open a new quarry at some distance from Haughyett Quarry, and in the immediate vicinity of the complainers’ line and fence, and altogether clear of the works and outside the fences of the present quarry, and that only for the purpose of obtaining access to the rock under the complainers’ railway works and lands.”

The railway company pleaded;—1. The rock in question being the property of the complainers, . . . the respondent is not entitled to interfere therewith, and the note of suspension ought to be granted. 2. The complainers are entitled to the remedy asked in respect (1) that the rock in question is not within the lease. . . . 3. The respondent’s intimations and workings not being in the ordinary and regular course of working the quarry, but merely devised to rear up a fictitious claim against the complainers, they are entitled to interdict as craved.

Bain denied the company’s averments, and pleaded;—2. The complainers’ averments are irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the prayer of the note. 3. In respect that the complainers, after due notice from the respondent, have failed to purchase the said mine of freestone, the respondent is entitled to work the same.

On 20th July 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) pronounced this interlocutor:—“ Finds that by virtue of section 70 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, the complainers have no right to the freestone under the portion of their land referred to on record, and repels their first plea in law: Finds, further, that they have not made on record any averments relevant to be admitted to probation; therefore recalls the interdict formerly granted: Refuses the note of suspension and interdict, and decerns.”*

* “OPINION.—The respondent is assignee to a lease for twenty-five years from Whitsunday 1882 of the Haughyett Freestone Quarry, on the estate of Ballochmyle, in Ayrshire. Part of the freestone included in the lease lies under and adjacent to the complainers’ line of railway, and the respondent has given notice of his intention to work the freestone under the line by open-cast workings from the surface downwards. The purpose of this note is to interdict him from doing so, and the first plea stated by the complainers is to the effect that freestone does not fall within the description of 'mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals' excepted from the general conveyance of their lands by virtue of the 70th section of the Railway Clauses Act of 1845. It is not said that, in considering this plea, any aid can be derived from a parole proof, and I am asked to dispose of it on the terms of the statute, interpreted, as these have been, by numerous decisions.

The railway company reclaimed. At the hearing they stated that they desired a proof of their averment that the rock in question did not fall within the lease, and on the question of bona fide intention to work they referred to the Midland Railway v. Robinson, L. R., 37 Chanc. Div. 386, 15 App. Cas. 19.

"Now, the state of the authorities is this: There is an express decision in Scotland (Jamieson v. The North British Railway Company, 6 S. L. R. 188) that freestone does fall within the exception in the 70th section. It was a judgment of Lord Kinloch not reclaimed against, but it was quoted with approval by Lord Adam in giving the leading opinion in Nisbet Hamilton v. The North British Railway Company, 13 R. 454 (at p. 461). There is also an expression of opinion by Lord Watson (obiter no doubt, but still entitled to great weight) in Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, 13 App. Ca. at p. 679, in these terms:—'The important question still remains, what are the minerals referred to, other than coal, ironstone, or slate? My present impression is that "other minerals" must necessarily include all minerals which can reasonably be said to be ejusdem generis with any of those enumerated. Slate being one of them, I do not think it would be possible to exclude freestone or limestone strata.' More important still, there is a judgment in the House of Lords, pronounced so recently as December 1889, in Midland Railway Company v. Robinson, 15 App. Ca. 19, to the effect that the section of the English Railways Clauses Act, which is couched in precisely the same terms as section 70 of the Scottish Act, includes not only beds and seams of minerals got by underground working, but also such as can only be worked by open or surface operations, and that limestone is a mineral within the meaning of the section.

"I am unable to see any distinction in principle between limestone and freestone. The only distinction suggested by Mr Guthrie was that limestone is worked for the purpose of extracting from it the mineral substance lime, while freestone is worked for the purpose of using the stone itself. But I find no trace of any such distinction in the opinions of the noble and learned Lords, nor do I think that the purpose for which the substance is worked can be of any materiality. The real point of the decision is that a substance may be within the section though it is got by quarrying and not by subterranean mining.

"The only decisions which can be placed against this chain of authorities are Menzies v. Earl of Breadalbane (1822), 1 Sh. App. 225, and Duke of Hamilton v. Bentley (1841), 3 D. 1121. In the first of these it was decided that a reservation by a superior in a feu-contract of 'the haill mines and minerals' in the lands did not give the superior right to a freestone quarry. The second case simply followed the first. Both were fully in view of the House of Lords in Farie's case, and Lord Watson explains at pp. 674-5 of 13 App. Ca. why a case construing a reservation in a feu-contract is not of much assistance in construing an Act of Parliament. For one thing, it is obvious that the mention of slate in the 70th section gives a clue to the construction of the phrase 'other minerals,' which is altogether wanting in a general reservation of 'mines and minerals.'

"For these reasons I am very clearly of opinion, both on authority and on a sound construction of the statute, that the freestone in this case (which is admitted to be of commercial value) is within the exception of the 70th section.

"But then the complainers say (and this is their second ground for demanding interdict) that there is no bona fide desire or intention on the part of the respondent to work the freestone, and that his notice is a mere device to extract money from the complainers. Of these allegations they demand a proof.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The question which seems to have been principally discussed in the Outer-House was whether freestone falls within the definition of the Act of Parliament of the things excepted from the conveyance, so as to make it incompetent for the railway company to make any use of it. The words of the Act are, "The company shall not be entitled to any mines of coal, ironstone, slate, or other minerals, under any land purchased by them, except only" and so on. It is quite plain that these words must include a great many things as minerals which are not expressly named, and that those which are named are mentioned for the purpose of shewing the kind of material intended to be reserved by the statute. Now slate is one of the things which are expressly mentioned, but slate is not in the ordinary sense a mineral; it is a thing quarried out of the ground to be used for building purposes just as stone is; and accordingly in the case of Farie, in the House of Lords, it appears to have been regarded as impossible to exclude freestone and limestone when slate was included. On that part of the case, therefore, I adhere to the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Glasgow and South-Western Rail-

Bain.

It turns out now that the railway company have two other pleas on which they desire to found. In the first place, they say that the freestone underneath their line is not within the respondent's lease; and secondly, they aver that the tenant of the quarry, in giving notice that he intends to work this freestone, has no bona fide intention of working the stone, but has given notice merely as a device for obtaining compensation from the railway company. These are questions which cannot be decided without evidence, and accordingly I think that the case should go back to the Lord Ordinary for the purpose of evidence being taken.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary with regard to the freestone under the railway, that it is not in the title of the railway company. I construe the Act of Parliament as he does.

The only other point I shall notice is as to the bona fides of the respondent in giving the notice he did to the railway company. That point was insisted in before the Lord Ordinary, and he gives a special finding about it in his interlocutor. The Lord Ordinary finds that the complainers have not made on record any averments relevant to be admitted to probation. I am of opinion that the complainers have made averments relevant to be admitted to probation, and I therefore think we should send them to proof.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

"Now, so far as they merely say that the respondent has other stone in his quarry which he might work less expensively and with more advantage to himself than the stone under the railway, I do not think that their averments are relevant. The respondent's proposal may be ever so capricious and vexatious, but if he has a right to work the stone, and a bona fide intention to do so, I do not see that he can be prevented. The complainers on record go a step further. They say that he intends to work the stone by opening a new quarry, and that he has no right under his lease to do so. If the complainers had adhered to this statement I should not have disposed of the case without requiring the respondent to make his right clear, either by reference to the lease, or, if necessary, by producing evidence of the landlord's consent to the proposed operations. But Mr Guthrie stated at the bar that he did not maintain that the terms of the lease presented any obstacle to the proposed operations, and I am therefore in a position to dispose of the case by recalling the interim interdict and refusing the note."

THE COURT found in terms of the first finding of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor: Quoad ultra recalled the same: Remitted to the Lord Ordinary to allow the parties a proof of their averments as to (1) the minerals not being within the lease assigned to the respondent, and (2) the respondent not having a bona fide intention to work the said minerals in terms of section 71 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

BEN CRUACHAN GRANITE COMPANY, LIMITED, AND LIQUIDATORS THEREOF, Defenders (Respondents).—C. J. Guthrie.

Lease—Exclusion of assignees except with consent of landlord—Landlord's right to withhold consent.—The proprietor of a granite quarry let it to a company, the lease containing a clause "expressly excluding (except with the consent of the proprietor in writing) assignees, legal or conventional. . . ." The company having gone into liquidation, the landlord's agents wrote a letter to the liquidators intimating that he was willing to consent to the sale of the lease, but on the condition "that the assignee must be a person approved by him." The liquidators thereafter sold the lease, and granted an assignation to the purchasers without the landlord's approval. In an action by the landlord for reduction of the assignation, the defenders averred that the landlord in refusing to recognise the defenders as assignees "is acting in fraud of his arrangement with the liquidators," and that "the true reason of the pursuer's refusal is this—that he has come under some obligation to give a lease of the quarry to" another person. "It is solely for the purpose of implementing this obligation that the pursuer is unfairly and unreasonably withholding his approval of the assignees tendered by the liquidators."

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that as the assignation had been granted to assignees not approved by the landlord, it fell to be reduced.

Duke of Portland v. Baird & Co., Nov. 9, 1865, 4 Macph. 10, followed.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

By lease dated 11th and 25th May 1885, the Marquis of Breadalbane let to the Ben Cruachan Granite Company, Limited, for twenty years, a granite quarry belonging to him, "but expressly excluding (except with the consent of the proprietor in writing) assignees, legal or conventional, and subtenants, also creditors or managers for creditors, in any way or shape (including liquidators). . . ."

On 7th January 1892 the company went into voluntary liquidation, and John Wilson and George Duke Stirling were appointed liquidators. With the consent of the Marquis, they remained in possession of the subjects till March 1893.

On 11th March Messrs Davidson & Syme, agents for the Marquis of Breadalbane, wrote to the liquidators as follows:—"Dear Sirs,—Referring to your call here the other day, we have since been in communication with Lord Breadalbane and his factor. His lordship, as you would expect, is averse to doing anything which would be unjust to the creditors of the present company, but he, and the factor also, have been much troubled with the way in which that company have implemented the obligations of the lease. While, therefore, his Lordship is willing to consent to the lease being sold, it must be on the conditions which we are now to state,—(1) The assignee must be a person approved by him or his factor, and the assignee must of course undertake to implement the whole obligations and conditions of the lease. . . ."

On 15th March the liquidators exposed to sale by public roup their whole right and interest under the lease, and it was purchased by J. Whitehead & Sons, granite merchants, Aberdeen, and an assignation of the lease, dated 30th March and 1st April, was granted by the sellers to the purchasers. The Marquis of Breadalbane refused to consent to the lease being transferred to the assignees, but they entered into possession of the quarry, and asserted their right to continue to work it.

Nov. 16, 1893.
Marquis of Breadalbane
v. Whitehead & Sons.

In these circumstances, upon 4th May 1893, the Marquis raised an action against the Ben Cruachan Company and its liquidators, and also against J. Whitehead & Sons, for reduction of the assignation, and for decree of removing as against Messrs J. Whitehead & Sons.

The pursuer, after narrating the lease and letter of 11th March, averred that prior to the sale the existence of the first condition contained in the letter was known to John Whitehead, a partner of the firm, and that the pursuer had rejected the firm as tenants after inquiry and consideration.

The defenders J. Whitehead & Sons averred;—"That letter (11th March) was obtained by the liquidators, and granted by Messrs Davidson & Syme in view of the intended exposure by them of the lease of the quarries and plant to sale by public roup, and for the special purpose of securing that the pursuer would not reject as a tenant under the lease of the quarries any suitable party who might acquire the lease and plant at the sale. It was on that footing that the liquidators proceeded to expose the lease and plant, and it was on that footing that the defenders became purchasers of the lease and plant at the sale."

The defenders had further submitted to Messrs Davidson & Syme "particulars regarding their financial position which put beyond doubt their sufficiency as tenants. . . . The pursuer, however, refused to give his approval or to recognise" the defenders as tenants. (7) "This refusal by the pursuer was most unjust, and was a gross abuse of any right of approval reserved to him under the said letter to the liquidators of 11th March. In refusing to recognise these defenders as assignees, the pursuer is acting in fraud of his arrangement with the liquidators embodied in the said letter, and in bad faith towards these defenders. The true reason of the pursuer's refusal is this—that he has come under some obligation to give a lease of the quarry to" another person. "It is solely for the purpose of implementing this obligation that the pursuer is unfairly and unreasonably withholding his approval of the assignees tendered by the liquidators."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The assignation set forth in the summons ought to be reduced, in respect that it was granted without the approval of the pursuer having been obtained to the assignee named therein.

Both defenders pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant, and that the pursuer was barred by his actings from insisting in the action, the pleas in law for the defenders J. Whitehead & Sons being as follows:—(1) No relevant case. (2) These defenders are entitled to absolver, in respect—(a) That the pursuer, by reason of his actings, is barred by personal exception from insisting in the present action. (b) That, under the said letter of 11th March the pursuer is not entitled to reject capriciously, as assignees of the said lease, the defenders, who purchased the lease on the faith of the said letter. (c) That, in refusing to give his approval to the said assignation in favour of these defenders the pursuer is acting in bad faith and in fraud of his arrangement with the liquidators.

On 11th September the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy), before answer, allowed parties a proof of their respective averments, and to the pursuer a conjunct probation.*

* "NOTE.—The Lord Ordinary has had difficulty in this case, and has

Marquis of

v. Whitehead
& Sons.

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The Lord Ordinary had erred in allowing a proof. Under the lease itself the landlord was quite entitled to reject the assignees capriciously if he chose, and without assigning any reason for so doing.¹ The case of Wight v. Earl of Hopetoun in no way conflicted with this doctrine of law. Indeed, that case was entirely different. In it the lease was one which in terms gave to the tenant a most valuable estate of a very different kind from that of a tenant under an ordinary agricultural lease. The tenant was practically the proprietor of the subject, and it was natural that a clause requiring the landlord's consent to an assignation of the lease should in such a case receive a different construction.² The landlord had a similar right under the letter.

Argued for the defenders ;—It was doubtful whether under the lease the pursuer could capriciously and without good reason assigned reject them as tenants.³ That he was acting capriciously in so doing was clear, for they were perfectly eligible tenants. But apart from the lease, in his letter of 11th March he had authorised the liquidators to expose the subjects, and had thereby induced the public to bid for them. It was out of the question for him to go back now upon this letter. The Lord Ordinary was right in allowing a proof⁴ as to the defenders' averments to the effect that his refusal to accept them as assignees was not due to any bona fide disapproval of them as suitable tenants.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not think that the Lord Ordinary's judgment can stand.

The action is one to remove from the occupancy of the quarry the Messrs Whitehead, the principal defenders in the action, and they in defence claim right to retain the tenancy under a lease which expressly excludes assignees, except with the consent of the proprietor in writing.

Now, if the question stood upon the lease alone, it would be impossible to maintain the defenders' contention, looking to the decision in the case of the Duke of Portland. But then it was said that the Messrs Whitehead are entitled to defend their possession on the ground that the landlord has taken up a less strong position by the letter of 11th March 1893. In that letter—his original tenants having gone into liquidation—his Lordship's agents said that while he "is willing to consent to the lease being sold, it must be on the con-hesitated a good deal about allowing a proof. He is not prepared to hold that the pursuer was bound, under the terms of his agents' letter, to assign reasons for his disapproval of the assignees, or to enter into the question whether those reasons were good or bad. But the Lord Ordinary thinks that he was bound to consider the assignees on their merits, and to accept or reject them according to his honest opinion as to their suitability : and the question really is whether the defenders' averments do not (whether well or ill founded) come to this, that the pursuer did not so proceed, but rejected the defenders simply because he had come under engagements to another applicant. The Lord Ordinary thinks that the defenders' averments may be so read ; and being so, that they at least raise a question which it is not desirable to decide without knowing the facts. He has therefore allowed a proof before answer."

Nov. 16, 1893.
Marquis of Breadalbane
v. Whitehead
& Sons.

Now, I cannot say that that materially alters the position of matters from what it would be under the lease itself,—that is to say, I think that the right of the landlord in a question of approving or disapproving of an assignee stands under this letter just as it would have done under the original lease. It is to be noted that the occasion of the letter, and the rest of its contents, make it sufficiently plain that Lord Breadalbane is here referring to the lease as it stood ; but, even suppose this condition to be read as, in terms, something separate from the lease, I do not think that in quality it differs from the various clauses as to approval of assignees which are discussed by the Lord President in the case of the Duke of Portland.

Now, the law laid down in that case is certainly very distinct, and my objection to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is this, that I do not think his Lordship's interlocutor and note can be reconciled with the law as settled in the case. It is true that the condition in the Duke of Portland's case was a condition where assignees generally required to be approved of or consented to by the landlord, but the whole tenor of the judicial observations there, taken in connection with the passage in Mr Bell's Commentaries, to which reference is made by the Lord President, seems to shew plainly enough that a variance in phrase will not affect the substance of the matter, and that in whatever form the thing is referred to the decision of the landlord, his approval is to be given or withheld according to his arbitrary wish.

That is laid down in such extremely distinct terms in several passages in the Lord President's judgment, which have been read from the bar, that I do not think it necessary further to emphasise it. But in a matter of this kind it is certainly of great importance that we should adhere to a decision which puts in peremptory and intelligible terms the rule of law which is applicable to cases of this kind, and which will not be altered by some unimportant variation of expression.

Now, in the present case there can be no doubt of this fact, that the present defenders are not approved by the landlord ; and the question I put again is, what is their title to hold under this lease ? Neither under the lease nor under the letter do they meet the condition under which alone an assignee can maintain right to hold the subjects, and that is that he is approved by the landlord.

Now, what is said in the record by the defenders as to the position of the landlord ? They say it is very bad of him not to approve of the tenant. That the liquidator proceeded to sell the subjects on the footing that he would present an eligible tenant, and that he has presented such an one. I am perfectly willing to accept unreservedly all that can be said in praise of the defenders. I take the view that Lord Breadalbane, for reasons good or bad unconnected with the status or responsibility of these gentlemen, does not want them, but prefers somebody else ; and I ask how does the fact that they have been the highest bidders at the sale, but are not approved by him, put them in the position of being in the sense of this lease tenants approved by the landlord ? It may be that the liquidators who entered into this bargain may have some cause of complaint against the landlord. Of that I say nothing. We have nothing to do with it, but with the question merely whether the defenders who claim possession of this quarry are entitled to it under the lease and this

No. 30. letter; and I say they do not possess the essential qualification, viz., of being
 Nov. 16, 1893. assignees approved by Lord Breadalbane.
 Marquis of Therefore it seems to me that the Lord Ordinary's judgment cannot stand.
 Breadalbane His Lordship thinks that Lord Breadalbane "was bound to consider the assignees
 v. Whitehead on their merits, and to accept or reject them according to his honest opinion as & Sons. to their suitableness."

Now, can that be said, after the decision in the Duke of Portland's case, to represent the law? It seems to me to be a revival of the doctrine which the Lord President in that case pronounced to be finally exploded, viz., the doctrine that the landlord was not entitled arbitrarily and out of mere caprice to withhold his consent.

If I am right in thinking that that doctrine of the Lord President's applies to a case where the landlord has reserved right to approve or disapprove as regards the individual presented to him, as well as on the general question of assignation, then it is plain that the Lord Ordinary's judgment is not reconcilable with the settled law upon the subject.

The subject-matter of proof, the Lord Ordinary says, would be whether Lord Breadalbane "rejected the defenders simply because he had come under engagements to another applicant."

I cannot see how the result of that proof, one way or other, would put the Messrs Whitehead into the position of being approved by Lord Breadalbane.

Accordingly, I think the action against them for reduction and removing must prevail.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. The question is whether the Messrs Whitehead have a good title to retain possession of these quarries. They plead their possession under the assignation, but no assignation in their favour can be a valid or good title of possession unless they can shew that it has the approval of the landlord.

As matters stood under the original lease, assignees were expressly excluded, but in the letter on which the defenders found the expression is that the assignees must be approved by the landlord. It was put to us by Mr Johnston that if we were called upon to construe the meaning of this expression for the first time, we should probably come to the conclusion that the landlord is bound to consider and reject the assignees on their merits under a lease expressed in such terms, and that the landlord would not have a right capriciously to reject such an assignee, but would be bound to give his reasons for so doing. That may be so,—I do not say that it is,—but the answer is that the parties to that lease did not come to consider it for the first time. No doubt Lord Breadalbane was advised as to the meaning of the expression as determined by previous decisions.

Now, I agree with your Lordship that it is not to be questioned in our law that where you have an exclusion of assignees except with the consent of the landlord, that gives him an absolute right to reject without reason assigned the person tendered to him.

I agree with your Lordship that Lord Breadalbane did not mean to make any difference in his powers in the matter by using a different expression in the letter from what was used in the lease, because to my mind they mean the same thing.

It seems to me that where an assignee must be a person approved by the landlord, that is tantamount to an express exclusion of assignees. What is the difference where a landlord is bound to give no reason for non-approval between saying that assignees are excluded, and saying that they shall only be allowed with the approval of the landlord? The one means exactly the same as the other.

Marquis of Breadalbane
v. Whitehead
& Sons.

Even assuming that by refusing or by not considering these proposed assignees the landlord may have been guilty of breach of contract with the liquidators of the company, and may be responsible to them in damages, I cannot see how that can entitle these assignees to say that they have his consent and approval.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am unwilling to disturb an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary allowing proof where he has felt that further inquiry is necessary, but in this case it appears to me that a relevant case for reduction has been stated by Lord Breadalbane, which entitles him to decree unless met by a proper counter case, and that no relevant counter case has been stated. In other words, if all the defenders' averments were admitted or proved, they would not avail to obviate the conclusions of the action. The case for the proprietor is that under the lease of the Ben Cruachan Granite Quarries he accepted the tenants as personally bound in terms which are very distinctly expressed, viz., assignees are expressly excluded except with the proprietor's consent and approval. The company having gone into liquidation, the proprietor gave a qualified assent to a sale, subject to his approval of the purchaser. The purchaser not having obtained his approval, the proprietor desires that the lease should be reduced and the possession terminated. Now, the right of the tenant under this lease was a right to assign entirely dependent on the pleasure of the landlord. When the liquidator approached Lord Breadalbane, and applied for permission to sell, his Lordship might have said,—“I object to your selling on any conditions; I do not intend that the property should go to your assignee, as I mean to look out for a tenant for myself.” That was his legal position, because I think the result of the Duke of Portland's case is that where an exclusion of assignees is qualified by the expression “except with the approval of the landlord,” the reference to the approval of the landlord has no legal effect at all. Of course even where assignees are in terms excluded, it is always open to the landlord, on the tenant's application, to accept an assignee, and this is all the right which a tenant has under a reference to the landlord's consent or approval, because the landlord is not bound to give his reasons for withholding his approval, nor does it appear to me that he need have any reasons.

But then I am not quite prepared to apply that strict rule of construction to an undertaking given by the landlord or those representing him when the matter passes into the phase of negotiation. In this case the landlord has not taken up the extreme position that he would give no consent to an assignee. On the contrary, the letter of Lord Breadalbane's agents, which is founded on in the pursuer's fourth condescendence, and which is printed elsewhere, states that Lord Breadalbane is willing that the creditors should take some benefit by the sale of the lease, but that the sale must be subject to certain conditions, one of which is that the selection of a purchaser is to be subject to his approval.

Now, I do not think that it was open to the pursuer, after having authorised that letter, to stop the sale by saying, “I have changed my mind, and give you notice that I shall not consent to any sale.” I think the right of the liquidator under that letter was a right to sell on the chance that the purchaser would be approved, and that the landlord came under a corresponding obligation to consider any name that might be submitted to him. I do not say that he was bound to give his reasons any more than he would be in the ordinary case, but to my mind there is a distinction between the two cases, because having agreed to a sale for the benefit of the creditors, I think that Lord Breadalbane could not refuse at least to consider the qualifications as tenant of any nominee who might be proposed by the liquidator.

Now the reason why I have gone over the points of the case, following very much the line of illustration which your Lordships have taken, is that if, as was suggested at the bar, Lord Breadalbane after authorising the letter of 11th March had gone and let the property to another tenant without awaiting the result of the sale, I should have thought there was here a relevant case for inquiry, because I think the pursuer would not have been within his legal rights if, by assigning to another, he had disabled himself from giving fair consideration to the claim of the purchaser from the liquidator. But then I do not find any statement raising a defence of this kind within the defenders' case. In answer to an inquiry as to the ground of defence in this relation we were referred to statement 7 of the defences—"The true reason of the pursuer's refusal is this—that he has come under some obligation to give a lease of the quarry to Mr Anderson or his nominees."

Now I think that averment quite consistent with this meaning, that having considered the sale to the Messrs Whitehead and rejected it, Lord Breadalbane came under an obligation to Mr Anderson, and of course if that is the meaning of the statement, it is no defence to this action. If it had been intended to make such a case as according to my suggestion would be a good answer, viz., that the landlord had disabled himself from giving his consent, I think it was incumbent upon the defenders to make this quite clear, and to put the facts before us so far as they had come to their knowledge.

For these reasons, which are in all essential respects identical with those of your Lordships, I think the interlocutor should be recalled, and decree given in terms of the conclusions of the summons. I give no opinion as to what right the liquidator may have with reference to any possible future sale, because that case is not before us.

LORD KINNEAR was absent.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and reduced, declared, decerned, and ordained in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

Macdougall v.
M'Nab.

RICHARD M'NAB AND ANOTHER, Defenders (Reclaimers).—Guthrie Smith—J. A. Reid.

Reparation—Wrongous use of diligence—Bank—Cheque.—Young, a writer in Glasgow, who had been instructed by a client to recover the sum due by Macdougall under a decree on which a charge expired on 29th December, on that day wrote to Macdougall, who lived in Dunoon, that unless the debt was paid next day a poiding would be executed, and payment not having been made, he, on 31st December, instructed a sheriff-officer to execute a poiding of Macdougall's furniture in Dunoon. On 3d January Young received from Macdougall a cheque for the amount due, but on presenting it at the bank he was informed that there were no funds to meet the cheque. He accordingly returned it to Macdougall. Macdougall returned the cheque to Young next day, 4th January, with a letter intimating that there were now funds in the bank. The cheque reached Macdougall's office about two o'clock on the 4th January, when he was absent on business, but his clerk ascertained from the bank that there were funds to meet the cheque, and Young was informed of this on his return to his office after bank hours that day. Next day, at about eleven o'clock, he presented the cheque (which was crossed) at his own bank with instructions to have it specially presented at Macdougall's bank. This was done, and Young was informed about two o'clock that day that the cheque had been paid. He then wrote to the sheriff-officer countermanding the pointing. It had, however, been executed about one o'clock that day. Founding on these circumstances, Macdougall brought an action of damages for illegal pointing against Young and his client.

The Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) found Macdougall entitled to damages, on the ground that, in the circumstances, it was Young's duty on the afternoon of the 4th January either to countermand the pointing or to return the cheque.

On a reclaiming note, held (rev. the judgment of the Lord Ordinary) that Young's retention of the cheque on 4th January imported merely the duty of duly presenting it for payment, and, if paid, of duly countermanding the pointing, that he had in fact so presented the cheque and countermanded the pointing, and therefore that the defenders fell to be assoilzied.

On 30th March 1893 Robert Macdougall, property-agent, Glasgow, and residing at Dunoon, brought an action of damages for illegal pointing against Richard M'Nab, plumber, Innellan, and T. C. Young, writer, Glasgow.

2^d Division.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

The facts, as ascertained by a joint minute of admissions, were as follows:—M'Nab held a decree for £45, 9s. 5d. against Macdougall, and instructed Young to recover its amount. Young caused a charge to be given to Macdougall, which expired on 29th December 1892. On that day he wrote to Macdougall intimating that the charge expired that day, and informing him that unless payment was made by twelve o'clock next day he would require to give instructions to have a pointing executed. Payment was not so made, and on 31st December Young instructed a sheriff-officer to point the furniture in Macdougall's house at Dunoon.

On 3d January Young received the following letter from Macdougall:—"Herewith please find cheque for £45, 9s. 5d., being amount decreed for, with expenses herein, the decree for which please send to me at your convenience." This letter, although dated 31st December (Saturday), was not posted until 2d January. On inquiry at the British Linen Company's Bank, on which the cheque was drawn, Young was informed that there were no funds to meet it. He therefore, on the same day, telegraphed to Macdougall "cheque presented—no funds," and sent a letter to the same effect, enclosing the cheque. Young also, on 3d January, wrote to the sheriff-officer informing him about the cheque, and adding that he supposed "you will have executed the pointing ere this. If not, please do so at once." On the afternoon of the same day, after sending off these letters, Young received a letter from Macdougall, dated that day, explaining why no funds had been provided for the cheque, and requesting that the cheque should be held over until the next day, the 4th, when funds would be provided. Young replied that the cheque had been already sent off.

On 4th January Young received the following letter, dated that day, from Macdougall:—"I am sorry there should have been any hitch about the cheque. Ample funds now at credit, and I return you cheque, which please present again." This letter reached Young's office about two o'clock, when he was absent at a funeral. His clerk went to the bank, and ascertained that there were then funds to meet it. Young returned to his office about five o'clock, when he was informed of these circumstances. He took no steps that day with reference to the poiding. The cheque was a crossed cheque.

On 5th January, between ten and eleven o'clock in the morning, Young sent the cheque to his own bank, the Commercial Bank of Scotland, with a request that it should be presented "specially" at the British Linen Company's Bank. In compliance with that request it was presented about that hour, and paid. The officials of the Commercial Bank did not inform Young of the payment until two o'clock on the 5th, and Young then wrote to the sheriff-officer intimating the settlement, and desiring that the decree should be returned. The poiding had, however, been executed at one o'clock of that day.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders having wrongfully poided the pursuer's furniture, they are bound to compensate him for the loss and injury thereby sustained, with expenses. (2) The pursuer, at the time of the poiding, not being indebted to the defender M'Nab in any sum, the use of the diligence complained of was unjustifiable.

The defenders pleaded;—(3) The whole procedure under the said decree having been legal and regular, the defenders should be assolizied. (5) The pursuer having by his own actings caused the proceedings complained of, the defenders should be assolizied.

On 29th July 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the pleas in law for the defenders: Finds that on 5th January 1893 the goods of the pursuer were wrongfully poided on the instruction of the defenders, and that the defenders are liable in damages in respect thereof: Assesses said damages at £20, in terms of the joint minute, No. 43 of process, and decerns against the defenders for payment thereof to the pursuer: Finds the pursuer entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.— . . . While I think the question a very narrow one, I have formed the opinion that the poiding was wrongous, and that the pursuer is entitled to decree for £20, the amount at which the parties have assessed the damage by the joint minute. I think it was the duty of Young to countermand his instructions to poid on the afternoon of the 4th of January, after he had received the cheque for the second time, had ascertained that funds had been placed in the pursuer's bank to meet it, and had retained the cheque in order to present it for payment. I am not prepared to decide against the defenders on any other ground.

"No question has been raised as to the amount of the cheque. It has not been said that it was insufficient because it did not include the expense of the diligence. There is no point of that kind in the case. Had the amount of the cheque been paid in cash, that would admittedly have been sufficient.

"I think the cheque was negotiated with due despatch. Young cannot be blamed for delay in obtaining payment.

"Young was quite within his rights when, on the 3d of January, he returned the cheque, and renewed, as he did, his instructions to the sheriff-officer to proceed with the poiding.

"He would have been within his rights had he returned the cheque again on the 4th. But he did not do so. He cannot be blamed for not having been in his office from one until five o'clock. But when, at five o'clock, he was informed that the cheque had been returned, he was, I think, put to consider and decide whether he would return it or retain it.

"Had the pursuer at that time sent payment in cash, I do not think it could have been disputed that Young would have been bound immediately to certify the sheriff-officer, and to instruct him not to poid, if he had not already done so ; and if this had been a case of cash payment, I think there can be no question that the defenders would have been liable in damages although they were not aware that the diligence had been executed after payment. Some material difficulty in countermanding the diligence might make a difference. A question might be raised if it could not be done except by telegram, but in this case there was no difficulty.

“But I agree in the contention for the defenders that this cheque was not equivalent to a payment in cash. It did not discharge the debt, and, had it been dishonoured, the debt would have remained due, and the diligence would have been available. The case of Davis v. Gyde, 27th January 1835, 2 Adol. and Ellis, 623, may be an authority to that effect, although the grounds of judgment are in part founded on technical English rules, the reasonableness of which has not been apprehended in the Scotch Courts. The American case of Burnet v. Smith, July 1885, 64 American Dec. 290, quoted by the defenders, is to the same effect. But the same law is laid down in Bell's Prin. sec. 127, and I see no reason to doubt it.

“The defenders further maintained that nothing short of a tender in money, or what was equivalent to money, could oblige a creditor to abstain from or stop his diligence. That proposition may be admitted generally, but cannot be affirmed without qualification. The defenders quoted in support of it Inglis v. M'Intyre, 14th February 1862, 24 D. 541. But I do not think that case in point. It was there held that a tender of payment made to the sheriff-officer, coupled with a condition which the debtor had not a right to adject, did not oblige or entitle the sheriff-officer to stop the execution of his diligence.

“Although a cheque is not equivalent to a payment in money, it is not, if it be retained, to be disregarded entirely. ‘Until it has proved unproductive, the creditor ought not to be allowed to treat it as a nullity, or to sue the debtor as if he had given no security’—per Lush J. in Currie v. Misa, 1875, L. R., 10 Exch. 153.

“It appears to be settled in England that a cheque or bill accepted, although it be not absolute payment, is conditional payment ; the condition being that it shall become absolute payment when honoured, and that, on the other hand, the debt shall revive if the cheque be not honoured. Currie v. Misa, supra ; Byles on Bills, 15th ed., 372 ; Chitty on Bills, 127 ; Chalmers on Bills, 305. I do not know that that principle has been expressed in any Scotch judgment, but I think that I ought, on such a point, to follow the English authorities, there being, so far as I know, nothing repugnant in our own decisions.

“Now, I think it ought to follow that diligence in execution should cease during the time when the cheque or bill bears the character of payment, and apparently, according to the English authorities, the cheque or bill has, as a general rule, that effect.

“But it has not in every case received that effect, and the defenders maintain that it has been decided in England that it does not suspend diligence, and they quoted, as authorities for that proposition, Davis v. Gyde, supra, recognised in Belsham v. Buchan, 1851, 11 C. B. 191, 201 ; and also in Byles on Bills, 374. So far as I have been able to discover, this exception to the general rule has been admitted chiefly or only in questions between landlord and tenant, it being, apparently, held that a landlord is entitled to distrain, notwithstanding that he has received a note or cheque from the tenant. But this exception from the general rule appears to have been deduced from certain distinctions, known in the law of England, but unknown to the law of Scotland, between the degrees of debts of different characters. I have much difficulty in following the reasons for this limited exception to the general principle. I observe that Mr Chalmers suggests the propriety of reconsidering the judgments by which it has been established (Chalmers on Bills, 307), and if I can judge from the notes at the close of the American report which was quoted, the exception does not appear to be received in America. It was decided expressly

No. 31. LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—It is important here to attend strictly to the history of what happened. It appears that an account was due by the pursuer, Macdougall, who is a property-agent in Glasgow, having a house at Dunoon, to the defender M'Nab, a plumber in Innellan, for the amount of which M'Nab held a decree, upon which there was an expired charge. M'Nab instructed the defender Young, a writer in Glasgow, to take proceedings to make the charge good, and Young being so instructed employed a sheriff-officer to make the charge good by poinding. On 29th December Young wrote to Macdougall intimating that the charge expired that day, and that they would require to give instructions to point on the following day unless the amount were paid by twelve o'clock. On the 31st Macdougall wrote to Young in these terms:—"Herewith please find cheque for £45, 9s. 5d., being amount decerned for, with expenses herein, the decree for which please send to me at your convenience." Now, that letter, although dated 31st December, did not reach Young until the 3d January, as is proved by the post-marks on the envelope. On inquiry at Macdougall's bank Young was informed that there were no funds to meet the cheque, and accordingly he telegraphed to Macdougall,—“Cheque presented, no funds,” and sent a letter to the same effect, enclosing the cheque. Now, that to the ordinary business mind was a very unsatisfactory state of matters. But on 4th January Macdougall writes to Young,—“I am sorry there should have been any hitch about the cheque. Ample funds now at credit, and I return you cheque, which please present again.” So that Young received the cheque back again with a request to present it again. It so happened that when this letter enclosing the cheque reached Young's office he was absent at a funeral, and he did not return to the office until five o'clock in the afternoon, after bank hours. His clerk, however, had gone to the bank and had ascerin Judge v. Fiske, 1844, 42 American Decisions, 380, that the acceptance of a promissory-note suspends the landlord's right of distress.

“I do not say that the acceptance of a note for rent would affect any security which the landlord might have. It has been held not to affect his right of hypothec—Swinton v. Stewart, 25th June 1766, 5 B. S., 477. But the question now is as to a diligence in execution.

“The rule adopted in England seems in accordance with reason and principle. I cannot imagine that if a creditor accepts a bill, say at a few days' date, for his debt, as conditional payment of it, he could immediately commence diligence in execution, or (which is the same thing) would not be bound to stop diligence already ordered while the bill was current, and a bank cheque is by definition a bill of exchange drawn on a banker, payable on demand (Bills Act, 1882, section 73). It seems to me that when a debtor's bill or cheque is not returned, he is entitled to think himself safe from diligence until the bill is matured or the cheque presented. If the pursuer's cheque had been returned immediately, he would have had an opportunity of paying in money, and so of avoiding the damage to his credit caused by the poinding.

“It is true that, if this be the effect of retaining a cheque, the creditor or his agent who holds a decree with an expired charge incurs a certain risk, but if he has no confidence in his debtor his remedy appears to be to refuse to have anything to do with the cheque.

“Entertaining these views, I do not require to consider whether Young might or ought to have done more than he did on the 5th of January. It was no doubt possible for him to have got the money into his hands by ten or eleven o'clock on the morning of that day, and he might then have stopped the poinding by telegram. But on the whole, if I had held that it was not his duty to countermand on the afternoon of the 4th of January, I think he could not be subjected in damages for anything he did or failed to do on the 5th.”

tained that there were then funds in the bank to meet the cheque, but Young, having returned to the office after bank hours, of course could not get the money that day. In these circumstances he had to consider what he would do. He came to the conclusion that he ought not to take any steps until he knew what the result of presenting the cheque next day might be. His clerk, no doubt, had ascertained when he called on the 4th that there were then funds in the bank, but there was nothing to prevent someone else from coming forward and laying an embargo on these funds, and thus making them unavailable to the defender before the cheque could be presented. It was reasonable, therefore, that he should come to the conclusion not to stop the diligence until he knew how the cheque stood and had got the money. It is indeed clear that he was under the belief that the poiding had been already executed, for he on 3d January had written to the sheriff-officer a letter in which he said,—“We suppose you will have executed the poiding ere this.” It is quite plain, therefore, that he saw no ground for taking steps on the 4th, as he evidently thought that the poiding had already been carried through. When the cheque was presented on the 5th it was found to be good for the money, and he accordingly wrote on that day to the sheriff-officer informing him that the matter had been settled. It turned out that the poiding was not executed until one o'clock on the 5th, and it was said that he might have telegraphed to the officer to stop the poiding. But his belief that the poiding had been already executed was, I think, sufficient to account for his not telegraphing, and in any case, I do not think that he was bound to telegraph.

In these circumstances, I am unable to see anything in Mr Young's conduct sufficient to subject the defenders in damages for the wrongous use of diligence. I say nothing against Macdougall, although his position was, unfortunately for him, suspicious. But it is clear that Young was bound to do his best for his client. It was to be regretted that he did not get the cheque till five o'clock on the 4th, but that did not arise from anything out of the ordinary course of business. It was a pure accident, for which I am unable to hold him responsible. On the whole matter I think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled and the defenders assoilzied.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of the same opinion. The Lord Ordinary holds the defenders responsible on no other ground but this, that when Mr Young on his return to his office on the afternoon of the 4th January ascertained from his clerk that there were funds in the bank to meet the cheque, it became his duty at once to countermand the diligence. I am unable to assent to that view. I do not think that he would have been doing his duty to his client if he had so acted. Although he was told that there was money in the bank when the clerk called, there was no certainty that it would be available to meet the cheque when it was presented next morning. I think that he was entitled to allow the diligence to proceed until he got the money.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of the same opinion. The Lord Ordinary thinks—and I agree with his Lordship—that no fault is to be attributed to Mr Young down to five o'clock on the afternoon of the 4th January. But the Lord Ordinary's view is that it then became the duty of Mr Young either to return the cheque or to countermand the diligence. I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary in this opinion. I think that it is quite plain that Mr Young did not retain the cheque on the afternoon of the 4th January in the sense that he

He does present it with due despatch next day and it is paid, but I think that he would have been wanting in his duty to his client if he had accepted it on the 4th as equivalent to payment, and I concur with Lord Rutherford Clark in thinking that he was not bound to countermand the diligence because he had ascertained from his clerk on the 4th that there were funds in the bank to meet the cheque when the clerk called there, for there was no certainty that when the cheque was duly presented next day there would still be funds to meet it.

Company—Rectification of register—Shares allotted as promotion money—
Petition—Competency—Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 35.—Shareholders of a company presented a petition under the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, for rectification of the register of the company by deletion therefrom of the names of certain shareholders, in respect that their shares had been illegally allotted to them as promotion money. The respondents lodged answers in which they denied the petitioners' allegations, stated facts and circumstances tending to shew that they had given good consideration for their shares, and pleaded that the petition was incompetent.

The Court held that petition under the 35th section was an inappropriate and inconvenient way of dealing with the statements contained in the petition and answers, and sisted process in order to enable the petitioners to raise an action of reduction in ordinary form.

Observed (per Lord M'Laren) that the jurisdiction conferred by the 35th section was not intended to be substituted for the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court, where the matters in controversy depended upon fact, and raised questions extrinsic to the proper object of the petition—the rectification of the register.

1ST DIVISION. UPON 14th October 1893 John Blaikie, James Moore Dickey, and William Niven, shareholders in the British Mexican Railway Company, Limited,* presented a petition under section 35 of the Companies Act,†

* One of the objects of the company as provided in the memorandum of association was,—“To adopt and carry into effect, either with or without modification, an agreement dated 11th May 1892 entered into and made between James Moore Dickey . . . as representing and on behalf of the Chihuahua Eastern Railway Company . . . and Charles Knight Rutherglen . . . on behalf of this company.”

† The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. c. 89), sec. 35, provided,—“If the name of any person is, without sufficient cause, entered in or omitted from the register of members of any company under this Act, or if default is made or unnecessary delay takes place in entering on the register the fact of any person having ceased to be a member of the company, the person or member aggrieved, or any member of the company, or the company itself, may, . . . as respects companies registered in Scotland, by summary petition to the Court of Session, or in such other manner as the said Courts may direct, apply for an order of the Court

1862, for rectification of the register of shareholders by the deletion of the names of Archibald Coats, George Coats, James Adam, Neil Buchanan, and James Hamilton Dunn, as holders of fully paid-up shares of the company, of the nominal value of £128,000. No. 32.
Nov. 21, 1893.
Blaikie v. Coats.

The petitioners set forth that the British Mexican Railway Company, Limited, was duly formed and registered in August 1892, the subscribers of the memorandum and articles of association being the five respondents and a Miss Jennie Young, and that by deed of adoption and confirmation, dated 9th November 1892, the contract and agreement referred to* in the memorandum of association, as of date 11th May 1892, was adopted, ratified, and confirmed by the company, the whole of the respondents and Miss Young being at this time directors of the company.

The petitioners further averred that the respondents were promoters of the company, and that while "the said contract and agreement bore ex facie that the consideration for the sale and transfer therein contained should be £300,000, payable in fully paid shares, as therein mentioned, that did not represent the real transaction between the parties. The true price for the said sale and transfer was only £171,000, payable in 17,100 shares of £10 each representing that amount. Messrs Archibald Coats, George Coats, and the other promoters desired that the transaction should be carried out in name of Rutherglen, on the footing that the nominal price to be paid for the said sale and transfer should be 30,000 shares of the company, while Dickey should undertake to reconvey to the promoters the 12,900 shares representing the difference between the price nominally and the price really paid to the vendors. Of these 12,900 shares Messrs Archibald and George Coats were to get 6250 shares each, and the other promoters 100 shares each. Mr Dunn accordingly prepared an agreement between Mr George Coats on behalf of the promoters, and Mr Dickey on behalf of the vendors, giving effect to this that the register may be rectified; and the Court may either refuse such application, with or without costs, to be paid by the applicant, or it may, if satisfied of the justice of the case, make an order for the rectification of the register, and may direct the company to pay all the costs of such motion, application, or petition, and any damages the party aggrieved may have sustained: The Court may in any proceeding under this section decide on any question relating to the title of any person who is a party to such proceeding to have his name entered in or omitted from the register, whether such question arises between two or more members or alleged members, or between any members or alleged members and the company, and generally the Court may in any such proceeding decide any question that it may be necessary or expedient to decide for the rectification of the register; provided that the Court, if a Court of common law, may direct an issue to be tried, in which any question of law may be raised, and a writ of error or appeal, in the manner directed by 'The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854,' shall lie."

* Under this contract and agreement the petitioner Dickey, as representing and on behalf of the Chihuahua Eastern Railway Company, sold to Rutherglen, as trustee for the British Mexican Railway Company, a contract and concession from the Executive of the Republic of Mexico for the construction of a railroad and relative works, with the lands, rights of way, and other rights and interests therein described, and also the vendor's right to and interest in the subsidies granted by the Mexican government under the concession to the extent of 7000 dollars for each kilometre constructed.

It was provided by the contract and agreement that the consideration for the sale and transfer therein contained should be £300,000 sterling, to be paid and satisfied by delivery to the vendors or their nominees of 30,000 fully paid-up shares in the British Mexican Railway Company of £10 sterling each.

No. 32. arrangement, and this agreement was signed of even date with the said contract and agreement of sale.

Blaikie v.
Coats.

"The said shares were not issued to James Moore Dickey, nor by him transferred in manner above provided; but the said James Moore Dickey, by letter, agreed to the allotment being made to the parties direct, and they were accordingly entered upon the register, and still stand there, as proprietors of fully paid shares in the said company to the amount above specified."

They further averred that they had recently become shareholders, and learned that the above transaction was illegal; that the respondents were all present when the price of £300,000 was fixed, and that the illegal act was entirely unknown to the petitioner Blaikie when he acquired his shares. "No payment was made by any of the said parties for said shares in money or money's worth, and the transaction by which they became holders thereof was purely fictitious. The allotment to them was not authorised by the memorandum or articles of association, or any other contract made before the issue of said shares, and was in violation of the provisions of the Companies Acts, and of the duties of the said parties as promoters of the company. . . . The petitioners do not ask that the name of any other person should be placed upon the register as holder of the said shares. On the contrary, they contend that the issue of the said shares was wrongful and illegal, and that the shares fall now to be regarded as unissued capital in the hands of the company."

Answers were lodged on behalf of the company and of Archibald and George Coats, James Adam, Neil Buchanan, and James H. Dunn.

The respondents set forth a number of complicated transactions with the view of shewing (1) that they were not promoters of the company, (2) that they gave value for their shares, and (3) that the petitioners were barred in the circumstances.

The respondents pleaded, inter alia, that the petition was incompetent, that the petitioners' statements were irrelevant and unfounded in fact, and that they had no title to sue.

Argued for the petitioners;—The application was competent. The jurisdiction given by the 35th section to the Court for purposes of rectification of company registers had been the subject of much discussion in England.¹ It was true that in the case of *Ward & Henry*² it had been laid down that the scope and object of the section was solely to provide for correction of errors in the register occasioned by the default of the company and in some English cases, such as *Askew's*³ case, the jurisdiction had been held to be excluded where there was complication, or where there was a question of specific performance, or where the case was more appropriate for trial by jury. But in the latest case,⁴ Lord Cairns' dictum had been criticised, and a wider scope had been given to the section. It might be taken as now settled by that case that it was entirely in the discretion of the Court whether a petition between members and alleged members could be dealt with in an application of this summary kind. If in the words of the latter part of the section, "default was made" in entering a shareholder's name on the register from (as here) insufficient cause, then the Court was entitled to remove him, and in doing so to consider any question of title. The present case was in any view of it distinguished from the older English cases, for there was here no complexity. The respondents were not called upon to pay damages; all that was asked was that their names should be deleted from the register. The remedy was a shorter and more convenient one than an ordinary action of reduction, and the Court had thus dealt with cases for rectification of the register in Scotland.¹ The remedy was not excluded by reason of the shares being fully paid up,² and was the appropriate one.³ The challenge had been made as soon as the fraud was discovered, and before any of the shares had been transferred by the respondents. These shares thus ought to be regarded as unissued capital, and in respect of it the names fell to be deleted from the register.

Blaikie v. Coats.

Argued for the respondents;—The section conferred no jurisdiction to decide a controversy between persons each of whom alleged himself to be a member of a company which took no part in the dispute. It applied only to a controversy between a company on the one side and an alleged member on the other. It occurred in the second part of the Act of 1862, which dealt with the preparation of and keeping up of the register, and Lord Cairns' dictum in Ward & Henry's case was sound to the effect that petitions under the 35th section were limited to such questions. There was no case in which promotion money had been recovered in a summary manner. The case of Ex parte Shaw was really in the respondents' favour, for the procedure was only allowed by the Court because all the parties concurred in desiring it. Moreover, the Judges were careful not to controvert the substantial part of Lord Cairns' judgment in Ward & Henry's case. In short, the case was not one appropriate for summary procedure. The answers shewed that there was a grave divergence between the parties upon questions of fact which could only be cleared up properly in an ordinary action of reduction with a proper record.⁴

Arguments were also submitted on the questions of title and relevancy, but it is unnecessary further to refer to them, as they were not considered by the Court.

LORD ADAM.—We have had a very full discussion in this case, and the result at which I have arrived is that it is not a case which is appropriate for being tried and disposed of under the 35th section of the Act. From all I have heard it does not appear to me to be a case fitted for summary procedure of this kind. It is a question between shareholders and shareholders; it is not a winding-up or a case of that kind. It is a case raising questions of fraud and other considerations. It appears to me that in such a case the respondent is entitled to a very precise statement of the allegations of fact which he is called upon to meet, and I do not think we have that here. Upon the whole matter, while I do not say the application is incompetent under the 35th section, I say it is not convenient that the case should be tried under that section, or rather that the 35th section is not appropriate to its trial. Therefore I am of opinion that we should, I do not say dismiss the petition, but keep it alive and sist it

Blaikie v.
Coats.

LORD M'LAREN.—I am of the same opinion. The hypothesis of the 35th section is that when a mistake has been made in entering the name of someone on the register, or in omitting to make the necessary entry, it can be corrected upon the facts being brought under the notice of the Court.

Now, when the right of the party claiming to be put on the register or to be taken off depends on written documents—it may be on a contract to take shares or a contract to transfer shares, or upon the question whether the directors have the power to decline to accept a transferee, or any other consideration which admits of instant verification from documents—it has undoubtedly been the practice to dispose of such questions under an application presented in terms of the 35th section. We have had cases also under that section that depended on proof—I think only where the proof did not involve matter affecting the constitution of the company—especially where, as in the case of the Aerated Bread Company, no interest except that of the shareholder making the application was involved. But while I agree with Lord Adam that the terms of the 35th section are so comprehensive that we should have jurisdiction to entertain and determine the merits of this case in the present application, yet that jurisdiction is not meant to be substituted for the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court where the matters in controversy depend upon fact, and raise questions extrinsic to the proper object of the petition—the rectification of the register.

Probably no precise line can be drawn between the cases that are suitable for disposal in a summary form and those which are more appropriate for trial by action of declarator or reduction, but the present case is clearly one which is unsuited for investigation in a proceeding under the 35th section. In the event of the petitioners' allegations being proved, they will doubtless have a right to have the register rectified, and while on that account they are probably entitled to have this petition kept alive in order that the correction may eventually be made, yet I think the facts set forth are such as can only be properly investigated in an ordinary action, and therefore this proceeding ought to be sisted, leaving the petitioners to seek redress in a different form.

LORD KINNEAR.—I do not think it necessary to express or to form any opinion upon the question whether this proceeding taken alone would be a competent remedy to the petitioners, because I quite agree with Lord Adam and Lord M'Laren that it is an extremely inconvenient and inappropriate form of process for trying the questions which are raised between these parties. I think the defender is well entitled to say,—“If my apparent right is to be challenged upon such grounds as are brought out in argument, and not only those set forth in the petition, it ought to be done by an action in the ordinary form.” I quite agree also that since it may turn out as the result of such an action that rectification of the register may be necessary, it is not desirable to throw out the present petition altogether.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I concur, and would merely add that I understand that in keeping alive the application for the contingencies which Lord Kinnear has referred to, we are not expressing any opinion as to the relevancy of the statements in the petition. It is merely that a ministerial act may require to be done by the Court—namely, to rectify the register, and accordingly it is not convenient that another petition should be presented with that end. We will sist the petition in hoc statu, reserving the question of expenses.

Milne v.
Walker.

Reparation—Slander—Statements in reply to previous attack—Innuendo—Counter issue.—M. wrote a letter to a newspaper in which, after charging various tradesmen, who had been the contractors for the supply of provisions to a school in Rothesay of which M. was governor with having supplied inferior goods, he stated that he had detected W., who had contracted to supply groceries, in trying to send a different, and, he believed, a cheaper brand of coffee than that contracted for. W. replied by a letter to a newspaper in which he made the following remarks upon M.'s letter:—"Every sentence of this contribution mirrors with startling significance the man M. Meant to be an exposure of a number of Rothesay gentlemen, every line exposes the true nature of the man who wrote it. Perhaps none will feel the sting of the letter so much as those whom he so gushingly thanks in the same breath as he levels his vile statements against so many of our prominent townsmen. . . . If I am able to shew that the statement made as regards myself is a consummate lie, the other statements in M.'s letter may be put down in the same category. I hereby charge this man with a deliberate and wilful untruth contained in what he says with reference to my supplying the school with goods."

In an action of damages for slander by M. against W., and also against the publisher of the letter, the pursuer averred that by the letter the defender had represented that the pursuer "had no regard for truth and was a liar." The Court held (1) that the letter as innuendoed was more than a reply to the pursuer's charge, and that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the statement in the defender's letter represented that the pursuer had no regard for truth and was a liar; (2) that the defender was not entitled to a counter issue, whether the pursuer's statement regarding the coffee contract was a lie, as not fully meeting the pursuer's issue.

On 3d October 1892 Owen Milne, who had been for seventeen years superintendent of the Bute Certified Industrial School at Rothesay, was dismissed from his post by a majority of the directors of the school in consequence of certain charges which had been made against him. A report of the meeting was published in the local newspapers.

1st Division.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

On 7th December Milne wrote a letter which was published in the Rothesay Express, in which he denied the truth of the charges which had been brought against him, and complained that he had been given no opportunity to rebut them. The letter charged various tradesmen, whom he named, with having supplied the school with provisions of an inferior quality. It contained the following passage about Bailie Walker, one of the directors,—"I notice from the newspapers that Bailie Walker was profuse in his attacks upon me . . . Although a director, he has been a contractor for the supply of groceries to the school. At the commencement of his present contract I detected that he was trying to send a different brand of coffee from what was contracted for, and I believe a cheaper brand, and I had to call upon him to take it back and insist that

No. 33. he adhere to his contract. He did so with a bad grace, and probably this accounts for the animus which he now displays towards me.”
 Nov. 24, 1893.
 Milne v. Walker.

On 10th December a letter from Bailie Walker was published in The Buteman and Advertiser for the Western Isles, of which newspaper William Archibald Wilson was the publisher. The letter contained the following:—“Sir,—When Mr Milne rushed into print a few weeks since with statements which on the very face of them bore the impress of apparent untruths, many in the community thought that he would have been advised in his own interest to write no more in the same vicious strain of vituperation, but if he did get such advice he has not benefited by it, as again your mid-weekly contemporary contains two columns of the most extraordinary composition which perhaps has ever appeared in any newspaper. Every sentence of this contribution mirrors with startling significance the man ‘Milne.’ Meant to be an exposure of a number of Rothesay gentlemen, every line exposes the true nature of the man who wrote it. Perhaps none will feel the sting of the letter so much as those whom he so gushingly thanks in the same breath as he levels his vile statements against so many of our prominent townsmen. Perhaps the best way to deal with a person guilty of writing such letters would be to treat him with silent contempt, more especially as there is not an individual named by him, whether directors of the school or shopkeepers who had occasion to expose his methods, who cannot well afford to adopt this course. But silence is sometimes misinterpreted, and if I am able to shew that the statement made as regards myself is a consummate lie, the other statements in ‘Milne’s’ letters may be put down in the same category. I hereby charge this man with a deliberate and wilful untruth, contained in what he says with reference to my supplying the school with goods. He says that at the commencement of the contract he detected me in supplying a cheaper brand of coffee. This is a deliberate lie.”

In consequence of the statements in this letter, Milne, on 7th February 1893, raised an action of damages against Walker and Wilson.

The pursuer averred;—“The letter falsely, maliciously, and calumniously represents, and was intended by the writing and publication thereof to represent, that the pursuer had no regard for truth, and was a liar.”

The defenders admitted writing and publishing the letter complained of.

They pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The statements of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the action. (4) The said letter being a fair reply to the attack made by pursuer in the public prints upon the writer thereof, and having been published in good faith, and upon a matter of public interest, no action lies for its publication. (5) Veritas.

The pursuer proposed the following issue for the trial of the cause against both the defenders,—“Whether the said statement is, in whole or in part, of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represents that the pursuer has no regard for truth and is a liar, or makes similar false and calumnious representations of and concerning the pursuer, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?”

The defenders proposed this counter issue,—“(1) Whether pursuer’s statement in his letter published in the Rothesay Express newspaper of 7th December 1892, that he had detected the defender Walker, at the commencement of his contract for the supply of groceries to the Bute Certified Industrial School at Rothesay, trying to send a different and cheaper brand of coffee than what he had contracted to supply was a lie?”

On 18th July the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) approved the issue for No. 33. the trial of the cause, and disallowed the proposed counter issue.*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The pursuer was not entitled Nov. 24, 1893. Milne v. Walker. to issues here, for by his letter of 7th December he had provoked an attack and must expect a sharp retort.¹ In any view, the letter complained of would not bear the innuendo sought to be put upon it. The pursuer was, it was true, stated in the letter to have told lies, but he had

* "OPINION.— . . . The first question arising in the present case is, whether the pursuer is entitled to innuendo the portion of Walker's letter of 10th December, quoted in the first schedule, as representing that the pursuer Milne is a person who has no regard for truth and is a liar. I am of opinion that the innuendo is legitimate.

"The letter as I read it asserts that Milne's statements about Walker were consummate and deliberate lies. If that had been all which the letter said, it would not, in my opinion, have warranted the innuendo. But then the letter further says that Milne had made 'vile statements' against many prominent townsmen. What these vile statements were I do not know; and then he says that if the statement about himself were shewn to be a lie, the other statements might be put down in the same category. That apparently means that these vile statements were deliberate lies. Further, he says that every sentence of Milne's letter 'mirrors with startling significance the man Milne.' This language is figurative, but it is not extravagant to represent it as meaning that these vile statements, which were consummate and deliberate lies, were characteristic of Milne, and what is that but asserting that Milne had no regard for truth and was a liar? I therefore consider the innuendo admissible.

"To publish of a man in the newspapers that he has no regard for truth and is a liar is certainly prima facie actionable.

"But it is said that this part of the letter complained of is a fair reply to Milne's letter charging Walker with dishonestly furnishing inferior goods, and that therefore on the authority of Gray v. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, 18th July 1890, 17 R. 1185, it would not warrant any action. I understand the law on that subject to be that publications in answer to a public attack, meeting that attack and vindicating the character of the person attacked, are not actionable; but I also understand that this privilege does not extend to charges unconnected with that reply or vindication. If, for example, A should charge B with theft, a denial by B of the charge would not warrant an action of damages by A however vigorous or gross the language might be in which B's denial was couched. But if B should go on to charge A with theft, that would be actionable, and would not be protected or privileged to any extent on account of A's previous attack.

"In this case Walker was entitled to deny Milne's charge and to do so in whatever language he might think most becoming. But when he went on to charge Milne with having told other lies, it appears to me that he went beyond the bounds of fair reply and retort, and therefore out of the bounds of privilege. My opinion, therefore, is that the case of Gray does not apply, and that the pursuer is entitled to make the present demand.

"And because I think that Walker's charge goes beyond the bounds of fair retort and of privilege, I think that the pursuer is not bound to put malice in his issue. But I do not express any opinion on the question whether ultimately he may be held bound to prove malice.

"I think that the defender's first counter issue must be disallowed as not coming up to the pursuer's issue. I do not affirm that an issue of veritas must in all cases echo the innuendo or come up exactly to the pursuer's issue. But it must, I think, assert the truth of that part of the accusation complained of which is slanderous and actionable—Bertram v. Pace, 7th March 1885, 12 R. 798."

No. 33. not been called a liar, and even if he had been, that was not actionable.¹ It was a complete straining of the terms of the letter to say that they amounted to an assertion that the pursuer was a habitual liar. The language used may have been vehement, but it was in the circumstances justified. Even if an issue were granted, malice must be put into it. The counter issue should have been allowed. The defenders were willing to amend it by inserting the adjective "deliberate" before "lies," but they were not ready, nor could they fairly be asked, to take upon themselves the burden of proving that the statements made by the pursuer in his letter about other people were lies, or that the pursuer was a liar by habit and repute. A counter issue need not echo the ipsissima verba of the issue. It was sufficient if it substantially met, as it did here, the substance² of the pursuer's charge. The case of Bertram v. Pace,³ founded on by the Lord Ordinary, had no application, because there the counter issue was disallowed on the ground that it did not impute dishonesty to the pursuer, and therefore did not cover the alleged slander.

Nov. 24, 1898.
Milne v.
Walker.

Argued for the pursuer;—The letter was capable of the innuendo put upon it, and the issues must be allowed. The defender Walker was perfectly entitled to reply to the charge brought against him of cheating, but he was not entitled to proceed to make an attack on the pursuer's general character. Any privilege there was only extended to such retorts as were fairly an answer to the previous attack.⁴ Anyone reading the letter complained of would receive the impression that the writer intended to convey the meaning that the pursuer was a person addicted to the vice of lying. The counter issue was clearly inadmissible. It must substantially meet the pursuer's issue, and this it did not.

LORD PRESIDENT.—If it had been clear that the passage in the first schedule could not be read as meaning more than an emphatic and indignant denial of the charge brought against the defenders in the matter of the coffee, no issue could have been allowed. But the pursuer says that the passage does mean more,—that, not content with repelling the accusation against himself, the defender goes out of his way to accuse the pursuer of general mendacity. At this stage we have not to determine which of those two readings is the true one. That will be for the jury to say, and it is quite an open question. But it being an open question,—the language admitting of either construction, according to the surrounding facts,—I do not think that we can refuse to let the pursuer go to trial. I think that the first and second issues may be approved as they stand.

In this view, it is plain that the counter issue will not do. It ignores the whole sting of the pursuer's issues. If the pursuer complained merely that his accusation of the defender had been called a lie, this counter issue would have been very appropriate; but then in that case we should not have given the pursuer an issue at all.

I understood the defenders' counsel to state that they were not prepared to propose a counter issue undertaking to prove specifically the untruth of statements of the pursuer relating to others than the defender.

LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD M'LAREN.—The only question of principle in this case is that of the relation of the counter issue to the issue proposed by the pursuer. It has been sometimes said to entail hardship on the part of a defender in an action of damages for slander that, when the pursuer puts an extravagant meaning on the defender's words, the latter is under the necessity of justifying the alleged libel in the sense which the pursuer has put upon it instead of in the sense in which the defender says the words complained of were used. This difficulty has been sometimes met by giving the defender a counter issue negating the substance of the innuendo suggested by the pursuer without negating all the expressions which the pursuer has chosen to put into it. I agree with your Lordship that the better course is to make the principal and counter issues meet wherever that can be done, and I think it generally can be done by such a modification of the innuendo in the principal issue as will fairly raise the defender's case, and not put upon him a burden which he should not be called upon to bear. I feel greatly the force of your Lordship's observation during the discussion that the jury might have difficulty in shaping their verdict if the issues of the parties were so framed that neither completely countered the averments of the other.

Reparation—Master and Servant—Personal injury—Liability at common law.—In an action at common law for damages for personal injury by a workman against his employers, the pursuer averred that on the occasion in question he was ordered by the defenders' foreman to assist in replacing a small travelling crane, in the defenders' works, in its proper position on its rails, which ran upon beams about fifteen feet from the ground; that in order to do this the pursuer had to stand on one of these beams and hang on by his hands to a beam about five feet higher, on which another and larger crane travelled; and that while he was in that position the larger crane moved along its rails and passed over his left hand injuring it severely. The pursuer further averred that the smaller crane was, to the defenders' knowledge, unfit for the use to which the defenders put it, and was, in consequence, when in use, almost invariably displaced from its rails; that the defenders, although they were well aware that this was a matter of daily occurrence, provided no proper appliances for replacing the crane, in consequence of which the workmen were compelled to adopt the dangerous means of doing so through which the pursuer had met with the accident; that in obeying the foreman's orders the pursuer relied, and was entitled to rely, on proper arrangements being made by the defenders for insuring his safety when engaged in the dangerous work he was ordered to do; but that the defenders took no precautions whatever for his safety, and neither gave warning to the man in charge of the upper crane that the pursuer was to be in the position in which he was put, nor gave intimation to the pursuer that the upper crane was to be moved.

suer's own shewing, the moving of the upper crane—the proximate cause of the accident—was due to the fault of one or other of his fellow-workmen.

IN January 1893 Andrew Baxter, boilermaker, Aberdeen, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against James Abernethy & Company, engineers and boilermakers, Ferryhill Foundry, Aberdeen, for damages at common law, on account of injuries sustained by him when in their employment.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 2) "On Friday, 11th December 1891, pursuer was engaged as a boilermaker in the defenders' service at their works at Ferryhill, Aberdeen. He was subject to the orders of George Andrews, the foreman of the defenders' boilermaking department." (Cond. 3) "The defenders use a small travelling crane for the purposes of their work, and on the afternoon of said 11th December 1891 this crane had got displaced from the rails upon which it travels. The pursuer was ordered by the said George Andrews, his foreman, to assist in placing this crane in proper position on its rails by means of a sling. In order to do so the pursuer had to climb up to the rails, which run upon beams about fifteen feet from the ground. The pursuer had to stand on one of these beams and hang on by his hands to a beam about five feet higher, on which another and larger crane travels. While in that position the larger crane was moved along its rails and passed over the pursuer's left hand and severely injured same. . . . Explained that the smaller crane was, to the defenders' knowledge, defective and unfit for the use to which the defenders put it. In consequence of its insufficiency, the strain placed upon it in the raising and carrying of plates, &c., almost invariably caused it to be displaced from the rails. The defenders took no means to remedy such defect, and, in consequence, the workmen employed at the job for which such small crane had to be used, necessarily had to replace same on the rails. The defenders, however, although they were well aware that this was matter of daily occurrence, provided no proper means or appliance for the work of replacing the crane, and in consequence of the want thereof the workmen, such as pursuer, were compelled to adopt the means before narrated, which involved risk and danger that would have been entirely obviated had the defenders either remedied the original defect in the said crane or provided proper appliances for replacing same when displaced." (Cond. 4) "The said accident, and the injuries thereby caused to the pursuer, were due to the negligence of the defenders, or of their said foreman, or of others of their servants, for whom they are responsible. In obeying the said foreman's orders the pursuer relied, and was entitled to rely, that proper arrangements would be made by the defenders for insuring his safety while engaged in the dangerous work he was ordered to do, and, in particular, that the upper crane should not be used. The defenders, however, took no precautions whatever for the pursuer's safety, and gave no warning or intimation to the man in charge of the upper crane that the pursuer was to be engaged in the position he was put; and they further gave no warning or intimation to the pursuer that the upper crane would be used."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having been injured through the fault of the defenders, or of those for whom they are responsible, he is entitled to reparation from the defenders. (2) The defenders having ordered the pursuer to execute difficult and dangerous work, were bound to take reasonable precautions for his safety, and they having failed to do so, and he having been thereby injured, the defenders are liable to him in reparation. (4) The pursuer having been injured through the defective condition of the defenders' plant, in consequence of the danger and risk to which they unnecessarily exposed him, is entitled to reparation as claimed. No. 34.

The defenders pleaded ;—(2) The pursuer's averments being insufficient to support the action at common law, it should be dismissed, with expenses. Nov. 25, 1893.
Baxter v.
Abernethy &
Co.

On 19th April 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) sustained the second plea in law for the defenders, and dismissed the action.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on 18th October, recalled his Substitute's interlocutor and allowed a proof.

The defenders appealed, and argued ;—The action was one at common law only, and consequently the pursuer was not entitled to prevail unless he could shew that the proximate cause of the accident was due to the fault of the defenders, and no such case was here averred. The pursuer's case apparently was that the accident was due to the fault of the foreman, but a foreman was, at common law, simply a fellow-workman ; therefore the fact that the foreman was in fault was nothing to the point, there being no averment that the defenders were in fault in having chosen an incompetent foreman. The pursuer attempted to bring his case within the rule that employers would be liable if they knowingly permitted a defective system of working. Here also the pursuer's case failed, for, according to his own shewing, the defective system of working, assuming it to have existed, would not have caused the accident but for the fault of the foreman ; but a defective system of working, or defective plant, would not render an employer liable at common law if the defect would not have produced the accident but for a breach of duty on the part of a fellow-workman, for in such a case it was the breach of duty which was the proximate cause of the accident.¹ In truth, however, there was no proper averment of a defective system of working, but merely an averment of machinery going out of order in a way that was inevitable in establishments like this.

Argued for the pursuer ;—The pursuer had stated a relevant case. If this had been the first instance of the smaller crane going out of order, a different class of case would have been presented ; but what the pursuer averred was that the smaller crane was constantly going out of order and that its defective condition was known to the defenders. They ought, therefore, either to have had the smaller crane removed or thoroughly repaired, or to have provided an efficient system of signals whereby accidents like the present would have been prevented. They had consequently either provided defective plant, or had permitted a dangerous system of working, and for either of these things employers were liable at common law if injuries resulted to their employees therefrom.²

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer makes certain averments in regard to two things in the works of the defenders—first, that the small travelling crane, which ran below the rails of the larger crane, sometimes became displaced, that this happened from time to time ; and second, that when it did so it was necessary to replace it by means of a sling, that he was engaged in replacing it, and that while so engaged he had, in order to steady himself, to put up his hand on the beam on which the larger crane ran. He avers that while in that position the larger crane was moved forward and injured his hand. He further avers that

Nov. 25, 1893.
Baxter v.
Abernethy &
Co.

Now, the proximate cause of the accident was the moving of the larger crane. That must have been done by a fellow-workman or the foreman, who at common law is a fellow-workman. I therefore am of opinion that the pursuer has stated no relevant case at common law. In any workyard there may be part of the machinery not in perfect working order, and if anything does go wrong someone may require to readjust it, and if someone does something carelessly an accident may happen. But if there was carelessness here, it was that of a fellow-servant for whom the master is not responsible, the pursuer having no claim under the Employers Liability Act.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am very clearly of opinion that the case is irrelevant.

IN an action raised in the Sheriff Court at Hamilton at the instance of Mrs Janet Tinnie or Smith, widow of David Smith, contractor, and four minor children against Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company, Limited, for damages on account of the death of David Smith, the defenders, after the case had been appealed to the Court of Session for jury trial, lodged a minute in which they stated, inter alia, that since the record was closed they had ascertained that some of the children of the deceased had not been made parties to the action. They moved the Court that intimation of the dependence of the action should be made to these children, who, it was stated at the bar, were sui juris and resident in this country. The pursuers did not oppose the motion. The Court appointed intimation to be made "to the children of the deceased . . . other than those who are pursuers in the action, in order that they may crave themselves to be sisted in the action within eight days, if so advised."

County Franchise—Joint occupancy—Value—Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), secs. 6 and 14—Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vict. c. 3), secs. 5, 11, and 12.—Held, upon a construction of the Registration Statutes, that in order to entitle joint tenants and

v. Aiken.

At a Registration Court for the western division of the county of Renfrew, held at Paisley on 6th October 1893, Charles William Wainwright, law-clerk, Glenpatrick, claimed to be enrolled on the Register of Voters for that division as joint tenant and occupant of a house situated at Glenpatrick, in the Abbey Parish of Paisley (Elderslie Electoral Division).

Lord Kinnear.
Lord Trayner.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

It was admitted (1) that the claimant and his brother, William Herbert Wainwright, had been joint tenants and occupants of the premises for the qualifying period, and (2) that the rent of the premises was £20.

William Aiken, bank accountant, Morton Terrace, Bridge of Weir, a voter on the roll, objected to the claim being admitted, on the ground that the claimant's interest in the subjects was of less annual value than £14.

The Sheriff (Cheyne) rejected the claim, and the claimant thereupon craved a case, in which the Sheriff set forth the above facts and stated the following question of law for the determination of the Court:—"Is one of two joint tenants of subjects situated in a county entitled to be enrolled as a voter in the county when his interest in the subjects is £10 per annum?"

Argued for the appellant;—Before the passing of the Representation of the People Act, 1884, in order to entitle one of two or more joint tenants to vote in respect of the occupation franchise, it was necessary (sections 6 and 14 of the Representation of the People Act, 1868*) that his individual interest in the joint tenancy should be of the yearly

* The Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 48), sec. 6, enacted,—“Every man shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, and, when registered, to vote at elections for a member to serve in Parliament for a county who . . . is qualified as follows,—that is to say, . . . (2) is and has been during the twelve calendar months immediately preceding the last day of July in the actual personal occupancy as tenant of lands and heritages within the county of the annual value of £14 or upwards as appearing on the Valuation-roll of such county. . . .”

Sections 13 and 14 of the Act contained certain “Supplemental Provisions” for certain “incidents of franchise.” Section 14 provided,—“ . . . Where any such lands and heritages shall be owned, held, or occupied by more persons than one as . . . joint tenants and joint occupants of the same, as the case may be, . . . each of such joint tenants and joint occupants shall . . . be entitled to be registered and to vote, provided the annual value of the said lands and heritages, as appearing on the Valuation-roll, held and occupied by them shall be sufficient, when divided by the number of such joint tenants and joint occupants, to give to each of them a sum of not less than £14, but not otherwise.”

The Representation of the People Act, 1884 (48 Vict. c. 3), sec. 5, enacted,—“Every man occupying any land or tenement in a county or burgh in the United Kingdom, of a clear yearly value of not less than £10, shall be entitled to be registered as a voter and, when registered, to vote at an election for such county or burgh in respect of such occupation, subject to the like conditions respectively as a man is, at the passing of this Act, entitled to be registered as a voter and to vote at an election for such county in respect of the county occupation franchise, and at an election for such burgh in respect of the burgh occupation franchise.” Section 11 provided that “this Act, so far as may be consistently with the tenor thereof, shall be construed as one with” the Representation of the People Act, 1868.

Section 12 repealed section 6 of the Representation of the People Act, 1868 (mentioned in schedule 2, part 2 of the 1884 Act). It did not repeal section 14 of the Representation of the People Act, 1868.

value of £14. By section 5 of the Act of 1884, however, "every man" occupying land in a county of the yearly value of £10 was entitled to vote in respect of his occupancy. These words "every man" were so general as to cover cases not only of sole but joint tenancy. The Legislature had made no distinction between the two. It was true that section 12 of the Act of 1884 repealed the 6th section of the Act of 1868 while it left standing section 14. But then the 14th section could not stand alone. It was dependent on the repealed 6th section, and the two sections must therefore be held to have been repealed together.

Argued for the respondent;—If the view were accepted that the words "every man" in the 5th section of the Act of 1884 meant more than one man, the result would be that four or five persons might acquire the franchise on a single qualification of £10. "Every man" obviously meant each man, and the section only provided a qualification for sole tenants holding subjects of the value of £10. It in no way recognised joint tenants. The provisions as regarded their qualification were to be found in section 14 of the Act of 1868, under which each joint tenant's interest in the joint tenancy must be of the yearly value of £14. The Act of 1884, while repealing section 6 of the Act of 1868 had left the 14th section unrepealed, and the section must apply to the present claim.

LORD KINNEAR.—Under the Representation of the People (Scotland) Act, 1868, every man is entitled to be registered as a voter under the 6th section and to vote at elections, who is qualified in the manner provided by that section, one of the qualifications being that he "is, and has been, during the twelve calendar months immediately preceding the last day of July, in the actual personal occupancy as tenant of lands and heritages within the county of the annual value of £14 or upwards."

Now, that was called in the statute, and has generally been described as, the occupation franchise for voters in counties.

By the 13th and 14th sections of the statute certain supplemental provisions, as they are called in the Act itself, are added, in order to provide for certain incidents of the franchise already given; and one of these incidents provided for by the 14th section is that of a joint occupation. Where lands and heritages are occupied by more persons than one as joint tenants or joint occupants, each of such joint tenants and joint occupants shall be entitled to be registered and to vote, "provided the annual value of the said lands and heritages as appearing on the Valuation-roll, held and occupied by them, shall be sufficient, when divided by the number of such joint tenants and joint occupants, to give to each of them a sum of not less than £14, but not otherwise."

The effect of these two clauses is clear, and no question could have been raised as to the right of joint tenants and joint occupants to vote if the estimated annual value of the lands and heritages which they held or occupied jointly was sufficient, when divided amongst them, to give to each of them a sum of not less than £14, but not otherwise.

Now, the Representation of the People Act, 1884, is, by the 11th section, to be construed as one with the Representation of the People Act, 1868, and by the 5th section of the former Act, which provides for an assimilation of the occupation qualification in counties and burghs, "every man occupying any land or tenement in a county or burgh in the United Kingdom of a clear yearly value of not less than £10 shall be entitled to be registered as a voter."

Now, if that section stood alone there might be a question whether the franchise thereby conferred could be exercised by more than one tenant and occupant of any land or tenement of the clear yearly value of £10. But it is not to be read alone, because by the 11th section the Act is to be construed as one with the Act of 1868. The Act of 1884 repeals the 6th section of the 1868 Act, but leaves the 14th section standing, and reading them together I cannot see room for more than one construction of the two clauses. No. 36.

Nov. 27, 1893.
Wainwright v. Aiken.

The 5th section gives the franchise to tenants and occupants of lands and tenements of the value of £10, but the 14th section of the former Act is to be read along with it, and provides in the clearest terms that each of such joint tenants shall be entitled to be registered on the conditions I have already mentioned, "but not otherwise."

It has been suggested, and there is a good deal of force in the suggestion, that the new £10 franchise was intended to be substituted for the old £14 franchise, and therefore that the incidents which Parliament attached to the old franchise should be extended mutatis mutandis to the new. But I do not think we are entitled in construing an Act of Parliament to read out of it plain words which still stand in it; and it is clear that there stands a provision in the case of joint tenants that each is entitled to be registered only when the tenement or land is capable of yielding £14 to each if the annual value were divided. I am therefore unable to differ from the Sheriff.

Whyte v. Watt.
A voter objecting to a certain person's name being retained on the Register of Voters, instead of signing the notice of objection in the ordinary way, stencilled his name upon it through a perforated signature he had made on a waxed skin.
Held that the notice was "signed by the person objecting" in the sense of sec. 4 of the Burgh Voters Act, 1856.

Observed that the signature would not satisfy the conditions of the statutes regulating the subscription and attestation of probative deeds.

AT a Registration Court for the county of Midlothian, held at Edinburgh on 9th October 1893, Hugh Watt, solicitor, 107 Princes Street, Edinburgh, a voter on the register, objected to the name of Peter Whyte, residing at 40 Gilmore Place, Edinburgh, being retained on the register. Registration

It was stated on behalf of the person objected to that the notice of objection served on him, and the relative notice sent to the assessor of the said county, were invalid, in respect that they had not been signed by the objector in terms of section 4 of 19 and 20 Vict. cap. 58, and according to the forms Nos. 4 and 5 of schedule A annexed to the said Act.

The facts proved with regard to the alleged signature of Hugh Watt were as follows:—Hugh Watt did, with a certain instrument called a stencil-pen, perforate the letters forming his signature upon a prepared waxed skin stretched on a frame. He then placed the notice under the waxed skin, and passed an inked roller over the said waxed skin perforated as aforesaid, and the ink from the roller passing through the perforations in the waxed skin produced the signature on the notice. The signature was formed entirely by Hugh Watt; no other person was employed in the operation, and no use was made by Hugh Watt of any stamp, die, or engraved plate in forming his signature. When letters or words have been formed on the said waxed skin by the stencil-pen, sheets of paper to the number of 100 or more can be placed successively under the waxed skin, and upon the inked roller being passed over the waxed skin the letters or words are produced on the sheet of paper immediately under the waxed skin.

The Sheriff (Blair) repelled the objection that the notices were not signed in terms of the Act.

Whereupon Mr J. C. Strettell Miller, W.S., on behalf of Peter Whyte, obtained a case for the Court of Appeal, in which the Sheriff stated the above facts.

The question of law for the determination of the Court was,—“Whether the notices of objection, or either of them, were signed by the said Hugh Watt in terms of section 4 of 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58?”*

Argued for the appellant;—Where an Act of Parliament required a document to be subscribed or signed (and these were synonymous expressions), a facsimile impression of the writer's subscription or signature was not a sufficient compliance with the statute.¹ It had, it was true, been held in England that a stamp would suffice where a Registration Statute required the signature of a person,² but that decision necessarily followed from the analogies of English law, where a stamp was held a good signature within the Statute of Frauds and the Statute of Wills. The case had no application as regarded Scots Registration Statutes.

The respondent was not called upon.

LORD KINNEAR.—I do not think it is necessary to call for a reply. The Statute 19 and 20 Vict. c. 58, requires that a notice of objection shall be “signed” by the objector. There is no question in the case as to matters of fact. The objector did affix a signature to his note of objection in the manner stated in the case, and there is no dispute as to the genuineness of the signature or authenticity of the objection.

But then it is said that the signature was affixed in a certain manner which is not equivalent to subscription by the law of Scotland. He did not write his name in the ordinary manner, but “with a certain instrument called a stencil-pen he perforated the letters forming his signature upon a prepared waxed skin. He then placed the notice under the waxed skin, and passed an inked roller over the skin, and the ink from the roller passing through the perforations produced the signature.”

I take it to be clear that this signature would not be sufficient to satisfy the conditions of the statutes regulating the subscription and attestation of probative deeds; but I do not think that it is at all necessary, in order to satisfy the requirements of the statute which we are now construing, that an objection by one voter to the name of another should be subscribed in the sense of the statutes.

The word “signed” is not a technical word but a word of ordinary language. Subscription is a method of signing. It is not the only method. We are therefore to consider whether the method of authentication described in the case can properly be called "signing." Now, upon that question, we have the advantage of a decision of the Court of Common Pleas, in the construction of a similar provision in the 6th of the Queen, chapter 18, which requires that a "notice of objection shall be signed by the objector." In Bennett v. Brumfitt, L. R., 3 C. P. 28, the Court held that this requirement was satisfied although the objector had not subscribed the notice but had affixed his name to it by means of a stamp on which was engraved a facsimile of his ordinary signature. I cannot suppose that when the Legislature has employed the same language in a Scots Act as in a previous English Act, it intended to prescribe one method of authentication in England and another in Scotland, and I should be very slow to differ from the learned Judges in England as to the meaning of an ordinary word in the English language.

I see no reason why the word "signed," in this statute we are considering, should be construed differently from the same word in England, and I am therefore of opinion that the mode of authentication described in the special case is a sufficient compliance with the statute.

LORD TRAYNER and LORD KINCAIRNEY concurred.

Property—Disposition—Road—Obligation on disponee to maintain road—Conversion of road into a city street.—By disposition, dated in 1875, of a piece of ground in the burgh of Maryhill, near Glasgow, A, the disposer, became bound to construct a road and footpath through other lands belonging to him as an access to the ground disposed, and B, the disponee, became bound to pay a certain proportion "of the expense of maintaining the said road." In 1891 the burgh of Maryhill was included in the extended boundaries of the city of Glasgow, and the Glasgow Master of Works called on A to repair the road by putting in new water-channels of square dressed whinstone four feet broad, and covering the road with hand-broken whinstone metal. A having called on B to pay his proportion of the expense of such repair, and B having repudiated liability, A brought an action against B for declarator that the defender was bound to pay a proportion of the expense of the operations required by the Master of Works. B pleaded that as these operations were not of the character contemplated by the disposition, he was not liable. A proof shewed that the operations required by the Master of Works would greatly exceed in cost what would be necessary to restore the road to its original condition. Held that the pursuer was not entitled to decree of declarator as concluded for.

A road about 840 feet in length, and consisting of a metalled surface, with a water-channel of rubble whinstone, was accordingly formed by the trustees.

At Whitsunday 1891 the municipal boundaries of Glasgow were extended so as to include the burgh of Maryhill, within which the road just mentioned lay.

On 3d December 1891 the Master of Works of Glasgow, acting under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. cclxxiii.), served a notice on Sir George Campbell's trustees, calling upon them to put the roadway into a state of repair, by putting in new water-channels of square dressed whinstone setts four feet broad, and covering the road with a good coating of hand-broken whinstone metal, the whole to be rolled until a uniform and smooth surface was obtained.

At the date of this notice part of the lands conveyed by the disposition of 1875 had come to be in possession of the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, in virtue of a decree of mails and duties, dated 26th February 1887, and another part belonged to Robert Law, joiner, Kelvin Street, Glasgow, in virtue of a conveyance in his favour.

In July 1892, Sir George Campbell's trustees having called on the insurance company and on Law to pay the proportion effeiring to their lands respectively of the expense of repairing the road in terms of the notice, and the company and Law having denied liability, the trustees brought an action against them, concluding for declarator,—“(First) That the defenders are bound, each of them, to pay a proportion of the expense of repairing, in terms of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, the private street known as Church Street, Maryhill, Glasgow, along with the pursuers and others using the same and similarly bound, the proportion being according to the extent of the ground held by each of the parties so bound.” Then followed a further declaratory conclusion apportioning the proportion of the expense alleged to fall to each of the defenders. There was no petitory conclusion.

The pursuers founded on the disposition of 1875 and on the notice of the Master of Works, and pleaded;—(1) The defenders being each of them subject to the real burden or real condition founded on as successors of the original disponee in parts of the lands disposed are bound to contribute in terms of the first conclusion of the summons. No. 38.

The defenders averred;—"The road or street indicated in said notice is of a totally different character and description from the road contemplated by the disposition referred to"; and pleaded, inter alia;—(4) The operations directed by the Master of Works not being of the character nor within the description of those contemplated by the disposition, the defenders are not liable to contribute to the expense of the same. Nov. 28, 1893.
Campbell's
Trustees v.
Scottish Union and National Insurance Co.

The defenders also pleaded that the obligation to pay a proportion of the expense of repairing the road had not been validly constituted a real burden, and so was not effectual against them as singular successors; and the insurance company had a separate plea, that in any event they were not liable as being merely heritable creditors in possession under a decree of mails and duties. Neither of these pleas need be further noticed here, looking to the grounds of judgment on which the action was determined.

A proof was allowed. The evidence shewed that nothing had been done in the way of maintaining the road from the time of its formation until the present question arose; and that it had fallen into a state of some disrepair. The evidence as to the cost of restoring it to its original condition, as compared with the cost of executing the works required by the notice of the Master of Works, sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary. The pursuers adduced evidence to the effect that water-channels of square dressed whinstone setts (which formed a large item in the requirements of the notice), had come to be the usual description of water-channels in roads like the present.

Under the Glasgow Police Acts, when the road was taken over by the town, it would thereafter be maintained out of the rates, the defenders being liable only in so far as they were bound to pay rates.

On 1st June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Sustains the fourth plea in law for the defenders, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses," &c.*

* "OPINION.—It is admitted that the defenders are not primarily bound to obtemper the order of the Master of Works, as they are not proprietors of any land or heritage adjoining the part of Church Street in question, or having right of access by it in the sense of section 318 of the Glasgow Police Act of 1866. The parties bound to implement that order are the pursuers, and the present action is truly one of relief, or rather for declarator of right of relief, of part of the expense to be incurred in executing the works ordered. The summons does not contain any petitory conclusions. . . .

"The summons and condescendence are framed for the purpose of raising one question and one question only, viz., Whether the works ordered by the Master of Works are, as a whole, of such a character as to fall within the obligation contained in the fifth condition of the disposition in favour of Walker. The case is not framed for the purpose of raising the question whether the road was actually in disrepair, or what were the causes of and who were responsible for its being in that condition. The action proceeds on the assumption that the order of the Master of Works is conclusive upon that question. . . .

"The road was formed in 1874; but it was not until 1891 that the municipal boundaries of Glasgow were extended so as to include the burgh of Maryhill. I do not think it can be held that, when the disposition of 1875 was executed, any of the parties had in contemplation such an extension of the boundaries of Glasgow and the application to Maryhill of the provisions of the Glasgow Police Act.

"Now, a leading proposal which underlies the order of the Master of Works is not merely to put the road into the state of repair, according to the standard

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The road, to the maintenance of which the defenders were here called on to contribute, was the road referred to in the disposition of 1875 ; there was no question as to alter-on which it was formed, but to have it reconstructed, or at least materially improved, according to the standard and requirements in force in Glasgow, so as to admit of it being taken over and maintained as one of the streets of Glasgow, in all time coming, by the town.

“ The pursuers' argument is that the works ordered are merely repairs according to the enlightened views and requirements of the time, and that the original disponents must be held to have contemplated such a development. I cannot adopt this view ; and I think a conclusive test of its unsoundness is that, if the pursuers had done the same work at their own hand they could not have recovered the full proportions of the cost from the defenders. The road was originally constructed at a cost of £441. Of that sum, works costing £234 are still available, having been done once and for all. Thus only £207 is left to represent work which might be required for repair, or done over again. The cost of the repairs which the pursuers propose to make amounts to £400. I hold it proved that the road can be not merely repaired but made as good as new for £135. That includes a thorough remetalling, much more than would be necessary for ordinary maintenance from year to year ; and a few necessary repairs to the water-channel, the expense of the latter being not more than £13. On the other hand, the Master of Works has ordered new water-channels of square dressed whinstone setts, of 4 feet broad, which will cost £150 ; and the class of metalling ordered is of a much superior kind to that which was required for the road in its original state. I understand that the pursuers do not now claim from the defenders any part of the expense of the kerb ; but, deducting £91 on that head, there still remains a difference of £175 between the cost of works ordered and the outside cost of repairs which would make the road as good as new.

“ It seems to me that the works ordered by the Master of Works amount, if not to reconstruction, to such a renovation and improvement of the road as clearly to exceed maintenance in the sense of the disposition. This is not only proved by the defenders' witnesses, but admitted by the pursuers' witness, Alexander Fail, who constructed the road in 1874. He says in cross-examination,—‘ If the whole of the rubble stones were taken out of the water-channels, and they were replaced by square dressed stones, that would amount to a reconstruction of the water-channels, and not a repair. That would be much more costly than mere repair. I would describe it as an improvement of the water-channels. (Q.) And I suppose you would say the same thing with regard to the metalling with 2" instead of 2½" metal, blinding with ground whinstone or granite, and rolling with a steam roller ? (A.) Yes, that makes a more complete and rapid road.’

“ It might have been otherwise if the Master of Works had merely ordered ordinary repairs, such as the pursuers might have executed at their own hand, and charged the defenders with a proportion of the expense ; and if the repairs ordered had been the same in character, though slightly more expensive than the work originally done, the defenders might still have been bound to contribute. But here the character of the work ordered is materially different, as is well shewn by contrasting the cost of the new water-channels, £150, with the expense of repairing the old ones, £13. Whether the pursuers in another action may succeed in recovering any part of the expense, I do not think I am called upon to say, as the action is not raised to try that question, and no evidence has been led as to the causes of the disrepair, or as to the parties who were responsible for the openings in the road to which the disrepair seems to be confined or mainly due. The work now required is made compulsory by super-venient legislation, by which, in such cases, it has been repeatedly held that obligants in clauses of relief are not bound. As illustrations in point, I may refer to the cases of Scott v. Edmond, 12 D. 1077, and Dunbar's Trustees, 5 R. (H. of L.) 221.”

ing the situation or dimensions of that road. Now, nothing had been done during the eighteen years that had elapsed since the road was formed to keep it in a proper state of repair; and what the pursuers proposed to do was to put it into a state of thorough repair in accordance with the methods now considered right in the case of such roads. They did not propose to alter the character of the road, but merely to repair it, and the cost of doing so fairly fell under the obligation in the disposition of 1875, although it might be somewhat greater than was necessary barely to restore the road to its original state. The defenders were not asked to pay for something of which they did not reap the benefit, for not only had they contributed nothing towards the maintenance in the past, but they would for the future be released from the obligation to maintain under the disposition.

Argued for the defenders;—Under the present summons the pursuers did not call on the defenders to contribute towards such sum as might be found to be necessary to repair the road as it was originally formed. What the pursuers asked for was that the road should be reformed according to the requirements of the Glasgow Master of Works. But the liability of the defenders depended on the obligation of 1875, which said nothing about the Glasgow Police Acts, and it could not well be assumed that in 1875 the parties had in view the possibility of Maryhill being annexed to Glasgow. In order to succeed therefore the pursuers must shew that the works which they proposed to execute were such as could have been charged pro tanto against the defenders, under the disposition of 1875, if the pursuers had executed the works of their own initiative. In this, on the evidence, they had failed.

LORD TRAYNER.—In 1875 the pursuers or their predecessors, the trustees of the late Sir George Campbell, granted a disposition of a piece of ground situated at or near Maryhill to Mr Walker, under which the disponee acquired right, not only to the ground disposed, but also to the use of a certain road and footpath (which had been made at the expense of the disponents) as an access to said ground. The disposition contained a provision to the effect that (for a certain time) the disponee and his assignees should be bound to pay to the disponents “a proportion of the expense of maintaining” the said road and footpath; and the present action is brought for the purpose of having it declared that the defenders are liable in respect of that obligation to make payment of a proportion of the expense attending the execution of works upon said road ordered by the municipal authorities of Glasgow. The defenders are (1) Mr Law, who is vested as proprietor in a part of the land so disposed under a singular title flowing from Mr Walker; and (2) the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, who are in possession of part of said land as heritable creditors under a security title granted by Mr Walker.

It appears that in 1891 the municipal boundaries of Glasgow were extended so as to include the burgh of Maryhill, within which the said road and footpath are situated; and that in December of that year a notice was served on the pursuers by the Master of Works, acting under and in terms of the Glasgow Police Acts, calling upon them to execute certain works (described in cond. 6) on said road and footpath, which are rather of the character of reforming the road than merely maintaining it, and which would have the effect of greatly improving its condition. The pursuers are, undoubtedly, in the first place, the parties bound to obtemper the order or notice of the Master of Works, and so far as appears from anything that has been said, the only parties to whom the Master of Works could validly issue his order or notice. But admitting this, the pursuers maintain that under the provision I have referred to, contained in the original conveyance, the defenders, as assignees of Mr Walker, are liable in a proportion of the expense to be incurred in the execution of the works which the Master of Works has required to be executed. The defenders maintain that their obligation as Mr Walker's assignees does not cover or extend to the execution of such works as are now required to be performed, which are, they contend, neither of the character nor within the description of those contemplated by the disposition. The Lord Ordinary has sustained this defence, and in my opinion rightly sustained it. The only obligation on Mr Walker or his assignees was to pay a proportion of the expense of "maintaining" the road and footpath; and there does not appear to me to be any difficulty in ascertaining what that obligation means or imposes. The road, which was a country road at the date of the disposition, used as an access to the pursuers' feus, was to be maintained in its then character and state of efficiency. But what is now to be done, and for a proportion of the expense of which the defenders are sought to be made liable, is something of an entirely different description. The road is now to be covered with whinstone metal, with new water-channels of square dressed stone put down at the side of the footpath, which really is to make this road into a proper street within the city, and not in any sense to maintain it as a country road such as it was in 1875. That this is so is sufficiently evidenced by the pursuers' averment, which is, that "upon this being done the roadway will be taken over by the town, and thereafter upheld by it." The parties to the disposition of 1875 could not intend the obligation there expressed to cover such a radical change, because in 1875 it was not contemplated that a road in or near Maryhill would become a Glasgow street. Besides, the obligation in question is not to pay or relieve the pursuers from the payment of a burden laid upon them by statute, and arising under statute subsequent to the date of the obligation. On this ground I should have been disposed to have sustained the defenders' first plea in law, viz., that the action is irrelevant, for there is no averment by the pursuers that the defenders are liable to relieve them of an obligation imposed on them by statute such as is set forth in the conclusions of the summons. But it is sufficient to dispose of the case to sustain the defenders' fourth plea, as the Lord Ordinary has done, and I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be affirmed. In disposing of the case on this ground it is unnecessary to notice the special defence urged by the Scottish Union and National Insurance Company, that as encumbrancers only, although in possession, they are not liable for the proprietor's obligations.

Sale—Subsale—Intimation—Arrestment—Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 3.—The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 3, enacts,—“Any seller of goods may attach the same while in his own hands or possession, by arrestment or pointing at any time prior to the date when the sale of such goods to a subsequent purchaser shall have been intimated to such seller, and such arrestment or pointing shall have the same operation and effect in a competition or otherwise as an arrestment or pointing by a third party.”

In January 1891 Ainslie & Company, of Leith, sold to Davis & Company, of London, twenty hogsheads of whisky, which were lying in Ainslie & Company's bonded warehouse at Leith, and gave Davis & Company a delivery-order for the whisky on Anderson, their warehouse-keeper, and Davis & Company sent this delivery-order to Anderson, intimating that they would grant delivery-orders on him for the whisky. Davis & Company paid the price of the whisky to Ainslie & Company.

About a fortnight afterwards Davis & Company sold the whisky to Thomas, and gave him delivery-orders on Anderson. Thomas took delivery of part of the whisky, and sold the remainder to Browne & Company.

In April 1892 Ainslie & Company arrested the whisky which had been sold to Browne & Company, but was still in Ainslie & Company's bonded warehouse, for a debt due to them by Davis & Company.

In an action by Browne & Company against Ainslie & Company for delivery of the whisky, Ainslie & Company pleaded that they were entitled to arrest in virtue of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, sec. 3, the subsales not having been intimated to them within the meaning of the Act.

A proof shewed that the fact of the subsale by Davis & Company of the lot of whisky to one purchaser, who was not named, had been intimated in writing by Davis & Company to Ainslie & Company, and that delivery-orders for part of the whisky in favour of Thomas had been sent to Ainslie & Company prior to the date of the arrestments. It was held proved, further, that Ainslie & Company received verbal intimation from Davis & Company before the arrestment that Thomas was the subvendee. There was no written intimation to Ainslie & Company of the subsale by Thomas to Browne & Company, but it was held proved that Ainslie & Company knew of that subsale. Neither Thomas nor Browne & Company intimated, or authorised anyone to intimate, the subsales to Ainslie & Company.

Held that the arrestments were ineffectual in competition with Browne & Company, per Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Trayner, on the ground that the Act did not require that the intimation of a subsale should be in writing, or that it should be given by, or with the authority of, the subvendee, or that the name of the subvendee should be intimated, and therefore that there had been due intimation to Ainslie & Company of the subsales to Thomas and Browne & Company; per Lord Young, on the ground that Davis & Company having sold the whisky to Thomas, it could not thereafter be attached by the diligence of any creditor of Davis & Company; diss. Lord Rutherford Clark, who held that the Act required intimation of the subsale to be given by, or with the authority of, the subvendee, and that no such intimation having been given to Ainslie & Company, the arrestments at their instance were effectual.

Sale—Subsale—Factors Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 45), sec. 9—Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890 (53 and 54 Vict. cap. 40).—The Factors Act, 1889 (extended to Scotland by the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890), sec. 9, enacts,—“Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of the goods or documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith, and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner."

Ainslie & Company sold certain casks of whisky in their bonded warehouse to Davis & Company, and gave them a delivery-order for the whisky on Anderson. Davis & Company sent the delivery-order to the warehouseman, informing him that they would issue their own delivery-orders on him for the whisky. In an action by Browne & Company, who were subvendees of the whisky, and held Davis & Company's delivery-order, against Ainslie & Company, who declined to give delivery in respect that prior to intimation to them of the subsale they had arrested the whisky in virtue of the 3d section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, question whether Davis & Company were "mercantile agents in possession" of a document of title in the sense of the 9th section of the Factors Act, 1889.

2D DIVISION.
 Ld. Wellwood.

IN November 1892 F. Browne & Company, licensed victuallers, sometime of the Griffin Tavern, Charing Cross, London, Henry James Towell, licensed victualler, of 3 Duke Street, Adelphi, a partner of that firm and as an individual, and Robert Lindsay, chartered accountant, London, trustee on the sequestrated estates of Frederick Browne, the only other partner of Browne & Company, brought an action against James Ainslie & Company, wine and spirit merchants, 201 Leith Walk, Leith, and also against John Anderson, warehouse-keeper, 23 Bond, Wet Docks, Leith, concluding for delivery of six hogsheads of Scotch whisky, of specified numbers, alleged to belong to the pursuers, and to be lying in 23 Bond under the charge of Anderson, the pursuers always paying duty and storage-dues before delivery, and failing delivery, for payment of £150, as the value of the whisky.

The pursuers stated that, in the beginning of 1891, Davis, Strange, & Barker, wine-merchants, then of 4 King William Street, Strand, London, bought a number of hogsheads of special Scotch whisky from the defenders Ainslie & Company, that this whisky was allowed to remain in Ainslie & Company's bonded warehouse, 23 Bond, Wet Docks, Leith, and was entered in the name of Davis, Strange, & Barker in the books of the warehouse owner, who thereafter held it for them; that in February 1891 Davis, Strange, & Barker sold to W. Freeman Thomas, then the proprietor of the Griffin Tavern, inter alia, eight hogsheads of this whisky, the price of which had been paid by Davis, Strange, & Barker to Ainslie & Company; that Thomas paid Davis, Strange, & Barker for the eight hogsheads, and received from them eight delivery-orders, addressed to John Anderson, warehouse-keeper, 23 Bond, Wet Docks, Leith; that "the defenders were well aware of the said subsale, and at the date of the said purchase due intimation was given to the defenders that the said whisky had been sold, and then belonged to Mr Thomas, and that delivery-orders therefor had been handed to him"; that in December 1891 Thomas sold the Griffin Tavern to the pursuers Browne & Company; that "they subsequently purchased from Mr Thomas and paid for the said eight hogsheads of whisky, and he at the same time indorsed and handed over to them the said eight delivery-orders. Intimation of the said sale was duly made to the custodiers of the whisky, who thereafter held for the before-mentioned pursuers." That in February 1892 Browne & Company presented to the defender Anderson two of the delivery-orders for two hogsheads, and obtained delivery of the whisky; but that on 1st April 1892 the defenders declined, and still decline, to give delivery of the remaining six hogsheads. No. 39.

The defenders, in answer, admitted that Davis, Strange, & Barker had, in the beginning of 1891, bought twenty hogsheads of whisky from the defenders Ainslie & Company, and had paid the price to Ainslie & Company, and that the whisky, so far as undelivered, remained in Ainslie & Company's bonded warehouse, but they stated that there were no warehouse books kept in the warehouse in which any transfers could be made. The defenders further averred "that no intimation was given to the defenders that the whisky had been sold to Freeman Thomas, or that delivery-orders had been handed to him for the whisky in dispute. The pursuers are called on to produce a copy of the writing on which they rely as constituting an intimation of said sale to the pursuers, or otherwise to specify by whom and in what manner the alleged intimation was made"; and they also "specially denied that there was any intimation of a sale by Thomas to the pursuers of the eight hogsheads" until April 1892. "Previous to said intimation the defenders had arrested the said hogsheads in their own hands, in terms of the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1856,* on the dependence of an action at their instance against Davis, Strange, & Barker, for the sum of £806, 1s. 6d. due by them to the defenders. Said arrestment being prior to the intimation of the delivery-orders in question, the defenders are entitled to retain the said goods in satisfaction pro tanto of their claim against the said Davis, Strange, & Barker." With reference to the delivery of the two hogsheads in February 1892, the defenders denied that Browne & Company presented the delivery-orders for these hogsheads. "Explained that the delivery-orders for these two hogsheads were handed personally to Mr Ainslie, when in London in January 1892, by Davis, Strange, & Barker, who requested that these hogsheads should be forwarded to them duty paid, and this was accordingly done."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers Browne & Company having bought and paid for the said whisky, and having had the said delivery-orders indorsed to them, and having duly intimated the said sale prior to the date of the defenders' arrestments as condescended on, are entitled to decree in terms of one or other of the alternative conclusions of the summons. (2) The subsale of the goods in question to Mr Freeman Thomas having been duly intimated to the defenders prior to the date of their arrestments, the same are inept, and the pursuers are entitled to decree. (3) In any event, the defenders being well aware of the subsales condescended on, or one or other of them, were not entitled to arrest the goods

* The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), sec. 2, enacts,—“Where a purchaser of goods, who has not obtained delivery thereof, shall after the passing of this Act sell the same, the purchaser from him or any other subsequent purchaser shall be entitled to demand that delivery of the said goods shall be made to him and not to the original purchaser; and the seller, on intimation being made to him of such subsequent sale, shall be bound to make such delivery on payment of the price of such goods, or performance of the obligations or conditions of the contract of sale, and shall not be entitled in any question with a subsequent purchaser or others in his right to retain the said goods for any separate debt or obligation alleged to be due to such seller by the original purchaser. . . .”

Section 3 enacts,—“Any seller of goods may attach the same while in his own hands or possession, by arrestment or pouding at any time prior to the date when the sale of such goods to a subsequent purchaser shall have been intimated to such seller, and such arrestment or pouding shall have the same operation and effect in a competition or otherwise as an arrestment or pouding by a third party.”

No. 39. in their own hands. The pursuers also stated the following additional pleas;—(1) The goods in question having, as in a question between the pursuers as subpurchasers and the defenders, been delivered by the defenders to Davis, Strange, & Barker, the arrestment founded on by the defenders is inept. (2) In respect that the goods in question were all along, or at least from 22d January 1891, held by the defenders for and on behalf of Davis, Strange, & Barker, the latter were, in terms of the Act 52 and 53 Victoria, chapter 45,* in possession of the same, and the arrestment founded on is inept.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The alleged subsale of the goods in question to Mr Freeman Thomas or to the pursuers not having been intimated to the defenders prior to the date of the arrestments of said goods in their hands, they are entitled to be assolizied, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect:—

In the end of 1890 Davis, Strange, & Barker, whose only place of business was in London, but who were desirous of appearing as Scotch dealers in whisky, entered into communications with Ainslie & Company for that purpose. As explained in the evidence of Mr Davis, of Davis, Strange, & Barker,—“We desired that our name and not his [Ainslie’s] should appear, so as to facilitate business. We wanted to pose as Scotch whisky merchants, having residence in Scotland.” Ainslie & Company

* The Factors Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict. cap. 45) (extended to Scotland by the Act 53 and 54 Vict. cap. 40), section 1, subsection 2, enacts,—“A person shall be deemed to be in possession of goods, or of the document of title to goods, where the goods or documents are in his actual custody or are held by any other person subject to his control or for him or on his behalf.”

Section 1, subsection 4, enacts,—“The expression ‘document of title’ shall include any bill of lading, dock-warrant, warehouse-keeper’s certificate, and warrant or order for the delivery of goods, and any other documents used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising or purporting to authorise, either by indorsement or by delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented.”

Section 2, subsection (1) enacts,—“Where a mercantile agent is, with the consent of the owner, in possession of goods, or of the documents of title to goods, any sale, pledge, or other disposition of the goods, made by him when acting in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, be as valid as if he were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make the same; provided that the person taking under the disposition acts in good faith, and has not at the time of the disposition notice that the person making the disposition has not authority to make the same.”

Section 9 enacts,—“Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of the goods or the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by that person, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, or under any agreement for sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith, and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner.”

Section 10 enacts,—“Where a document of title to goods has been lawfully transferred to a person as a buyer or owner of the goods, and that person transfers the document to a person who takes the document in good faith and for valuable consideration, the last-mentioned transfer shall have the same effect for defeating any vendor’s lien or right of stoppage in transitu as the transfer of a bill of lading has for defeating the right of stoppage in transitu.”

agreed to this. On 17th December 1890 Mr Ainslie, the sole partner of the firm, wrote to Davis, Strange, & Barker,—“I shall only be too pleased to do your Scotch whisky business for you. . . . Casks can be marked with your firm's name and address, and bottlings with your label. My firm's name will not appear in any way.” In pursuance of this agreement Ainslie & Company arranged to supply Davis, Strange, & Barker with a special blend of whisky, to be termed “The Highland Dirk Blend” of Scotch whisky, and they also arranged for the printing of special labels, on which Davis, Strange, & Barker were described as the sole proprietors of “The Highland Dirk Blend.” Davis, Strange, & Barker further sent a large number of copies of a circular to Ainslie & Company, which were posted by Ainslie & Company in Leith.

Brown & Co.
v. Ainslie & Co.

In January 1891 Davis, Strange, & Barker bought twenty hogsheads of Highland Dirk Whisky from Ainslie & Company. On 21st January they wrote to Ainslie & Company,—“We have been very successful to-day in opening one of the largest accounts in the whisky trade in London, with one of our richest publicans, the owner of several houses, who has hitherto never bought your whisky under any brand. We have sold him this lot of whisky . . . Can you send us separate warrants for each hhd., or have we to sign delivery-orders ourselves, and if we have to give them, on whom do we have to make them on? Of course such a man as this wants a tangible document.” It was not disputed that this letter referred to a sale by Davis, Strange, & Barker of the twenty hogsheads just mentioned to W. Freeman Thomas of the Griffin Tavern, Charing Cross, but Thomas' name was not mentioned in the letter.

Ainslie & Company replied on 22d January,—“We are in receipt of your favour of 21st inst., and are very pleased to see you have secured such a good order, and we must say it shews very good salesmanship on your part. We will mark off the 20 hhds. in our books in your name, and hold them to your order; and we will stamp the casks with your name, and you can issue a delivery-order to your customer, made out upon John Anderson, warehouse-keeper, No. 23 Bond, Wet Docks, Leith.” The casks were stamped accordingly.

Again on 27th January Ainslie & Company wrote to Davis, Strange, & Barker enclosing an invoice for the whisky, together with a delivery-order for the same,* and adding,—“If you desire separate warrants for each hhd., you can either issue them yourselves upon Mr Anderson, or we will send you them, just as you may wish.”

Davis, Strange, & Barker replied on 29th January,—“We will draw our own separate delivery-orders on Mr Anderson.”

On 9th February they again wrote,—“Have we to deposit your delivery-order for twenty hhds. on Mr Anderson, as we have issued twenty separate d/orders (form enclosed) for the twenty hhds.?”

* The delivery-order was in the following terms:—

“Delivery Order No. 1078.

“To Mr John Anderson, Warehouse-keeper,
No. 23 Customs Bond, Wet Docks, Leith.

“Leith, 27th January 1891.

“Please deliver in bond, to the order of Messrs Davis, Strange, & Barker, London, the undernoted (20) twenty hhds. Highland Dirk special Scotch whisky, Nos. 1/62 to 20/81, and oblige.

“JAMES AINSLIE & Co.”

No. 39.

Browne & Co.
v. Ainslie &
Co.

The form of the delivery-orders is given below,* and it appeared that twenty of these forms signed by Davis, Strange, & Barker were filled up in favour of "W. Freeman Thomas, Esq.," and dated 5th February 1891, each order being for the delivery of a hogshead of the whisky denoted by its number.

Ainslie & Company replied on the 10th,—“The d/order form, we think, is very nice indeed. You should lodge the d/o. which you have with the warehouse-keeper”; and again on 25th March they wrote,—“Regarding d/orders, it is unnecessary for us to issue same; all that is required is for you to issue your own d/orders made out upon our bonded warehouse-keeper, Mr J. Anderson.”

The Mr Anderson mentioned in these letters was the defender Anderson. It was not disputed that he was the servant of Ainslie & Company, at a weekly wage, and that they were lessees of the warehouse of which he had the charge; but there was a conflict of evidence as to whether these facts were known to Davis, Strange, & Barker at the time of these transactions. Ainslie deponed that he had verbally informed Strange as to Anderson's position in December 1890. Strange was not examined as a witness, and both Davis and Barker deponed that they understood that Anderson was a public warehouseman, and that the warehouse was a public warehouse. Anderson deponed,—“I keep no books in the stores except a small memorandum book for my own guidance. . . . I never effect any transfers of stock in my book; anything of that kind is done in the office.”

On 13th April Davis, Strange, & Barker sent the following letter to Anderson addressed to No. 23 Bond, Wet Dock, Leith,—“We beg to enclose you Messrs James Ainslie & Company's delivery-order on you for twenty hhds. Scotch whisky, $1/62 to 20/81, 'Highland Dirk,' special. We have now issued our own delivery-orders on you for these and other whiskies bonded in your warehouse in our name by Messrs Ainslie & Company.” The delivery-order is that given above, p. 177.

The first delivery under this arrangement took place in September 1891, being effected as follows:—On 25th September Davis, Strange, & Barker wrote to Ainslie & Company enclosing two of the delivery-orders in favour of Freeman Thomas, and indorsed by him, and requesting Ainslie & Company to clear the whisky out of bond, and to forward it to themselves and not to Thomas, and this was done accordingly. Davis and Barker deponed that the reason why the delivery-orders were sent to Ainslie & Company and not to Anderson was that it had been arranged that Ainslie & Company should advance money necessary to clear the whisky out of bond.

Ainslie deponed that until the receipt of these delivery-orders he had had no information as to the name of any subvendee in connection with the twenty hogsheads. Both Barker and Davis deponed that at a meeting with the partners of their firm in London in February 1891 Ainslie was told that the whole twenty hogsheads had been sold to Freeman Thomas. Ainslie deponed that at this meeting Thomas' name was not mentioned.

In November 1891 two other hogsheads were delivered to Thomas through Ainslie & Company and Davis, Strange, & Barker, as on the former occasion. No. 89.

The four hogsheads thus delivered were the only hogsheads of the twenty received by Freeman Thomas. He had in July 1891 returned eight delivery-orders to Davis, Strange, & Barker, and the eight hogsheads corresponding to these orders were ultimately taken back by Ainslie & Company upon a single delivery-order in their favour granted by Davis, Strange, & Barker. Nov. 28, 1892.
Browne & Co.
v. Ainslie & Co.

In December 1891 Thomas sold the Griffin Tavern and stock therein to Browne & Company, and some weeks afterwards indorsed and transferred to them the eight delivery-orders still in his hands.

In January 1892, at a meeting in London with the partners of Davis, Strange, & Barker, Ainslie declined to forward any further whisky until the amount of the balance against Davis, Strange, & Barker with him was reduced, but ultimately agreed to do so on condition that Davis, Strange, & Barker sent him their customer's cheque for the duty. Ainslie accordingly sent two delivery-orders indorsed by Freeman Thomas to his firm directing them (as requested by Davis, Strange, & Barker) to forward the whisky to Davis, Strange, & Barker, which was done. Davis and Barker deponed that at this meeting they informed Ainslie of the sale of the Griffin business to Browne & Company. Ainslie deponed that no such information was given to him, and that he only learned that Browne & Company were the purchasers of two of the hogsheads by seeing their name on the cheque which he received some days afterwards.

On 9th March 1892 Ainslie & Company arrested in their own hands the remaining six hogsheads.

On 1st April Browne & Company intimated to Anderson that they held delivery-orders for these hogsheads. Ainslie & Company in reply intimated that they claimed them in virtue of the arrestments.

Freeman Thomas was not examined as a witness, and there was no evidence that he had intimated or authorised anyone to intimate to Ainslie & Company that the whisky had been sold to him by Davis, Strange, & Barker. Mr Towell, a partner of Browne & Company, deponed that they first came to know that Davis, Strange, & Barker had anything to do with the whisky when they wanted to clear the two hogsheads in January 1892, and that they first heard of Ainslie & Company through Ainslie & Company intimating that they had arrested the whisky.

On 30th March 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Repels the defences: Decerns and ordains the defenders to deliver up to the pursuers the six hogsheads special Scotch whisky, numbered 7/68, 8/69, 9/70, 10/71, 11/72, and 12/73, belonging to the pursuers, lying in No. 23 Bond Warehouse, Wet Docks, Leith, belonging to and occupied by the defenders James Ainslie & Company, and under charge of the defender John Anderson, the pursuers always before delivery paying the duty and storage-dues for the said whisky, and that within twenty-one days from the date hereof, reserving to the pursuers in the event of the defenders failing so to deliver the said six hogsheads to the pursuers, to move for decree in terms of the petitory conclusions of the summons. . . ."

* "OPINION.— . . . To judge from the correspondence, I should be inclined to say that the defenders represented Anderson to be an independent warehouseman. The only expression which militates against that view is that in one letter the word 'our,' an ambiguous expression, is used. But assuming

v. Ainalie &

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) If the defenders otherwise came within the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, it would take a strong that Davis, Strange, & Barker knew that Anderson was the defenders' servant, the result of these proceedings was that the defenders, to oblige their customers, consented to efface or eliminate themselves, and to allow Davis, Strange, & Barker to pose as a Leith house, and as having both the property and possession of the whisky. The defenders thus enabled Davis, Strange, & Barker to represent themselves to customers as owners of the whisky. The result was, that any customers dealing with Davis, Strange, & Barker, and receiving delivery-orders on John Anderson in the terms which I have mentioned, were led to suppose, and were entitled to suppose, that Davis, Strange, & Barker had the full right of property in the whisky, and that John Anderson, named in the delivery-orders, simply held for them either as their servant or as an independent warehouseman. They had no reason to suppose that behind Davis, Strange, & Barker were the defenders, claiming the right as sellers, who had not delivered the whisky sold, to retain and arrest in their own hands for a general balance due by Davis, Strange, & Barker. I am therefore of opinion that on this ground alone the defenders are barred in a question with a purchaser from Davis, Strange, & Barker from founding on an arrestment used by them in their own hands. I do not mean to imply that the arrangement which they made with Davis, Strange, & Barker was fraudulent, although the defender Mr Ainslie admits that he never had to do with such a transaction before. But by allowing Davis, Strange, & Barker to hold themselves out as owners of the whisky, and as coming in place of the defenders themselves, the defenders are barred on equitable grounds, which are recognised both here and in England, from setting up any such right, the rule being that one who enables another to induce third parties to deal with him on the faith of false or erroneous representations as to his rights and position with regard to property or goods is held to the truth of such representations.

"The Scotch cases of Pochin v. Robinson, 7 Macph. 622, and Vickers v. Hertz, 9 Macph. (H. L.) 65, and L. R., 2 H. L. Cases, 115, may be referred to as shewing the tendency of Scotch law in such cases, and there are many English decisions illustrative of the doctrine of estoppel which proceed upon the same principle. The present seems to me to be a stronger case for the application of the principle than the case of Vickers v. Hertz, because while in the latter case Mr Vickers, by handing to his agents, Campbell Brothers, a delivery-order with his own name appearing on it as indorser, enabled them, contrary to his intention, to commit a fraud by indorsing the warrant to Hertz instead of selling on his (Vickers') account, the defenders here allowed, and indeed advised, Davis, Strange, & Barker to issue delivery-orders in their own name—the defenders' name not appearing on the documents at all, and Davis, Strange, & Barker being falsely described as merchants in Leith—for the very purpose of the latter holding themselves out as the real owners of the whisky, and securing purchasers on that footing.

"In this view of the case, it is perhaps not necessary for the pursuers to invoke the assistance of the Factors Act, 1889, 52 and 53 Vict. c. 45, which was extended to Scotland by an Act passed in 1890, being 53 and 54 Vict. c. 40. The material parts of the Act of 1889 are the following:—[His Lordship quoted the sections given supra, p. 176.]

"The application of those provisions to the present case is this,—The defenders gave Davis, Strange, and Barker possession of the documents of title to the whisky by sending them the delivery-warrant for twenty hogsheads, No. 44 of process, and allowing them to issue delivery-orders on Anderson in their own name. In terms of the Factors Act, the transfer of the documents of title by Davis, Strange, & Barker to Freeman Thomas had precisely the same effect as if Davis, Strange, & Barker were mercantile agents for the defenders, and in possession of the goods or documents of title with their consent.

"If these views are sound, it is not necessary to decide whether the subsale by Davis, Strange, & Barker to Freeman Thomas was intimated to the defen-

case of personal bar to exclude them from the Act. Here, however, no case of personal bar had been either averred or established. The defenders had done nothing which they were not entitled to do. If the delivery-order had been on themselves there could have been no objection, and it made no difference that the order was on Anderson, their servant. The pursuers at least could take no advantage from the plea of personal bar. They knew nothing either of Davis, Strange, & Barker or of the defenders, when they bought from Thomas. (2) Was the subsale by Davis, Strange, & Barker to Thomas intimated to the defenders within the meaning of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act? It was not. The intimation required by the Act must be by or on behalf of the subpurchaser. The intimation must be such as would bar the original seller from delivering to the original purchaser, it must be such as would bar the creditors of the original buyer from doing diligence, and it must be such as would make the original seller hold for a particular subpurchaser, thereby preventing another subpurchaser from coming forward and demanding delivery of the subject. The subpurchaser, in short, must put himself into a contract relation with the original seller. A mere casual mention of a subsale by the subeller never could produce these results. Upon the proof, it was doubtful whether the defenders knew more than the fact of the subsale. The letter of 21st January did not mention Thomas's name, although no doubt they came to know that Thomas had an interest in the whisky. Assuming, however, that they knew of the subsale to Thomas, it was not suggested that there had been intimation by or with the authority of Thomas. The arrestments therefore were effectual under the Act, for there could be no doubt that the whisky remained in the hands of the defenders. (3) The Factors Act did not apply here. The principle of the Act was this. If a man, entrusted with goods or with a document of title, abused his trust, then it was the truster rather than an innocent third party who must bear any loss that occurred. But Davis, Strange, & Barker did not get possession of the whisky, nor did they transact with Thomas on the faith of any document of title granted by the defenders. Thomas knew nothing about the delivery-order granted by the defenders.

Argued for the pursuers;—(1) The Lord Ordinary had rightly held that the defenders were barred by their conduct from taking advantage of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. The defenders led Thomas and also the pursuers to believe that Davis, Strange, & Barker alone sold the ders so as to exclude their arrestment of the goods in their own hands. On the one hand there was no intimation of the subsale by the subpurchaser direct to Anderson or Ainslie & Company before the date of the arrestment. But, on the other hand, (1) the defenders, in January 1891, were informed that the twenty hogsheads had been sold by Davis, Strange, & Barker to one purchaser; (2) they subsequently learned that Freeman Thomas was the purchaser; and further (3), they received and acknowledged delivery-orders in his favour, and indorsed by him for part of his purchase; and (4) subsequently they were apprised of the sale by Thomas to Browne and Towell.

"It is an arguable question whether these facts may not be held as equi-pollents for regular intimation by the subpurchaser, keeping in view that the question arises, not between competing subpurchasers from Davis, Strange, & Barker, but between one subpurchaser and the defenders themselves. Here there was more than mere private knowledge of the subsale, as the defenders, by acting on the delivery-orders in favour of Thomas and Browne and Towell, in a way recognised the subsale.

"I do not, however, find it necessary to decide this point. I prefer to rest my judgment on the grounds formerly stated."

No. 39. whisky, therefore it was not open to the defenders to come forward and plead rights which they had intentionally concealed. At all events (2) the defenders had had intimation of the subsale to Thomas. The Act did not specify any particular form of intimation, nor did it require that the intimation should be by the subpurchaser, or that the name of the subpurchaser should be intimated, or that the intimation should be in writing. Here undoubtedly the defenders knew that there had been a subsale,—the letter of 21st January put that beyond question. Then the evidence was to the effect that they were told that Thomas was the subpurchaser. That being so, there had been intimation of the subsale in the sense of the Act. (3) The Factors Act applied. The pursuers admitted that they did not get a document of title granted by the defenders, but they got a document of title which had been granted “with consent of the seller.” That was enough under the Act.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts of this case are somewhat peculiar. Towards the end of 1890 a firm of the name of Davis, Strange, & Barker, who were then wine-merchants in London, purchased from the defenders Messrs James Ainslie & Company twenty hogsheads of whisky for the purpose of selling to customers in London if they could find such. With a view, presumably, to the better prospect of effecting sales they desired to pose as a Scotch firm carrying on business in Leith, and they accordingly entered into arrangements with the defenders, whereby the defenders agreed to mark the whisky casks with Davis, Strange, & Barker’s name and address, and to label any quantity bottled with the same name. They also received from that firm a quantity of their circulars to customers, and posted them for them in Leith, so as to keep up the fiction that they carried on business there. These circulars were posted on 19th January 1892, and on 21st January Davis, Strange, & Barker wrote to the defenders stating that they had sold to a customer “this lot of whisky.” To this the defenders replied by return, expressing satisfaction that Davis, Strange, & Barker had secured such a good order, and stating that they would mark off the twenty hogsheads in their books in Davis, Strange, & Barker’s name, and stamp them with their name, thus plainly intimating that the “lot of whisky” referred to in their correspondents’ letter consisted of the whole twenty hogsheads bought from them. The letter further stated, in answer to a query, that their correspondent could issue delivery-orders “to your customer” upon one John Anderson, warehouse-keeper in Leith. It was afterwards arranged that the defenders’ delivery-order in favour of Davis, Strange, & Barker should be lodged with Anderson, and that that firm should issue their own delivery-orders for the hogsheads as these might be required. These delivery-orders bore to be issued by Davis, Strange, & Barker as a Leith house, and were addressed to John Anderson, warehouse-keeper. Labels were also prepared and issued with the knowledge of the defenders, in which Davis, Strange, & Barker were entered as Leith merchants, and designated as “sole proprietors of the Highland Dirk blend whisky.”

Within a few days of these arrangements being completed, Mr Ainslie went to London and saw certain members of the firm of Davis, Strange, & Barker. As to what passed between them there is a sharp conflict of evidence. The witnesses for the pursuers depone that at their interviews Mr Ainslie was distinctly informed that Mr Freeman Thomas was the customer who had purchased the whisky, and Mr Ainslie was told who he was, and where he carried on business.

Mr Ainalie, on the other hand, denies altogether that anything of the kind took place. My view upon the proof is that the evidence for the pursuers must be accepted on this branch of the case.

No. 39.
Nov. 23, 1893.
Browne & Co.
v. Ainalie &
Co.

After this time and during 1891 several deliveries of the whisky took place, the whisky being given out by Anderson on delivery-orders issued by Davis, Strange, & Barker in favour of Freeman Thomas. In July 1891 eight hogsheads of the whisky were tendered back to the defenders by a delivery-order of Davis, Strange, & Barker on Anderson, Mr Freeman Thomas having not wished to carry out his purchase as regarded them, but no question turns upon these.

It is quite certain that the defenders knew long before the end of 1891 who the purchaser from Davis, Strange, & Barker was, for in September of that year he is spoken of by the defenders by name as being the purchaser.

In December 1891 Freeman Thomas sold six hogsheads still remaining in Anderson's store to Davis, Strange, & Barker's order to Browne & Company, now represented by the present pursuers, and the pursuers allege that Mr Ainalie was informed of this sale very shortly after it took place, but Mr Ainalie positively denies this. It may not be of consequence in the case which is right on this matter, but I am satisfied that he was told.

The financial position of Davis, Strange, & Barker having become very doubtful, the defenders arrested the six hogsheads as being in their own hands in security of a general balance due to them, and it is the validity of this arrestment which has to be decided in the present action.

The right of the defenders so to arrest arises under the provisions of the 3d section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act of 1856, and turns upon the question whether the goods purchased from them being still in their "own hands or possession" at the time of arrestment, the exception to the right to arrest applies, viz., that "the sale of such goods to a subsequent purchaser shall have been intimated to such seller." The statute does not specify any way or form in which intimation must be made, nor does it state by whom intimation must be made to be effectual. It does not require it to be written or prescribe any particulars. "Intimated" is the only word used, and it depends on what may be included in that word whether the pursuers or defenders are to prevail. The pursuers maintain that it is proved that Davis, Strange, & Barker intimated the sale by them to Freeman Thomas, and that that intimation having been made before the date of the arrestment by the defenders, the right of the defenders to arrest under the statute thereby came to an end. The defenders maintain that as matter of fact there was no intimation, and that even if there were held to be an intimation, such intimation being only by Davis, Strange, & Barker, could not set up the exception contained in the statute, so as to render the arrestment at a subsequent date inoperative. I have already said that in point of fact I am satisfied intimation was given by Davis, Strange, & Barker, but the other question is one which I cannot help feeling to be of considerable nicety and difficulty. But giving it the best consideration I can, I have come to the conclusion that the intimation of the subsale by the original purchaser, to the defender, constitutes intimation under the statute. Given a bona fide subsale, on which the original seller would have been bound to give delivery on intimation if there had been no arrestment, I am unable to see ground for holding that such intimation cannot be given by the subvender, so as to fulfil the statutory requirement, by whom in the natural course of things

No. 39. the intimation would be made. In this case the original seller had the conditions of his contract fulfilled by payment of the price by the vendee, and that
Nov. 28, 1893. vendee, on his becoming subvender, intimated the subsale to the original Browne & Co. vender. In doing so, I think that the statutory requirement was fulfilled so as
v. Ainalie & to exclude the original vender from using arrestment for a general balance
Co. against the vendee, and thus preventing the subvender from obtaining fulfilment of his contract.

This being a sufficient ground of judgment, I do not enter into a consideration of the clauses of the Factors Act referred to by the Lord Ordinary, the application of which to the facts of this case seems to me to be more than doubtful.

LORD YOUNG.—I agree with what your Lordship has said as to the facts of the case. The question is as to the validity of an arrestment by the defenders to the effect of depriving the pursuers of their right as purchasers of the goods which they undoubtedly bought and paid for. We have here three sales. Browne & Company, of the Griffin Tavern, the pursuers, bought from Thomas, who bought from Davis, Strange, & Barker, who bought from the defenders Ainalie & Company. I should state my view of the case more easily by taking only two of the sales, that is the sale by Ainalie to Davis, Strange, & Barker, and the sale by Davis, Strange, & Barker either to Thomas or to Browne & Company.

The whisky which Davis, Strange, & Barker bought from Ainalie & Company either was at the time of the purchase, or was in consequence of the purchase, deposited in a bonded warehouse. The casks containing it were stamped and branded with the name of Davis & Company. The bonded warehouse was kept by a man named Anderson, who was designed as the keeper of the warehouse. There is a question of fact which, in my view, is one of no importance, but there is evidence about it, as to whether Davis & Company was informed that Ainalie & Company, the defenders, were lessees of the bonded warehouse, and the employers of the keeper of the bonded warehouse. It would be a strange thing, in my opinion, and altogether inadmissible, for the right of a purchaser to depend in any way upon an inquiry as to who was the lessee of a building used and occupied as a bonded warehouse, but upon the evidence, if anyone should think it a question of material importance, I may say that I am of opinion that Davis & Company had no reason to know or suspect that Ainalie & Company were the lessees of the building so used and occupied. I believe Davis' testimony to the effect that he had no such knowledge or suspicion, but it is undoubtedly the fact—although in my judgment a totally immaterial fact—that Ainalie & Company were lessees of the building and employers of Anderson, the keeper of the bonded warehouse.

The spirits which were sold were deposited in that bonded warehouse in casks stamped with Davis & Company's name, addressed and set aside for them, and it was the intention of Ainalie & Company to put Davis & Company into the position of the owners of the whisky deposited in the bonded warehouse, and the possession which was given to them is what I think, at the common law, as well as under the Factors Act, may be called possession under a document of title. I look at the Act for the statement of what a document of title is under the Act, the main purpose of which was to protect purchasers against their rights as purchasers being disappointed by the interposition of other parties. The definition of a document of title for the purposes of the Act is, No. 39.

 in my opinion, a good definition of such a title at the common law. I read it, Nov. 28, 1893.
 —“The expression ‘document of title’ shall include any bill of lading, dock-warrant, warehouse-keeper’s certificate, and warrant or order for the delivery of Browne & Co. v. Ainalie & Co.
 goods, and any other document used in the ordinary course of business as proof of the possession or control of goods, or authorising, or purporting to authorise either by the indorsement or by delivery, the possessor of the document to transfer or receive goods thereby represented.” In this particular case it was the contract between Davis & Company and Ainalie & Company that Davis & Company should be put in the position of owners of twenty hogsheads of whisky deposited in this bonded warehouse, and should be put in possession of such a document of title as is described in the clause of the statute I have read—should be put in possession of a document of title authorising by indorsement or delivery the transfer of the goods. It appears from the correspondence that it was a question with Davis originally whether they should have from Ainalie separate warrants for each of the twenty hogsheads—that is, a separate document of title for each, or a general order for delivery of the whole, which would enable them to issue their own documents of title to the purchaser of the hogsheads. They bring that under Ainalie & Company’s notice in a letter of 21st January 1891, in which they intimate that they have sold the whisky which they had bought from Ainalie & Company. In that letter Davis & Company say,—“Can you send us separate warrants for each hogshead, or have we to sign delivery-orders ourselves, and if we have to give them, on whom do we have to make them on? Of course such a man as this wants a tangible document.” The expression is significant, “a tangible document,” that is, just such a document as is described, and the effect of which is expressed in the clause of the statute which I have read. The answer is dated 22d January. In their letter Ainalie & Company say,—“We will mark off twenty hogsheads in our books in your name, and hold them to your order, and we will stamp the casks with your name, and you can issue delivery-orders to your customers.” That is the course which was followed out. Then in another letter from Ainalie & Company dated 27th January,—“We have now much pleasure in sending invoice for twenty hogsheads, and also warrant for same. . . . If you desire separate warrants for each hogshead, you can either issue them yourself upon Mr Anderson, or we will send you them just as you may wish.” Davis & Company preferred to send their own delivery-orders, which were prepared so as shew they were whisky-dealers in Leith although having a separate establishment in London.

Now, this delivery-order, which Davis & Company received from Ainalie & Company, and which they lodged with the warehouse-keeper, was addressed to “John Anderson, warehouse-keeper, No. 23 Customs Bond, Wet Docks, Leith,” and was in these terms,—“Please deliver in bond, to order of Messrs Davis, Strange, & Barker, London, twenty hogsheads,” and so on. I think that that may be taken as a form of order upon the warehouse-keeper by anyone, whether the lessee of the premises used and occupied as a warehouse or not, to deliver goods in their name, and I think it clear in point of law that such an order could not be cancelled or revoked or qualified without the consent or concurrence of the party who by contract had procured the order. But I refer to it in order to shew that the intention of Ainalie & Company was to do what they were quite entitled to do, namely, to

No. 39.

Browne & Co.
v. Ainslie &
Co.

put Davis & Company into the position of being owners of the whisky contained in the casks stored in their name in the bonded warehouse, and that the order was a document of title to enable them to transfer these goods to any person they pleased. It was intended that they should have something tangible as a document of title with the right of transfer to any purchaser from themselves, and if that was not the position which Davis & Company understood they occupied, their transactions with respect to this whisky would have been dishonest. But it was the position which they occupied, in my clear judgment, and was certainly the position which Ainslie & Company intended they should occupy. Suppose the other alternative had been adopted—that Davis & Company instead of issuing their own orders—that is to say, their own documents of title for each of the twenty hogsheads—had taken from Ainslie & Company separate orders for each of the casks, would that not have been the same thing as Ainslie & Company sending twenty different hogsheads to Davis & Company? I think it would, and in my opinion it makes no difference that Davis & Company issued the delivery-orders themselves in their own name, and in the very form which Ainslie & Company on its being sent to them approved of, instead of having a separate order for each cask from Ainslie & Company. The proposition then is that by arrestment under the Mercantile Law Amendment Act Ainslie & Company could defeat the effect of these delivery-orders which they themselves had granted or authorised to be granted. The pursuers purchased this whisky from Davis & Company, who certainly had Ainslie's authority to sell it, and who gave the pursuers documents of title in the shape of warrants for delivery. But the position of Ainslie & Company is this,—“Davis & Company, the sellers, are debtors of ours, and we will arrest goods which Davis & Company sold to you, as we intended they should, for a debt they owe to us.”

Now, under the common law, irrespective of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act altogether, I do not think that any creditor of Davis and Company could have arrested this whisky which had been sold to the present pursuers, who paid for it and received the documents of title. I say, that under the common law, irrespective of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act altogether, I am satisfied that if Davis & Company had become bankrupt this whisky would not have been passed to their trustee in bankruptcy, and I am satisfied that it was not open to the diligence of any of Davis & Company's creditors for the debt owing by them. Their connection with the whisky had ceased and determined, and in the very way that the sellers to them intended that it should, by their selling it to other purchasers, and giving them the documents of title. Davis & Company had no connection with the whisky after that, and how therefore could it be liable to the diligence of their creditors? That, I say, is at common law. But if there is anything clear at all in the Mercantile Law Amendment Act as to this matter it is that the right of a bona fide purchaser should not be defeated by any diligence of creditors of the seller. It is as a creditor of the seller to the present pursuers—that is, a creditor of Davis & Company—that Ainslie & Company say they have arrested these goods. But the goods are not Davis & Company's, and they are protected against any diligence at the instance of the creditor of the sellers by the very statute on which they found. Let me read the words—“From and after the passing of this Act, where goods have been sold, but the same have not been delivered to the purchaser, and have been allowed to remain in the custody of the seller, it shall not be competent for any creditor of such seller, after the date of such sale, to attach such goods as belonging to the seller by any diligence or process of law, including sequestration, to the effect of preventing the purchaser or others in his right from enforcing delivery of the same." If the arrestment by Ainslie & Company was good, then an arrestment by any other creditor of Davis & Company would have been good, or if Davis & Company had gone bankrupt, as they did, the receiver as they call him in England, or the trustee, as we should call him, would be entitled to attach these goods—they would indeed be attached by process of law. But that is a thing expressly excluded by the Act. The clause is not very happily expressed. The great evil, as it was found under the common law, was that if goods sold, although paid for, were allowed to remain in the custody or possession of the seller, they would pass to his trustee in bankruptcy, or might be attached by any of the creditors of the seller by separate diligence. If the goods were not in the possession of the seller they could not be attached even at common law, and at common law, if a bankrupt had sold goods which were deposited in a bonded warehouse, and had granted a delivery-order to the purchaser who had paid the price, they were not in the custody and possession of the bankrupt. The common law referred only to goods in the custody or possession of the seller. Now, the words in the statute, "in the custody or possession of the seller," are superfluous, and possibly a little misleading unless you attend to the whole object and intention of the provision. It could not mean that they shall be liable to be attached by the creditors of the seller if they are not in his custody or possession, but they shall not be liable to be so attached if they are in his custody or possession. That is simply nonsense. The true meaning is, that if they have not been delivered to the purchaser they shall not be attachable by creditors of the seller, although they might be in his custody or possession. It is a provision to protect a bona fide purchaser against the subject of the purchase being attached for the debt of the seller by reason of the goods remaining in his custody.

But then it is said the arrestment here was under clause 3 of the statute. That clause, I venture to say with great respect to any who may think otherwise, is not very felicitously expressed. The meaning of it is, however, I think not doubtful. It reads—"Any seller of goods may attach the same while in his own hands or possession by arrestment or poinding at any time prior to the date when the sale of such goods to a subsequent purchaser shall have been intimated to such seller, and such arrestment or poinding shall have the same operation and effect in a competition or otherwise as an arrestment or poinding by a third party." That is giving the seller a right to arrest when a third party has a right to arrest for a debt due by the same person. That is clearly the view of the Legislature, and the whole object and intention of the enactment. The Act says,—“You are the possessor of goods which a man who may be the debtor of yourself is entitled to demand delivery of. Your right of retention is abolished, but these goods may be attached in your hands by any third party who is a creditor of the buyer from you by arrestment or poinding, and it is very hard that on account of a technicality that a man cannot arrest goods in his own possession you should be placed at a disadvantage, and therefore we put you in the same position to protect yourselves as that occupied by any third party.” But I have pointed out that no creditor of Davis & Company could have attached these goods—no third party could have attached these goods by arrestment or poinding for a debt of Davis & Company to the pre-

No. 39. judice of the purchaser from Davis & Company. That would have been a violation not only of the common law, but of the expressed provision of the statute. Therefore this arrestment is, in my opinion, altogether out of place. It might have been that there was no sale by Davis & Company. In that case the arrestment or pouding would have been as good by Ainalie & Company in their own hands as by any creditor of Davis & Company. But being sold by Davis & Company, as clearly and distinctly shewn by the document of title, the goods are not arrestable by any creditor of Davis & Company, and would not pass to any trustee of Davis & Company in bankruptcy. I think it is only carrying out the views and intentions of the parties, and the legal effect of what they did, to hold that these goods are the property of Browne & Company, and that they, and they alone, are the creditors for delivery, and that their creditors only can attach these goods. But then we have infelicity of expression here. The seller of goods may arrest the goods at any time prior to the date when the subsale shall have been intimated to him. Of course arrestment after a subsale has been intimated would be bad according to my view, because my view goes further. It is utterly bad, after a subsale has taken place, for the right of a buyer in a subsale to be affected by any debt of the seller to him, or by any creditor of the seller to him. It would be ridiculous to read the statute strictly and literally to mean that if the seller has got intimation of a sale by the buyer, he should not be in the same position as a third party to arrest or poud in his own hand, but if he had not got intimation, he should.

On these grounds, which are really independent of every question except the validity of the arrestment by Ainalie & Company or any other creditor of Davis & Company to disappoint the right of a purchaser from Davis & Company, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right. I agree with your Lordship that not only was it Ainalie's intention that Davis & Company should be in a position to sell to third parties, to give them a document of title, and to give them control of the goods without being exposed to any risk of their attachment by a third party, but also that he certainly knew of the sale to Thomas. I agree that he was informed of the sale, and knew the name of the purchaser, and that, I think, was in law sufficient intimation of the subsale. I do not, however, care to put my judgment upon that; I rather prefer to put it upon the invalidity of any arrestment by a creditor of Davis & Company to the disappointment of a bona fide purchaser for value from Davis & Company.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—This action is directed against Ainalie & Company and John Anderson. But as Anderson is the servant of Ainalie & Company, I shall call Ainalie & Company the defenders.

The whisky to which it relates was sold by the defenders to Davis, Strange, & Barker. It was duly paid for. In February 1891 it was sold by Davis, Strange, & Barker to W. F. Thomas. In December of the same year Thomas sold eight casks to the pursuers, who now demand delivery of six. They have already obtained delivery of two.

The defenders were creditors of Davis, Strange, & Barker on another account. On 9th March 1892 they arrested the whisky in security of the debt due to them, as being "in their own hands or possession," in virtue of the power given to that effect in the Mercantile Law Amendment Act. The question is, whether this arrestment is effectual against the pursuers.

I am of opinion that the whisky remained in the possession of the defenders. No. 39.
 It was in their own private store, of which John Anderson is the storekeeper. Nov. 28, 1893.
 Anderson is the servant of the defenders, and is paid by a weekly wage. It is Browne & Co.
 true that a delivery-order was issued by the defenders against Anderson in favour v. Ainalie & Co.
 of Davis, Strange, & Barker, who, on 13th April 1891, forwarded it to Anderson.
 But as the store belonged to the defenders, and as Anderson was their servant, such an order was not equivalent to delivery. The goods still remained in the possession of the sellers. It is not even said that any transfer was made in the books of the store. In point of fact there was no transfer-book. Anderson merely kept a small memorandum-book for his own guidance. He says,—“ I never effect any transfers of stock in my book ; anything of that kind is always done in the office,”—that is to say, in the office of the defenders. It follows, I think, that the arrestment cannot be objected to on the ground that the goods were not in the hands or possession of the seller.

But no arrestment is legal unless it be used prior to the date “ when the sale of such goods to a subsequent purchaser shall have been intimated to such seller.” It is maintained by the pursuers that the sale to Thomas and to themselves was intimated to the defenders before the arrestment was used. An important question was raised on the meaning of the statute, and I think it right to determine it before I examine the facts on which the intimation is said to depend.

By the common law no one can arrest goods in his own hands. His only remedy is by retention. The Mercantile Law Amendment Act took from the seller the right to retain undelivered goods except for the price, but it gave him a right to arrest them. In other words, it permitted him to attach them for any debt due to him by the purchaser. The right to arrest necessarily presupposes that the purchaser has right to the goods. Otherwise the arrestment would be ineffectual. But the purchaser is not the owner, inasmuch as there has been no delivery. The right which sustains the arrestment must consist in his title to obtain delivery, or, in other words, he must at the time when it is used be creditor in the contract of sale.

Accordingly the statute provides that the arrestment must be used prior to the intimation of a sub-sale,—that is to say, before a subpurchaser is made the creditor for delivery. This is effected by intimation, for by the second section it is provided that the seller on intimation of the sub-sale shall be bound to deliver to the subpurchaser. So long as the original purchaser is creditor for delivery there seems to be no reason why the seller should not have the power to arrest. He is entitled to arrest in respect of the existence of that right, and in the absence of any declaration or indication to the contrary, I think that the right to arrest must remain so long as the right on which it is founded continues to exist.

Accordingly, I read the words “ intimated ” and “ intimation ” as they occur in the statute in their ordinary legal sense as applied to moveable rights. Intimation is the process by which the right of the cedent is completed in the person of the assignee. A subvendee is the assignee of the original purchaser, and his right is completed by intimation to the seller. Until that be done there is no contract relation between him and the seller, and the latter is under no obligation to deliver to him. Indeed if he did he would be acting in breach of his contract with the original purchaser. I hold therefore that the arrestment was effectual unless it be shewn that before it was used there had been such intima-

No. 39. tion of the subsale as to constitute the pursuers creditors for the delivery of the goods.

Nov. 28, 1893.
Browne & Co.
v. Ainslie &
Co.

The question then comes to be, whether the subsale was so intimated as to make the subpurchaser the creditor under the contract of sale, or, in other words, so as to complete the assignation of that contract to the subpurchaser. I feel some difficulty in answering it from the great imperfection of the pursuers' record. They do not state the time or manner of intimation. They say nothing more than that "intimation of the said sale was duly made to the custodiers of the whisky, who thereafter held for the before-mentioned pursuers." This averment refers to the sale to the pursuers by Thomas. There is no averment that the sale to Thomas was intimated to the defenders unless it be meant that there is an implied intimation of that sale by the intimation of the sale by Thomas to the pursuers.

On turning to the evidence, I do not find that the pursuers rely on any written intimation of a definite date other than the letter of 1st April 1892, which was subsequent to the arrestment. They attempt to prove that the defenders were cognisant of the sale to Thomas and of the sale by Thomas to them. I do not doubt that the defenders knew that Davis, Strange, & Barker had sold the whisky. Mr Ainslie admits it, and I think it probable that they came to know that Thomas was the buyer. It is not said that anything was done by Thomas or by the pursuers to intimate the subsales. Indeed, it was only on the pursuers' demand to clear the first two hogsheads in January 1892 that they came to know that Davis, Strange, & Barker had anything to do with the whisky. "We did not then know"—so says Mr Towell—"that Ainslie & Company had possession of the whisky. I had never heard of Ainslie up to that time." The pursuers were referred to Davis, Strange, & Barker by Thomas. They applied to that firm, who directed the defenders to invoice and send the two casks to them. This was done, and the casks were delivered to the pursuers by Davis, Strange, & Barker.

In all this I can see nothing which amounts to intimation of the subsales. The evidence of the pursuers comes to no more than that the defenders knew that there had been a subsale. Knowledge is not the word of the statute, and I think it clear that the knowledge of the seller is not equivalent to intimation. The reason is, that as intimation is the act by which the subpurchaser becomes the creditor of the original seller the intimation must be his act. It denotes his acceptance of a position which is not created by the subpurchase, that he accepts the benefits as well as the liabilities of the original contract of sale. I do not mean to say that it must be in writing or be done by himself individually. But it must be done by himself or with his authority. Nothing less will signify that he has made a contract with the original seller. It is said that there could be no liability because the whisky was paid for. I do not think that this statement would be relevant even if it were true. But it is not true. For the creditors under the original contract were necessarily liable for the warehouse rents.

As I read the evidence neither Thomas nor the pursuers ever made any intimation to the defenders, either directly or indirectly. They never attempted to establish, and never did establish, any contract relation between themselves and the defenders. They simply did nothing. They were contented to remain creditors under the contract which they themselves had made.

I hold therefore that the arrestment of the defenders is good and effectual.

If I am right in the opinion I have expressed the defence is good in law, and must be sustained, unless the defenders are barred from pleading it. The Lord Ordinary has not decided whether the arrestment was effectual or not. But assuming it to be effectual, he is of opinion that the defenders cannot found on it. His view is that the defenders, at the desire of Davis, Strange, & Barker, so acted as to enable them to shew a clear title to the whisky as owners, and that customers by reason of their conduct were entitled to believe that Davis, Strange, & Barker had in truth such a title.

No. 39.

Nov. 28, 1893.
But Browne & Co.
v. Ainslie & Co.

The pursuers state no such case, and I do not think that I can refuse to sustain a legal defence in respect of an equity which is not stated on record. They allege no misconduct on the part of the defenders, nor any conspiracy or concert between them and Davis, Strange, & Barker. They ask judgment in respect of their own legal rights. They do not say that the defenders have been deprived of theirs. As the pleadings stand, I cannot affirm the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

But if we are to consider a plea of this kind, in support of which no facts have been stated on record, I think that nothing has been proved by which the defenders are barred from founding on their legal rights. There is a great conflict of evidence, and it is not easy to decide where the truth lies. Mr Davis swears that he was never told that Anderson was the mere servant of the defenders. Mr Ainslie's evidence is to the contrary. But, after all, I see nothing more than that Mr Davis told Mr Ainslie that his firm was desirous of "posing as Leith merchants," and that at his request the defenders gave facilities to this end by agreeing that their name should not appear in the transactions with the customers of Davis, Strange, & Barker. If Mr Davis thought that Anderson was a public bonded warehouseman I cannot see what pertinence these statements have. They are more important when we see from the evidence of Mr Ainslie, that in the knowledge that Anderson was the servant of the defenders, Davis asked that delivery-orders should be issued in favour of his firm against Anderson, on whom Davis, Strange, & Barker might issue their own delivery-orders. But even in that case I can see no unfair dealing on the part of the defenders. They might have acted as they did on their own motive without sacrificing any of their legal rights. They were entitled to issue a delivery-order against the keeper of their own store. If they acted within their own powers, it seems to be immaterial that they followed a particular course at the request of Davis, Strange, & Barker.

But the matters with which I have been dealing are necessarily unimportant unless the pursuers were deceived. Mr Towell is the only witness who can speak to this fact. He does not say that the pursuers were deceived. He says no more than that they did not know that the defenders had possession of the whisky. The pursuers bought from Thomas in December 1891, and paid at the time. They did not even know of Davis, Strange, & Barker, until they desired to clear two hogsheads in January 1892. Consequently they completed their purchase without the knowledge of what had been done by the defenders and Davis, Strange, & Barker. In these circumstances I cannot see how the pursuers were misled or deceived, and if they were not, there is no foundation for the plea that the defenders are barred from founding on their legal rights.

The pursuers also founded on the 9th and 10th sections of the Factors Act of 1889. Here, again, their record is very imperfect. There is no attempt to explain the grounds on which they appeal to the Act. But it is obvious that

No. 39. they can take no benefit from it unless they shew that it deprived the defenders of their right to arrest.
Nov. 23, 1893.
Browne & Co.
v. Ainslie & Co.

The ninth section deals with a person who has bought goods, and who has obtained with consent of the seller possession of the goods or documents of title, and it declares that the transference by such person of the goods or documents of title shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the consent of the owner. We have to consider how that section can affect the defenders.

The goods here spoken of are the goods of the seller, and if the Act affects the defenders they must be taken to be the sellers. The enactment is that the buyer who has obtained possession of the goods shall be entitled to transfer them to the same effect as if he had been a mercantile agent in possession of the goods. The possession of the documents of title gives the same powers and rights as the possession of the goods, or, in other words, the possession of the documents of title is equivalent to the possession of the goods. But this is only possible if the documents of title are the documents under which the seller held the goods. For no transfer order granted by the seller can of itself divest him of the possession. The pursuers have no such documents of title, and the defenders remain in possession of the goods.

Again, the tenth section provides that when a document of title has been transferred to a buyer of the goods contained in the document of title, the transfer shall defeat the vendor's lien or right of stoppage in transitu in the same way as the transfer of a bill of lading defeats the stoppage in transitu. But we are not concerned with any such rights. The defenders are not claiming any lien, nor are they asserting any right to stop in transitu. They are claiming the benefit of an arrestment which they have a statutory right to use so long as the goods are in their own possession.

The Act in the ninth section deals merely with the right to transfer, and in the tenth with vendor's lien and stoppage in transitu. It does not alter the law relating to delivery. It leaves to the former law to determine whether the goods remain in the hands of the seller, or whether there has been a change of possession, and in my opinion it leaves unrepealed the statute which enables a seller to arrest the goods so long as they are in his possession.

LORD TRAYNER.—The facts of this case have been so fully stated in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary as to render any recapitulation of them unnecessary. The question of law to be determined is, whether the pursuers are entitled to delivery of the six hogsheads of whisky in question, or whether the defenders are entitled to retain them in respect of the arrestment they have used in their own hands.

The Lord Ordinary has held that the defenders in the circumstances he narrates are barred from pleading their arrestment in answer to the pursuers' demand. I offer no opinion upon this ground of judgment, as I am disposed to decide this case on a consideration of the effect of the 3d section of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856. That section provides,—“Any seller of goods may attach the same while in his own hands or possession, by arrestment or pouncing, at any time prior to the date when the sale of such goods to a subsequent purchaser shall have been intimated to such seller, and such arrestment or pouncing shall have the same operation and effect in a competition or otherwise as an arrestment or pouncing by a third party.” There are here three

Browne & Co.

v. Ainslie & Co.

conditions which must be fulfilled in order to make the arrestment effectual, viz. :—(1) The arrestment must be used by the original seller of the goods ; (2) the goods must be in his hands or possession ; and (3) the arrestment must be prior in date to an intimation made to the seller of the sale of the goods to a subsequent purchaser. The first of these conditions is admittedly fulfilled ; the defenders were the original sellers of the goods in question. The second condition is, in my opinion, also fulfilled. There may be room in this case for a question whether the goods sold by the defenders were or were not delivered to their buyers, Davis, Strange, & Barker, so as to pass the property in the goods to them. But such a question does not need to be determined. For the section of the statute does not limit the arrestment by the seller to goods in his "possession," which might be read as meaning in his possession as undivested proprietor, but on the contrary, by express words, provides that arrestment may be used of goods "in his own hands," which I read as meaning goods in the custody or keeping of the seller, no matter what the title may be to which the custody may be attributed, provided of course it be a lawful title. The words "in hands" and "possession" are in my opinion used in contrast and not as synonymous. Now here, whether the goods were or were not delivered in the technical sense to the original buyer, they were at the date of the arrestment in the store or warehouse of the defenders and under their control. In a word, they were in the custody—"in the hands"—of the seller. The only question then remaining is, whether the defenders used the arrestment upon which they found at a date prior to intimation of a subsequent sale. This is a question of fact, but before considering the fact or the proof offered in support of it, it is necessary to see what are the essentials of the intimation which, if made, excludes the seller's right to arrest ; what must be the form and character of the intimation, and by whom must it be made. On this subject I observe that the statute does not prescribe any form of intimation—it does not provide that it shall be in writing—there is no solemnity prescribed with regard to its form, contents, or mode of delivery. It provides merely that an intimation shall be given to the seller which conveys to him the knowledge that a subsale has taken place. Any intimation therefore, verbal or written, which possesses the seller with the knowledge of the fact of the subsequent sale appears to me to fulfil the requirement of the statute. It does not appear to me to be essential that the seller shall be informed who is the buyer under the subsequent sale. In that he has no interest. If the conditions of the original contract of sale have been fulfilled it is of no concern to him to whom the goods are ultimately delivered whether he be the first or the sixth subvendee, provided only that the person ultimately claiming the goods can shew such a title to them as warrants the original seller in giving delivery. If the conditions of the original contract have not been fulfilled the original seller can hold the goods against the world until such fulfilment is made. As the subsequent sale (if there is one) does not affect the rights of the original seller it is of no importance to him to know the name of the person to whom that subsequent sale has been made. Does it make any difference whether the intimation is made by the buyer under the original sale, and seller under the subsequent contract, or the subvendee ? I think not ; either may make it. If there is any difference I should prefer to hold that the intimation should be made by the original buyer and subvendor rather than the subvendee. The original seller knows nothing, or may know nothing, of the subvendee, with whom he stands in no contract relation, and he might very well answer

No. 39. any intimation from the subvendee by saying, "I will take no notice of your intimation or any claim under it until you produce your delivery-order or other notice from the man who bought from me, and to whom I am bound by contract to deliver the goods." But a notice from the original purchaser to the effect that he had sold the goods to another is a different matter, and a notice to which the original seller (saving his rights under the original contract) would be bound to give effect, and would be safe in giving effect.

Nov. 28, 1893.
Browne & Co.
v. Ainslie &
Co.

Now, then, how stand the facts as regards intimation of a subsale? The original sale of twenty hogsheads of whisky (of which the six now in question form a part) was made early in January 1891. On the 21st of that month Davis, Strange, & Barker wrote to the defenders that they had that day opened an account with one of the richest publicans in London, and added,—“We have sold him this lot of whisky,” and it is plain (I do not think it is disputed) that this letter refers to the twenty hogsheads bought from the defenders. Their reply, on the following day, clearly shews that the defenders so understood it. This intimation did not name the purchaser, but that, as I have said, was not in my opinion at all necessary. But the name of the purchaser was very soon supplied—for a delivery-order for a hogshead of this particular lot of whisky (identified by marks and numbers), dated 5th February 1891, in favour of W. Freeman Thomas, was forwarded to the defenders by Davis, Strange, & Barker. I think it does not appear on the proof on what date precisely this delivery-order reached the defenders, but there is no proof and no suggestion that it was not sent to and received by the defenders several months before the arrestments. The documentary evidence therefore comes to this—that written intimation was given to the defenders by their buyers of a subsale of the twenty hogsheads to one purchaser in January 1891, and that subsequently a delivery-order was presented for part of the whisky, which disclosed the purchaser to be a Mr Thomas. The parole evidence is to the same effect. Mr Davis and Mr Barker both depone to having informed Mr Ainslie, the defender, at an interview in London on 18th February 1891, that they had sold the twenty hogsheads to Mr Thomas, and “that the delivery-orders had been handed” to him. No doubt Mr Ainslie denies this. He does not deny knowledge of a subsale, but he says that at the interview with Davis and Barker he neither asked nor was told the name of the purchaser. But I prefer to believe that Mr Ainslie has forgotten what took place at that interview, rather than to believe that Davis and Barker are swearing to a statement which (if not true) they must have invented and knew to be false. I think, therefore, that the evidence in the case shews that prior to 18th February the defenders had written intimation of the subsale to Mr Thomas, and that on 18th February the intimation was verbally repeated.

The arrestment founded on by the defenders was used by them on 9th March 1892, a date somewhat carelessly omitted from the defenders' record, but which I find from the execution of arrestment produced. It follows that the defenders' arrestment is ineffectual in competition with the pursuers (who stand in the place and use the rights of Mr Thomas), not having been used prior to the date when the sale of the goods in question to a subsequent purchaser had been duly intimated. I am therefore of opinion that the result reached by the Lord Ordinary is right, and ought to be affirmed.

JAMES Y. PATTISON, Defender (Respondent).—Salvesen—W. Thomson. Nov. 29, 1893.

Cautioner—Liberation of cautioner—Cautioner for composition liberated by creditors taking trust-deed without his consent—Consent not implied from silence v. Pattison.
 —Personal objection.—A debtor, who had granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, entered into an arrangement with them for payment of a composition of 7s. 6d. per £1, and found caution for the payment of the last instalment, A being one of the cautioners. The debtor failed to pay the first instalment of the composition, and the creditors took from him a second trust-deed for their behoof. No intimation of this was sent to A, but a meeting of the creditors having been subsequently called by circular, one of the circulars was sent to A, who took no notice of it. The debtor's estate realised enough to pay about 2s. 6d. per £1. The cautioners having subsequently been called on to pay, A disputed liability, and an action was raised against him.

Held (dub. Lord Young) that by taking the second trust-deed the creditors had liberated the cautioners, and that A was not barred from pleading this by his silence after receiving the circular.

ON 12th February 1891 James Chalmers Mackay, printer, Nether-^{2d DIVISION.}
 kirkgate, Aberdeen, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. On 23d February this trust-deed was superseded, and Mackay reinstated in his estates, under a composition arrangement by which the creditors agreed to accept a composition of 7s. 6d. in the £1, payable by instalments of 2s. 6d., 2s., and 3s. at four, eight, and twelve months respectively, Mackay finding caution for the last instalment, which amounted in all to about £250. Among the cautioners was James Y. Pattison, advertising agent, Broad Street, Aberdeen, who became cautioner for that instalment to the extent of £100.

Mackay was unable to pay the first instalment of the composition, and on the 20th June 1891 a trust-deed was taken from him for behoof of his creditors, without any intimation to Pattison. Notice of this was at once sent to all the creditors, and a meeting called for the 24th June. A copy of this circular was sent to the cautioners, including Pattison, who took no notice of it. The creditors agreed to Mackay's estate being realised under this trust-deed. The estates having been realised, the dividend thereon was under 2s. 6d. per £1.

The cautioners having been called on to pay, and Pattison having declined to do so, Allan, Buckley Allan, & Milne, advocates in Aberdeen (in whose favour, as representing the creditors, the letters of guarantee had been granted), raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Pattison, for payment of £100, the amount of his guarantee.

The pursuers pleaded;—(2) The defender having guaranteed payment of the said last instalment to the extent mentioned, he is bound, on the failure of the debtor to pay, to implement his guarantee. (3) The said James Chalmers Mackay having, on his failure to pay the first instalment of the composition, become insolvent, his creditors were entitled to take a trust-deed from him, and under it to realise the estate. (4) The creditors of the said James Chalmers Mackay not having by their actings or otherwise relieved the defender of his cautionary obligation, they are entitled to insist on implement thereof.

The defender pleaded;—(6) The said James Chalmers Mackay having failed to pay the first instalment of the alleged composition, and the pursuers, or those whom they represented, having in consequence thereof departed from the said composition arrangement, and entered upon the possession of the said estate under the trust-deed of 20th June 1891, and that without having consulted the defender, and the defender having thereby suffered prejudice, at least to the extent of the said alleged obligation, the pursuers, or those whom they represent, are barred from insisting in this action, and the defender is entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses. (7) The alleged guarantee sued on having been granted on the condition precedent that the first two instalments of the said composition should be paid, and the same having not been purified, and the composition arrangement having been abandoned and departed from, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.

On 3d April 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact):—"Finds in law . . . that the estate of the said James Chalmers Mackay having been realised with the knowledge of, and without objection on the part of the defender, he is now barred from objecting thereto or pleading it as a ground of release from his obligation: Therefore repels the defences, decerns against the defender as concluded for: Finds the pursuers entitled to expenses," &c.

On appeal, the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on 23d May, pronounced an interlocutor by which he affirmed the findings in fact in the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor: "Quoad ultra recalls the same: Finds in law that the creditors by taking from the bankrupt the trust-deed of 20th June 1891, without the defender's consent, liberated him from his obligation: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the summons: Finds him entitled to expenses," &c.*

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—It was settled law that a cautioner was not liberated by reason of the debtor whom he had

* "NOTE.—This case seems to me to be governed by the case of Scott v. Campbell, 12 S. 447 . . . The offer of composition by the bankrupt, the interposition of the defender as one of the securities to a limited extent for payment of the last instalment, and the acceptance by the creditors of the composition so guaranteed, put an end to the prior trust-deed, and amounted to a contract between the cautioner and the creditors which could not be altered or varied without the cautioner's consent. This is the effect of the judgment in Scott v. Campbell. Nor is it relevant to inquire whether the new agreement with the bankrupt, by which he granted a second trust-deed, altered the cautioner's position for the worse, because when a man undertakes a cautionary obligation on a certain footing, it is for him to judge whether or not he will remain liable, notwithstanding the change; when, therefore, the bankrupt failed to pay any of the instalments of the composition which he had promised to pay, the creditors might have called on the cautioner to make good the deficiency to the extent of his obligation, and in that event he would have had recourse against the estate left in the hands of the bankrupt for his own indemnification, but they were clearly not entitled to deprive him of that remedy by taking from him the second trust-deed, without discharging the surety, unless he had expressly agreed to continue bound. It is this want of consent on the defender's part which seems to be fatal; and I cannot agree with the Sheriff-substitute, that standing by and doing nothing was as good as consent, and bars him from now urging the plea. This view of the Sheriff-substitute is opposed to the opinions expressed in Polak v. Everett, L. R., 1 Q. B. Div. 669, an English case no doubt, but there is really no difference on such a purely equitable question as this between the practice of the English and Scottish Courts. Wherever a man has knowledge of a transaction, and from the usage of trade or otherwise there is a duty to speak, he may be precluded by his silence from afterwards objecting. 'But to say' (says Lord Blackburn) 'that a person who, being a surety, becomes aware that the creditor is going to give time, or do something else which if done without his consent may discharge him, is bound to warn the creditor against it, is a thing for which no authority has been cited.' The defender therefore seems entitled to judgment."

guaranteed being sequestrated,¹ and the granting of the trust-deed of 20th June 1891 was equivalent to sequestration, in so far as this question was concerned. It was immaterial to the cautioner how his debtor had been divested of his property, whether by voluntary trust-deed, or by operation of sequestration. He therefore had suffered no prejudice. The case of *Scott v. Campbell*² was special.

The argument for the defender sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Court.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In the beginning of 1891 the affairs of Mr Mackay became embarrassed, and on 12th February of the same year he granted a trust-deed to certain persons as trustees for behoof of his creditors. A composition arrangement was afterwards agreed to, and Mr Pattison, the defender, became security for payment to the extent of £100 of the last instalment of the composition arrangement. Mr Mackay failed to pay the first instalment of the composition, and thereafter he entered into a second trust-deed in June 1891. This trust-deed was granted without any communication to the defender, and a meeting of the creditors was held, when for the first time information of the trust-deed was sent to him.

The question in the case is, whether the second trust-deed, being entered into by Mackay and his creditors without the consent of the cautioner, has or has not the effect of relieving the cautioner from his obligation to pay the £100 for which he had become security.

Now, this second trust-deed was a voluntary arrangement made by the creditors of Mackay, and it is said by the defender that it has superseded the former arrangement and has freed him. The Sheriff-substitute found that the defender was liable; the Sheriff reversed that finding, and held that the taking of the trust-deed without the defender's consent liberated him from his obligations, and I have come to the conclusion that the Sheriff is right.

Had the intervention taken the form not of a voluntary trust-deed but that of proceedings in exercise of right by creditors, such as the diligence of sequestration, that would have made quite a different case. Sequestration would not free the cautioner from his obligation, because sequestration is a diligence according to law. But the position of this case is quite different. The defender undertook to become surety for this £100 upon certain conditions, and if these are not carried out, then he is not bound to submit to other conditions to which he was not a party.

It was said for the pursuers that the defender was barred from claiming to be relieved from the obligation because he did not object to the second trust-deed when it was entered into, but I do not see that a cautioner is bound in such circumstances to interfere. It is for the persons who are making the new arrangement to take care of themselves, but a cautioner cannot lose his right to relief in consequence of innovation because he did not inform the innovators that if they went on with their arrangement he would hold himself freed from his obligation.

Allan, & Milne
v. Pattison.

LORD TRAYNER.—The material facts requiring attention in the decision of this case are not in dispute, and are to be found set forth in the joint minute of admissions lodged in process. Shortly stated, the facts are as follows :—In February 1891 James Chalmers Mackay, having become embarrassed, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors, but after the granting of the trust-deed negotiations were set on foot for the purpose of carrying through a composition arrangement between Mackay and his creditors whereby the trust-deed would be superseded. That composition arrangement was effected, and under it Mackay offered and his creditors accepted a composition of 7s. 6d. per pound, payable by instalments at four, eight, and twelve months respectively from the month of February 1891. The defender guaranteed the due payment of the last instalment to a certain extent. The first instalment was due in the month of June, and was not paid by the debtor, and very shortly thereafter (in the same month) Mackay's creditors required him to grant, and he did grant, a trust-deed in their favour whereby he conveyed to trustees there named his whole estate for his creditors' behoof. Under that deed the insolvent's whole estate has been realised by the trustees. The question of law is, whether the actings of Mackay's creditors subsequent to the date of the guarantee have released the defender from his obligation. The Sheriff, differing from the Sheriff-substitute, has answered this question in the affirmative, and has assoilzied the defender. I am of opinion that the Sheriff is right, and for the reasons which he has stated, to which I have very little to add.

The condition of the agreement or contract under which the defender became cautioner was that the debtor was to remain vested with his whole estate with a liability to pay the instalments under the composition arrangement as they became due. That bargain was one which the debtor and his creditors were not entitled to depart from if the cautioner was to remain liable. But in four months after making that bargain the creditors and the debtor entered into a new contract, whereby the debtor was at once divested of his whole estate, and such a bargain did, or reasonably might, deprive the cautioner of a right of relief against the debtor's estate which he was entitled to rely upon having when he granted his cautionary obligation. The appellants argued that the taking of the trust-deed did the cautioner no prejudice which he would not have suffered if the creditors, instead of taking a trust-deed, had applied for sequestration of the debtor's estate after his failure to pay the first instalment, and that taking out sequestration would not have liberated the cautioner. The cases of Freeland (2 S. 389) and Muir (4 S. 452) were cited in support of this argument. The law laid down in these cases was not questioned, but I think these cases do not aid the pursuers' contention.

In the cases cited the rule laid down was that creditors who do diligence for recovery of a first instalment under a composition arrangement do not thereby liberate the cautioner for a second or third instalment. Sequestration is just a kind of diligence, and may be resorted to by a creditor like diligence of any other kind. It would be out of the question to say that creditors to whom a first instalment is due are not to be allowed to use the means which the law provides for recovery of what is due to them, except on condition of giving up a cautionary obligation for something which is not yet due. Creditors may undoubtedly resort to such means without any such consequence following. But if creditors, instead of using such means, enter into a new bargain with the debtor, for obtaining, not money payment of the instalment due, but payment of their whole debt, so far as the debtor's whole estate when realised will yield payment, then they cannot hold a cautioner like the defender liable on his limited cautionary obligation—an obligation granted on a condition which left the debtor vested in his whole estate. In short, the creditors by voluntary arrangement with their debtor, having without the cautioner's consent essentially altered the conditions under which the cautioner alone consented to be bound, cannot enforce that cautioner's obligation. I think the case of Scott (12 S. 447), referred to by the Sheriff, is quite in point, and am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

Succession—Direction to trustees to retain—Repugnancy—Revocation—Vesting.—By trust-disposition and settlement a testator directed her trustees in the second place to give certain furniture and other effects to her two daughters; in the third place, to convey her heritable property to the daughters equally; and in the fourth place, inter alia, to pay one-third share of the residue of her estates to each of the daughters.

By a codicil the testator revoked the second and third purposes of the trust-disposition, and in place thereof directed her trustees to sell the whole of her furniture and effects mentioned in the second purpose, and also her heritable property mentioned in the third purpose, and to hold the proceeds thereof, and also the shares of the residue appointed to be paid to the daughters under the fourth purpose of the trust-disposition in their own hands, for the benefit and alimentary use of the daughters, equally between them share and share alike, and to pay, apply, and lay out the same for their behoof respectively, in such way and manner as the trustees might consider proper and expedient, and to pay the daughters the capital and interest, or only the interest, at such times and terms, and in such way and manner, and in such sums or proportions, as to the trustees should seem proper and expedient, as to all which she gave the trustees most ample powers and discretion, without control or interference on the part of the daughters or their husbands, or any party or parties acting for them or in their right, the said provisions being purely alimentary and not subject to the jus mariti or right of management or administration of their respective husbands, and she declared that it should not be in the power of the daughters or their husbands to sell, burden with debt, alienate or assign, the said provisions or any part thereof, either absolutely or in security, nor to

In a special case presented after the death of the testator, held (1) that as under the trust-disposition by itself the provisions to the daughters vested a morte testatoris, and as the fourth purpose was not revoked by the codicil, the codicil was not to be construed as altering the period of vesting either of the daughters' shares of residue or of the subjects mentioned in the second and third purposes of the settlement, but merely as making a money addition to the daughters' shares of residue, vesting a morte testatoris; and (2) (dis. Lord Trayner) that the daughters were entitled to immediate payment of their provisions, the directions to the trustees to retain, in the codicil, being void from repugnancy.

2D DIVISION.

MRS HENRIETTA CHRISTIE OR WILKIE, Rosslyn Crescent, Edinburgh, died on 26th September 1884, survived by three sons and by two daughters, Henrietta (Mrs Wight), and Susan (Mrs Macleod).

By her trust-disposition and settlement, dated 24th January 1883, Mrs Wilkie, in the second place, directed her trustees "immediately on my death, to give and deliver over to my two daughters, Mrs Henrietta Wilkie or Wight, and Mrs Susan Wilkie or Macleod, equally between them, share and share alike, my whole furniture, bed and table linen, china, books, pictures, silver-plate, and all other effects in my dwelling-house that shall belong to me at the time of my death." By the third purpose she directed her trustees "immediately after my death, to convey and make over to and in favour of my said two daughters, equally between them, share and share alike, and to the survivor of them, and the heirs and assignees whomsoever of such survivor, any dwelling-house or heritable property whatsoever which may belong to me at the time of my death, but exclusive of the jus mariti and right of management and administration, and every other legal right of their husbands respectively." In the fourth place, Mrs Wilkie directed her trustees "at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after my death, and after the provisions in favour of my daughters as above written have been implemented, to divide the residue of my whole means, estate, and effects into three equal parts or shares, and to pay the same to and among my children as follows, videlicet :—One-third part or share thereof to each of my said daughters, and the remaining one-third part or share thereof to my sons . . . Declaring that if any of my said children above named shall die before the said period of payment, leaving lawful issue of their bodies, such issue shall, equally among them, be entitled to their deceased parent's share, and also declaring that the shares of any of my said children above named who may die before said period of payment without leaving lawful issue, shall go, accresce, and belong equally to the survivors of the said children above named, and the issue of such of them as may have predeceased per stirpes and not per capita."

Mrs Wilkie also left a codicil to her trust-disposition and settlement, dated 24th October 1883, in the following terms :—"I hereby revoke the second and third purposes of the said trust-disposition and settlement, and in place thereof I direct my trustees, immediately after my death, or as soon thereafter as they can conveniently do so, to sell the whole of my furniture and effects mentioned in the said second purpose, and also my heritable property mentioned in the said third purpose, and to hold the proceeds thereof, and also the shares of the residue appointed to be paid to my two daughters, Mrs Henrietta Wilkie or Wight and Mrs

Susan Wilkie or Macleod, under the fourth purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement in their own hands, for the benefit and alimentary use of my said two daughters, equally between them share and share alike, and shall pay, apply, or lay out the same for their behoof respectively in such way and manner as my trustees may consider proper and expedient, and to pay them the capital and interest, or only the interest, at such times or terms, and in such way and manner, and in such sums or proportions, and through such channels as to my trustees shall seem proper and expedient, as to all which I give them the most ample powers and discretion, without control or interference on the part of my said daughters or their husbands, or any party or parties acting for them or in their right, the said provisions being purely alimentary and not subject to the jus mariti or right of management or administration of their respective husbands; and I declare that it shall not be in the power of my daughters or their husbands to sell, burden with debt, alienate, or assign the said provisions or any part thereof, either absolutely or in security, nor to anticipate the payment thereof, nor shall the same be arrestable for or affectable by their debts or deeds of any description whatever, nor be subject to the legal diligence of their creditors, all such debts, deeds, and diligence being hereby expressly excluded and debarred, and in all other respects I confirm my said trust-disposition and settlement."

Mrs Wilkie's daughter Mrs Wight died on 13th August 1892. Prior to the death of Mrs Wight, Mrs Wilkie's trustees had paid the one-third of the residue left to the sons, and had realised the subjects mentioned in the second and third purposes of the trust-disposition, but had retained the proceeds, as well as the two remaining thirds of residue, in their own hands, paying the interest only to the daughters equally, with the exception of certain sums of capital, amounting in all to £600, which had been paid over to the daughters. At the date of Mrs Wight's death, the trustees had £1825 of capital in their hands.

On 24th May 1893, a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment of the Court as to the disposal of this £1825.

Mrs Wight's marriage-contract trustees—the second parties—claimed one-half, or £912, 10s. as having vested in her a morte testatoris, and consequently as carried by the conveyance in her marriage-contract.

The third party, Mrs Macleod, on the other hand maintained that on a sound construction of the settlement and codicil no right to this £912, 10s. had vested in Mrs Wight, as it had not been paid to her during her lifetime, and that, as the settlement contained no ulterior direction with regard to this sum, it passed into intestacy, i.e. fell to be divided among the testator's five children equally. Alternatively, Mrs Macleod maintained that if the daughters' shares vested a morte testatoris, she was entitled to immediate payment of £912, 10s. being her half of the £1825.

In opposition to Mrs Macleod's alternative contention, Mrs Wilkie's trustees, the first parties, maintained that, if the daughters' shares vested a morte testatoris, Mrs Macleod was not entitled to immediate payment of her share, they (the trustees) having an absolute discretion as to payment.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Did the said sum of £912, 10s. vest in Mrs Wight, and form part of the personal estate assigned by her to her trustees for the purposes mentioned in her antenuptial contract of marriage? or (2) Has the said sum fallen into intestacy as part of the estate of the late Mrs Wilkie, and are her next of kin entitled thereto in the foreshaid shares? (3) In the event of the first question being answered in the affirmative,—Is the third party entitled to immediate payment of the corresponding sum of £912, 10s. held for her behoof?”

Argued for the second parties;—The shares of both daughters vested

No. 41. a morte testatoris, or at all events, at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas six months after the death of the testator. That was plainly the rule upon a construction of the trust-disposition taken by itself, and the codicil did not alter the period of vesting of the residue, but merely gave the trustees power to retain the fee of the daughters' shares, in whole or in part, during their lifetime. The proceeds of the furniture, which was the subject of the second purpose of the settlement, and of the heritage, which was the subject of the third purpose, in effect became part of the daughters' shares of residue, and vested at the same time as the original shares.

Nov. 30, 1893,
Wilkie's Trust-
tees v. Wight's
Trustees.

Argued for the first parties;—The directions to the trustees to retain the daughters' shares, in whole or in part, were not void from repugnancy. Such directions were not necessarily repugnant to an immediately vested interest. If it appeared plain that the testator intended to protect the beneficiary by interposing a trust, such a direction was effectual—at all events as in question with the legatee—notwithstanding¹ that the legatee took a vested interest a morte.

Argued for the third party;—(1) No right to the fee of her share had vested in Mrs Wight, since she had died without having received payment. Under the trust-disposition the vesting of the residue took place at the period of payment, which was at the first term happening six months after the death of the testator. Under the codicil, the period of payment of the daughters' shares was left absolutely to the discretion of the trustees; and consequently there was no vesting as regarded these shares except on actual payment.² (2) If however, the daughters' shares vested a morte, the third party was entitled to immediate payment of her share, the directions to retain in the codicil being, on that alternative, void from repugnancy.³

At advising,

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—By the second purpose of her settlement the truster directed her trustees to give certain effects to her daughters Mrs Wight and Mrs Macleod, equally, and by the third, to convey to them certain heritable property in equal shares. By the fourth she directed them to pay to each daughter an equal third of the residue. There can be no doubt that under these clauses the daughters took a right of fee.

By her codicil she revoked the second and third purposes of the settlement, and directed the trustees to sell the subjects which were dealt with in these clauses, and “to hold the proceeds thereof, and also the shares of the residue appointed to be paid to my two daughters Mrs Henrietta Wilkie or Wight and Mrs Susan Wilkie or Macleod under the fourth purpose of the said trust-disposition and settlement in their own hands, for the benefit and alimentary use of my said two daughters, equally between them, share and share alike, and shall pay, apply, or lay out the same for their behoof respectively in such way and manner as my trustees may consider proper and expedient, and to pay them the capital and interest, or only the interest, at such times or terms, and in such way and manner, and in such sums or proportions, and through such channels as to

She further declared "that it shall not be in the power of my daughters or their husbands to sell, burden with debt, alienate, or assign the said provisions or any part thereof, either absolutely or in security, nor to anticipate the payment thereof, nor shall the same be arrestable for or affectable by their debts or deeds of any description whatever, nor be subject to the legal diligence of their creditors, all such debts, deeds, and diligence being hereby expressly excluded and debarred."

Nov. 30, 1893.
Wilkie's Trustees v. Wight's Trustees.

It is to be observed that the truster does not revoke the fourth purpose, and I think that the effect of the revocation of the second and third purposes, taken in connection with the directions in the codicil, is merely to make a money addition to the interest which the daughters took under the residuary clause. For the money produced by the sale of the property, failing these clauses, is to be dealt with in the same way as the share of residue, and it is, in my opinion, impossible to make any distinction between the rights of the daughters in the residue and in this money.

As the fourth clause is not revoked, the right of fee given to the daughters remains. There is an attempt to limit the daughters in the use of it, but nothing more. There is neither a declaration that their right should be limited to a liferent, nor is there a destination to any other person. I am of opinion therefore that the share of Mrs Wight vested in her in fee, and passed to her marriage-contract trustees.

It is a more difficult question whether Mrs Macleod is entitled to immediate payment of her share. But I am of opinion that she is. I hold her to be a fiar, and I do not think that the rights of a fiar can be restricted by the limitations contained in this deed. These limitations do not reduce the right of the legatees to anything less than a fee. They are mere attempts to restrain the rights of the fiar in the use of her own property. It cannot, I think, be doubted that creditors would not be excluded, and though a liferent may be declared alimentary, such a declaration has no effect on a right of fee. Following the case of Miller (18 R. 301), I think that there is a repugnancy between these limitations and the right of fee, and that the rights of the fiar must prevail.

Mrs Macleod being fiar was, in my opinion, entitled to sell her interest under the settlement, and there could be no possible benefit in keeping up the trust against the buyer. It is, I think, a well-settled principle that the Court will allow a legatee to do directly what may be done indirectly.

LORD TRAYNER.—I have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the shares of residue destined under the testamentary writing before us to Mrs Wight and Mrs Macleod vested in them a morte testatoris. But then the testatrix has directed her trustees to hold these shares of residue in their own hands "for the benefit and alimentary use" of the beneficiaries named, and to pay them the capital and interest, or only the interest, at such time and in such manner and proportion as to them (the trustees) shall seem proper and expedient. The testatrix has made her intention quite plain that the benefit conferred by her on Mrs Wight and Mrs Macleod should not be paid over to them, but should be so secured to them during their respective lives that no act or deed of theirs should deprive them of it. It may be that the testatrix has not effectually secured the shares of residue in question against the creditors of the beneficiaries, —a point on which I give no opinion,—but in judging of a claim made by a beneficiary under a testamentary writing, I am not disposed to dis sever the right

No. 41. itself from the condition annexed to the right by the giver of it; nor concede to the beneficiary something which the testator has in express terms forbidden or refused. It is maintained, on the authority of the case of Miller's Trustees, that the conditions referred to are ineffectual, and cannot be enforced. I am bound to follow the decision in that case if applicable, whatever my own opinion may be. But I think the present case falls within the exception to the rule given effect to in that case—an exception stated by the Lord President in these words,—"When there are trust purposes to be secured which cannot be secured without the retention of the vested estate or interest of the beneficiary in the hands of the trustees, the rule cannot be applied, and the right of the beneficiary must be subordinated to the will of the testator." These words, in my opinion, express the law applicable here.

Nov. 30, 1893.
Wilkie's Trustees v. Wight's Trustees.

Mrs Wight being dead, and the will of the testatrix having been fulfilled in regard to Mrs Wight's share, I think her representatives are now entitled to payment, and accordingly I would answer the first question in the affirmative. But I think Mrs Macleod is not entitled to claim payment of her share of the residue, and I would therefore answer the third question in the negative.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred with Lord Rutherford Clark.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT answered the first and third questions in the affirmative, and found it unnecessary to answer the second question.

Talisker Distillery v. Hamlyn & Co.

Contract—Foreign—Locus solutionis—Arbitration—Reference to unnamed arbiters.—By contract, signed in London, H. & Company, an English firm, agreed to purchase from K. & Company, distillers in Skye, all grains made by them at a certain price, and to fit up a grain drying machine at the distillery. K. & Company agreed to keep the machine in good order, and to "bag up" their grains in H. & Company's sacks, and deliver them f.o.b. at a port in Skye. It was further agreed that "should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way."

Held (diss. Lord Kinnear) that the arbitration clause did not exclude action in the Scots Courts, the majority of the Court being of opinion (1) that the validity and effect of the contract fell to be determined by the law of Scotland as being the lex loci solutionis; (2) that the arbitration clause could not be regarded as a separate contract, the locus solutionis of which was in England; and (3) that the arbitration clause being a reference to unnamed arbiters, was by the law of Scotland inoperative.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

BY memorandum of agreement, dated 27th January 1892, between Roderick Kemp & Company, of Talisker Distillery, Carbost, Skye (now represented by "The Talisker Distillery"), and Hamlyn & Company, merchants, London, Roderick Kemp & Company agreed to sell and Hamlyn & Company agreed to buy all grains made by Kemp & Company at a certain price, and further, to supply and erect at the distillery a patent grain drying machine, which Kemp & Company agreed to keep in proper working order, "supplying all steam and labour, &c. necessary for properly drying the grains for the said Hamlyn & Company, and will bag up in the said Hamlyn & Company's sacks and deliver the grains f.o.b. Carboest, to their order." The contract was to be in force for ten years from the date of the erection of the machine.

The agreement contained the following clause,—“Should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way.”

The memorandum of agreement was signed by the parties in London.

In March 1893, disputes having arisen between the parties, the Talisker Distillery raised an action against Hamlyn & Company concluding for declarator that the defenders were bound to purchase all grains made by the pursuers for ten years from 27th October 1892, and for payment of £3000 for breach of contract, in respect that the defenders had failed to provide a proper drying machine, and that they now sought to repudiate the agreement to purchase the grains made by the pursuers.

The defenders denied that they had failed to supply an efficient drying machine, and averred that they were anxious to carry out the agreement, but that the grains supplied were not properly dried and put into sacks for delivery.

The defenders averred;—“The said memorandum of agreement was drawn and executed by the parties thereto in England, and falls to be construed and governed by the law of England. Further, it was drawn and executed in contemplation of the English law, and the parties thereto intended that it should be construed and enforced according to the law of England, and that that law alone should govern its construction and effect. It is the law of England, and, in particular, it is prescribed by the Arbitration Act, 1889, that a clause of reference, expressed in the terms of the clause above quoted, is irrevocable and valid, and binding upon the parties, and must be given effect to by the Courts of law, and bars either party from raising, or at least insisting in, an action at law. The present action, and all others arising out of the said memorandum of agreement are, and by the parties thereto were intended to be, excluded by the said clause of reference. By letter, dated 21st December 1892, the defenders called upon the” pursuers “to appoint an arbitrator within seven days from that date, offering at the same time to nominate a second one, as provided by the said memorandum of agreement, for the settlement of the dispute which had arisen and is the cause of the present action. The pursuers refused to do so, but the defenders have always been, and still remain, ready and willing to have the dispute settled by arbitration, and to do all things necessary to the proper conduct of the arbitration.”

The pursuers admitted that they refused to appoint an arbiter, but explained “that the present dispute does not arise out of the contract, but is inherent to the contract itself.”

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No jurisdiction. (2) The action is excluded by the clause of reference in the said memorandum of agreement.

On 6th July 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Repels the first two pleas in law stated for the defenders: Before answer, allows parties a proof of their averments, and to the pursuers a conjunct probation.”*

* “OPINION.—(After dealing with the plea of no jurisdiction)—The defenders, however, plead further that the action is excluded by the clause of reference contained in the memorandum of agreement on which the action is laid; and it is undoubtedly provided by that agreement that ‘should any dispute arise out of this contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the

Argued for the reclaimers;—The action was excluded by the clause of arbitration, the dispute being clearly within the terms of the reference. It was admitted that, if the question was to be decided by the law of Scotland, the clause was inoperative, the reference being to unnamed arbiters, but the arbitration clause was a separate contract, and fell to be interpreted by English law. The Lord Ordinary in his note gave undue weight to the lex loci solutionis in treating it as the leading consideration in determining which law was to govern. The contract was made in England, and it was evident from the reference being to "members of the London Corn Exchange in the usual way" that the intention of parties was that the clause of reference at least should be treated as an English contract.¹ The clause of reference was an independent contract to be performed in England, and therefore it fell to be governed by that law. It was always open to parties to make a stipulation that their contract should be construed according to the law of a foreign country, and they had done so here.² It was quite competent to have different laws applied to different parts of one contract.³

London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way.' The defenders admit that this stipulation is inoperative by the law of Scotland, inasmuch as the arbiters are not named, but they aver that it is good and effectual by the law of England; and they contend that the contract is an English contract, and falls to be interpreted and receive effect according to English law.

"I am not prepared to adopt this view. The contract was no doubt executed in England, but it was an agreement to which one of the parties was a Scotch firm; and it had reference to the treatment and disposal of the 'grains' produced at the distillery of the Scotch firm in the Isle of Skye. It was therefore an agreement of which Scotland was the place of performance, and, that being so, the validity and effect of its stipulations must, in my opinion, be determined by the law of Scotland. Such is—I think it is now fixed—the general rule; and there seems nothing in the nature or terms of the agreement to displace that rule. It is true that if the lex loci actus were here applied, one of the clauses of the agreement, viz., the particular clause in question, would be operative, whereas, according to the lex loci solutionis, it is inoperative; but it is not, so far as I know, a proposition which can be supported, that the law to be invoked for ascertaining the rights of parties under a contract is necessarily or even generally the law which least interferes with the operativeness of its various stipulations.

"In this view it is not necessary to decide whether the law of Scotland is not here applicable on another ground, viz., that it is the lex fori. But it is at least a very arguable proposition that this clause of reference relates to a matter of procedure, and so belongs to the department of remedy. In that case it would appear to follow that the lex fori applied on the principle of the case of Don v. Lippmann (2 S. and M'L., 682). It is not, however, as I have said, necessary to consider that question at present. In any view, the law of Scotland is the law applicable; and, according to that law, the clause of reference is inoperative. I shall therefore repel the first two pleas stated for the defenders, and allow a proof before answer in the usual form."

Argued for the pursuers;—The contract must be read as a whole. It had reference to sales of grains produced in Scotland and delivered there. Scotland was the locus solutionis, and the law of that locus should rule. The arbitration clause was not a separate contract, but was simply ancillary to the contract of sale. The question was ruled by the decision in Valery v. Scott,¹ which decided that the place of performance was the ruling consideration in determining questions of this kind. Further, they maintained that this was a question of remedy for breach of contract, and in that view also the law of Scotland, as lex fori, applied on the authority of Don v. Lippmann.²

Tallaker Distillery v.
Hamlyn & Co.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—This is an action of damages brought at the instance of the Talisker Distillery Company, as in right of the extinct firm of R. Kemp & Company, against Messrs Hamlyn & Company, in respect of an alleged breach of an agreement entered into between Kemp & Company and Hamlyn & Company.

By this agreement Hamlyn & Company agreed to purchase from Kemp & Company, at a fixed price, all grains made by them at their distillery. Hamlyn & Company, on the other hand, agreed to furnish a certain drying machine for the manufacture of the grains, which Kemp & Company agreed to work and keep in repair.

The alleged breach of agreement consists in this, that Hamlyn & Company failed to supply an efficient machine, so that the pursuers were unable to produce grains for sale, and suffered loss in consequence. The defence is that Hamlyn & Company duly supplied a proper drying machine in terms of the contract, but that Kemp & Company, or the pursuers, failed to work it properly or to keep it in repair, and that the deficiency, if any, in the production of grains has arisen from the pursuers' own fault.

The defenders plead, inter alia, that the action is excluded by a clause of reference in the agreement.

The clause of reference is in these terms,—“Should any dispute arise out of the contract, the same to be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way.”

The Lord Ordinary has repelled this plea, and the only question argued to us was whether his Lordship was right in so doing.

From what I have stated as to the nature of the dispute between the parties, it is clear that it falls within the terms of the clause of reference, and that indeed was not controverted, and the question therefore at issue between the parties is whether or not that clause is an operative clause.

If the law of Scotland is to rule the matter, it is admitted that the clause would be inoperative, in respect that it is a reference to persons as arbiters who are unnamed. It is averred by the defenders, and not disputed by the pursuers, that by the law of England the clause would be operative, and would exclude the present action.

The contract is between an English and a Scotch firm, and was executed in England. The fact that it was executed in England does not appear to me to be material in this question. It was probably a matter very much of conveni-

 Talisker Dis- On the other hand, it is to be observed that the place of performance was in tillery v. Scotland. The grains were to be made at the pursuers' distillery at Carboist in Hamlyn & Co. Scotland, and were to be delivered to the defenders there, and the machine for producing the grains was to be erected and worked there. The agreement is silent as to the mode of payment, but, in the absence of stipulation, I should say that the pursuers were entitled to demand payment on and at the place of delivery, so that the place of payment was there also. So far as I see, nothing required to be done in England in implement of the contract.

That being so, I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that the construction and effect of the agreement, and of all and each of its stipulations, is to be determined by the lex loci solutionis,—that is, by the law of Scotland.

It was, however, maintained to us that, if it appeared to be the intention of the parties that the contract should be ruled by the law of England, it was the duty of the Court to give effect to that intention; that it must be presumed that the parties intended that all the stipulations of the contract should receive effect; that this would be so if the contract were ruled by the law of England, but would not be so if it were ruled by the law of Scotland, and therefore it was said that the parties must have intended that the contract should be treated as an English contract. But if, as I think, the law of the locus solutionis is the law which is applicable to, and which regulates the rights of parties under the contract, then I think with the Lord Ordinary that it is no reason for not applying that law, that the result may be that a particular stipulation in the contract may not receive effect.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—This is an action instituted in the Court of Session to compel performance of a contract entered into between a company of distillers in Scotland, pursuers, and Hamlyn & Company, merchants, London, defenders, whereby the pursuers agreed to sell and the defenders to purchase all "grains" made by the pursuers in their distillery, at a specified price per quarter. The defenders also agreed to supply and erect at the pursuers' distillery a certain drying machine, and the pursuers undertook to work and keep in repair this machine, and to pack and deliver the "grains" to Hamlyn & Company's order, the contract to be in force for ten years.

The contract contains a clause referring disputes which might arise out of the contract to two members of the London Corn Exchange or their umpire. This clause is inoperative by the law of Scotland because the arbiters are not named, and the parties are at issue on the question whether this rule of the law of Scotland takes effect upon the contract, in which case the action would be sent to trial in the exercise of the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court, or whether the parties are to be held to have contracted with reference to the law of England, which recognises agreements to refer disputes to the arbitration of persons unnamed, in which case the action would either be dismissed, or the proceedings stayed in order that a decree might eventually be pronounced giving effect to the decision of the arbiters.

According to the terms of the contract, Scotland must be taken to be the locus solutionis. The contract does not prescribe any particular mode of payment of the price of the grains which are to be supplied during its continuance, and I am not sure that the obligation of payment of the price has reference to any definite locality or system of local law. The price has to be remitted from England to Scotland, but by arrangement the price might be paid into a London bank, or settled in such way as the parties might find to be convenient. But certainly all the other stipulations of the contract of sale are to be performed in Scotland, including the manufacture of the grains, their shipment to any part of the world on the order of Hamlyn & Company, the erection of the drying machine, and the operation of drying preparatory to shipment. It does not appear to me that in the question of the locality of the contract any conclusive inferences can be drawn from the domicile of the parties. The sellers have a Scottish domicile, and the purchasers have an English domicile, and the circumstance that this mercantile contract was signed in London is probably the least important of the elements which enter into the determination of the question of the locus of the contract.

As regards the arbitration clause, I think that in fair construction the place of performance may be held to be in London, because the reference is to members of the London Corn Exchange.

The question, what system of law governs the construction and validity of the contract was argued as a question of private international law, and we were referred to the opinions of Story and Bar, and to decisions of the English and Scottish Courts. In considering such questions it may be kept in view, as was very forcibly stated by Lord Selborne in the great jurisdiction case of Orr Ewing's Trustees, July 24, 1885, 13 R. (H. L.) p. 1, that writers on international law have no legislative authority to impel their opinions on the Courts of any independent state, and that their dicta are only obligatory on Courts of justice in so far as they have been received into the system of jurisprudence which is administered by the Court whose jurisdiction is involved. Now, in this case, Scotland is at once the forum and the locus solutionis, and the question we have to consider is whether there is any principle of private international right, as understood and administered in Scotland, which displaces the ordinary rule according to which a contract expressed in ordinary language will be interpreted and applied by a Court of law according to its own conception of the terms of the contract, and with reference to any rules of law which it administers.

In the present case,—at least for the purposes of the present dispute,—no question of construction of the contract is raised. If there were such a question we should not, so far as I can see, find it necessary to resort to the law of England for assistance, because the contract is expressed in ordinary language, and it is the settled practice of the Scottish Courts, and I apprehend also of the English Courts, to construe ordinary mercantile contracts according to their own understanding of their meaning, and of course consistently with the decisions of the Courts of the United Kingdom.

But in this case the meaning of the clause of arbitration is perfectly clear, the question is as to the obligatory character of an agreement to refer disputes to two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire. If the position of the parties had been reversed; if this had been a contract between an English company and a mercantile firm in Scotland to be executed in England, I should have held without hesitation that the obligation to refer disputes to arbiters unnamed was a valid obligation, because, whatever differences of opinion may exist amongst jurists, this Court has always acted on the principle

No. 42. that the lex loci solutionis is the governing law in the construction of contracts, the law which determines the validity of their stipulations, and which in certain cases attributes to particular stipulations a special meaning depending on local custom or rules of construction pertaining to that system of law. On this point I refer to the opinion of the late Lord President in Valery v. Scott, 3 R. 965.

Nov. 30, 1893.
Taliaker Dis-
tillery v.
Hamlyn & Co.

As in the present case Scotland is the locus solutionis, we have no occasion to consider any system of law other than our own, so far as the contract of sale is concerned.

But it was maintained by the defenders (1) that the clause of arbitration ought to be treated as an independent contract to be performed in England; and (2) reference was made to the opinion of Lord Justice Bowen in the case of Jacobs v. Crédit Lyonnais, 12 Q. B. Div. 589, to the effect that it is open to the parties to a contract to make any such agreement as they please as to incorporating the provisions of a foreign system of law in the obligatory writing. I should distrust any opinion I might provisionally form on a question of this nature if I found it to be in conflict with that of Lord Bowen; but in this case the real question is as to the application of the principle, and it is to be observed that Lord Bowen, while stating the principle as a necessary step in the argument, declined to apply it to the case before him. Because in considering the question, whether the parties should be held to have contracted with reference to the law of France, he points out that, while the parties may be assumed to have incorporated with their contract so much of the law of the foreign country as was inseparable from the performance of the contract in Algeria, it would not follow that they had contracted with reference to a provision of the law of France, which released the parties from their obligations on the ground of the impossibility of performance in a certain state of facts.

Now, taking the defenders' arguments as I have stated them, my opinion on the first point is that the agreement to refer disputes to members of the London Corn Exchange is not an independent contract to be performed in England, and therefore to be governed by the law of England. I think it is a stipulation ancillary to the contract of sale. One test of independence is, whether the provision is capable of standing alone, or whether any effect could be attributed to it if the contract of sale to which it is annexed were displaced. But it is plain that the clause of arbitration would have no meaning if it were detached from the contract of sale, because it is a clause of reference of disputes arising out of that contract.

Thus, I come to the conclusion that the clause of reference is merely an incident in a contract of sale, the validity and interpretation of which as a whole is regulated by the law of Scotland.

On the second point, my opinion is also adverse to the argument of the defenders. I do not doubt that the parties to a contract may incorporate expressly or by implication such provisions of a foreign system of law as they might put into their contract by writing them out at length. But it does not follow that the parties to a contract can by agreement dispense with a rule of law which affects the validity of the stipulation. Supposing that the two parties to this agreement had been domiciled in Scotland, and that they had written down,—“Notwithstanding the rule of our law which disallows reference to arbiters unnamed, we agree to refer our disputes to two members of the Exchange to be mutually chosen, and elect to have our contract judged by the law of England,” everyone would admit that such an agreement would not enable the Courts of Scotland to assist the party who might be desirous of enforcing the agreement. Now, in my view, the circumstance that one of the parties is domiciled in England, and that the arbitration is to be carried out in England, does not put the defender in any better position than he would occupy in the case supposed, unless I could regard the arbitration clause as an independent stipulation, which for the reasons stated is a view I am unable to accept. It follows, in my opinion, that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is well founded, and that the reclaiming note ought to be refused.

Talisker Distillery v. Hamlyn & Co.

LORD KINNEAR.—I need hardly say that I have found this to be a question of difficulty since I have the misfortune to differ from your Lordships and the Lord Ordinary. I do not think, however, that there is any material difference of opinion as to the principles by which the question must be determined.

There is no absolute rule of the law of Scotland that a contract made in one country, to be performed in another, must be governed either by the law of the place of execution, or by the law of the place of performance. The Lord President observes in Valery v. Scott "that these are both circumstances to be taken into consideration as regards the nationality of a contract." But whether the greater weight is to be given to the one consideration or the other must depend, in each case, upon the construction of the contract itself, because the validity of either consideration depends upon the presumed or expressed intention of the parties to contract with reference to the law of a particular place. I agree that the place of performance has been considered in this Court to be of more importance than the place of contracting; and for reasons that are especially cogent, when one of the parties to the contract is domiciled in England and the other in Scotland. If such a contract is to be performed entirely in one part of the United Kingdom it may, in general, be of very little consequence that it has been made in the other. The place of contracting may depend on the merest accident; and it seems to me that the occasional presence of a Scotch manufacturer in London, or of an English merchant in Scotland affords very little ground indeed for the inference that either intends to subject himself to any other law but that of the country where he lives. And therefore, were it not for the arbitration clause, I should agree with the Lord Ordinary and with your Lordships that the contract in question is to be wholly performed in Scotland, and that its validity and effect must be determined by the law of Scotland. But it is not suggested that there is any difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland with reference to the construction or legal effect of the main provisions of the contract, or with reference to anything else than the clause by which disputes are referred to arbitration. The only question we have to consider therefore is whether the agreement to submit to arbitration is to be governed by the law of Scotland or of England. That appears to me to be a question of contract, and I think the rule for deciding it is that stated by Lord Justice Bowen in Jacobs v. The Crédit Lyonnais,—"The only certain guide is to be found in applying sound ideas of business convenience and sense to the language of the contract itself, with a view to discovering from it the true intention of parties."

Is it then the intention of the contract to incorporate the English law regulating arbitrations?

Now, this contract was made in London between merchants carrying on business in the city of London and distillers in Skye. The parties therefore are

No. 42. subject to different jurisdictions, and it is reasonable to presume that the possible consequences of this difference were in their view when they made their agreement as to the tribunal by which disputes, if they arose, were to be settled. The contract which they made in these circumstances is that disputes should "be settled by arbitration by two members of the London Corn Exchange, or their umpire, in the usual way." Now, when a London merchant stipulates that disputes under his contract are to be referred to members of such a body as the London Corn Exchange,—that is, to merchants or brokers carrying on business in the city of London,—I think that that means that the tribunal is to be constituted and the arbitration conducted in London; and when it is farther stipulated that the arbitration is to be by two members of the Corn Exchange, "or their umpire, in the usual way," I think that that imports a reference to a known law and practice regulating the constitution and conduct of such arbitrations, and that can only be the law and practice of England. If that be so, London is the place of performance as well as the place of making the contract. No doubt the arbitrators might come to Scotland, if they thought it necessary or expedient to make inquiries in Skye. But it would be a question for their judgment whether it was expedient to do so or not, and whatever course they might think fit to take for the purpose of informing their minds, the main seat of the arbitration must still be England. The material considerations are that the tribunal must be constituted in London, and the powers of the arbitrators and their umpire must be determined and their proceedings must be regulated by the law under which they are living. We have constant experience of questions on which parties to an arbitration find it necessary to appeal to the Court; and I see no room for doubt that if both parties had been willing to carry out their agreement to submit, and questions of that kind had arisen, they must necessarily have been brought before the English Courts, and determined according to the law of England. We have no jurisdiction over the arbitrators, and we are not acquainted with the law and practice to which the contract refers by the use of the words "in the usual way." We do not know how the tribunal is constituted—whether the arbitrators appoint their umpire, or whether the umpire is named by the parties; on what conditions the functions of the arbitrators may be devolved upon the umpire; what are the specific powers of either in working out the arbitration; or what remedy the parties would have in case of misconduct. These would have been questions for the English Courts. I cannot conceive that the arbitrators themselves should have regard to any law but their own in the conduct of their own proceedings, even if it be assumed that they might be called upon to give effect to some foreign law in adjudicating between the parties. And if the constitution and procedure of the tribunal is to be regulated by the law of England, I think the intrinsic validity of the contract of submission must be determined by the law of England also.

—It is not immaterial to observe that our jurisdiction over the defenders depends on the mere accident that somebody in Scotland is in possession of certain sacks belonging to them, which are said to be of the value of £3, 6s. 8d., and which the pursuers have arrested. I do not suggest that the law we are to administer is dependent on the manner in which jurisdiction is founded. But it is a consideration that ought not to be overlooked in construing the contract, that but for the accident of the defenders possessing moveables of very trifling value which have been arrested in Scotland, the pursuer must have gone to England to sue upon the contract. Can we hold that if he had appealed to the Court in England to enforce the contract of submission by the appointment of arbitrators or otherwise, the English Judges must have declined to adjudicate upon that question according to their own law, and have come to this Court for instruction as to the meaning or legal effect of the contract to submit? I cannot but think that they would have determined the validity of the contract, just as they would determine any question that might arise during the working out of the arbitration, according to the law which they themselves administer as the law of the place where the contract was made and where also it is to be performed.

No. 42.

Nov. 30, 1893.
Taliaker Dis-
tillery v.
Hamlyn & Co.

It is said that we must assume that an English Court would give effect to the law of Scotland, because this is to all intents and purposes a Scotch contract. But that is the question to be determined. The argument is that all the substantive obligations of the contract for the purchase, treatment, and delivery of the grains in question are to be performed in Scotland, and must be governed by the law of Scotland; and therefore that the ancillary obligation to refer disputes to arbitration must be governed by the same law, because two different systems of law cannot be applied to the same contract. That does not appear to me to be a very weighty consideration in the present case, because, as I have said, it is not alleged that there is any difference between the laws of England and Scotland, in so far as regards the main provisions of the contract. But if the obligations of a contract are separable, and one is to be performed in England and another in Scotland, I see no ground in principle for holding that the law of each country may not be incorporated in the contract for its own special purpose, and no farther. The more correct view seems to me to be that the agreement for arbitration is a distinct collateral agreement, and that the question we are to determine is whether it was the intention of the parties that that agreement should be carried into effect by an English or a Scotch arbitration. But if the contract is one and indivisible, I think it false reasoning to argue from the other stipulations taken separately and apart from the arbitration clause that the contract is entirely Scotch, and therefore to conclude that the arbitration clause must be governed by the law of Scotland. The arbitration clause may be of the greatest possible significance in determining the law with reference to which the parties intended to contract. If the contract were to be construed differently, according as it is held to be English or Scotch, then I think the stipulation for an English arbitration would be an argument,—I do not say a conclusive argument,—for preferring the English construction. For the ground on which so much importance has been attached to the place of performance appears to be that it is there that the parties must have anticipated that their mutual obligations would be discussed and enforced. But that ground is displaced if they have stipulated that their rights shall be determined by a tribunal of their own selection elsewhere than at the place of performance.

In the present case, however, we are not embarrassed by any conflict of laws, except with reference to the constitution of the tribunal to which the parties have agreed to refer their differences. If their agreement to that effect is to be governed by the law of Scotland it is ineffectual. I admit that they cannot alter the law by their agreement. But I think it was open to them to contract, first, that they should not have recourse to the ordinary Courts of either England or Scotland, but to a tribunal of their selection; and, secondly, that this private forum should be constituted and carry out its proceedings either in

No. 42. England or Scotland as they thought fit. They have, in my opinion, agreed that it shall be constituted in England; and I think it is for the law of England to determine whether that agreement can be carried into effect.

"The sum contained in the above-mentioned bond appears to have arisen from the consolidation of some moneys contained in prior bonds belonging to the kirk-session. . . . With regard to the sums contained in the remaining bonds, the minutes of the kirk-session shew that these were derived from accumulations of interest on investments in name of the kirk-session. The funds contained in all these bonds represent accumulations in the hands of the kirk-session derived from church-door collections, mortcloth money, ecclesiastical fines, and other moneys forming the usual sources of a kirk-session's revenue, including certainly one legacy, and possibly one or two more, left specially to them for the benefit of the poor, and accumulations of interest upon invested balances.

"The minute-books of the heritors do not go further back than the year 1774, and down to 1799 contain no reference to matters connected with the relief of the poor of the parish. The records of the kirk-session contain nothing to shew that prior to 1711 the heritors were consulted in regard to the funds which were applied for the benefit of the poor.

. . . . In that year . . . is found the first mention of joint action between the kirk-session and the heritors in maintenance of the poor." The case then set forth the following minute of meeting held on 22d October 1711, as engrossed in the minute-book of the kirk-session:—

"Sedt. of the heritors—the Laird of Pencaitland . . . the minister, and whole elders. The Act of the Justices of the Peace, of the 2d October 1711, ordaining each parish to maintain their own poor, and for discouraging of vagabonds and stranger beggars, was produced and read. In compliance therewith, there was produced a list of the poor who need maintenance within the parish of Pencaitland, which being considered by the heritors, minister, and elders, they modify the names underwritten to be paid to the said poor, ilk one of them for their own part, as is after divided, viz. :—[Here follows list of twelve poor people, total vote £163, 8s. Scots].

"And the meeting having considered how much of the said sum the poor-box of the said parish is able to afford yearly, it's unanimously agreed that when the Sacrament is given, the session, out of their collections, do pay £100 Scots, so that there remains to be paid by the parish £63, 8s., which sum, with the constable's and collector's fees, they are to set upon the heritors, conform to their valued rents in the parish, and it was remitted to the heritors to think upon fit persons to be constables."

"The session, are hereby authorised and required either to continue to hold all such property and revenues for the behoof of such parochial board, or to make, grant, subscribe, and deliver such dispositions, assignments, and conveyances of all such property and revenues as may be necessary to enable such parochial board to administer the same for behoof of the poor of such parish or combination."

Kirk-Session
of Pencaitland
v. Inspector of Poor of Pen-
caitland.

" This arrangement continued until 1714, when the kirk-session passed the following minute, of date November 15, viz. :—' . . . The session, taking under their consideration the state of the poor, and finding how difficult it was for them to get payment of that proportion of the ordinary maintenance of the poor which had been formerly agreed upon to be paid by the heritors and their various tenants, do resolve to stretch themselves as far as possible, and to assay the maintaining the most necessitous of the said poor for one year without troubling the said heritors and their tenants therewith, any further than what is advanced in the weekly collections.'

" The next reference to joint action of the heritors and kirk-session for maintenance of the poor is found in the records of the kirk-session under a minute of date July 28th 1728, which bears :—' This day was publicly intimate in this congregation an Act of the Justices of the Peace of the shire of Haddington for maintenance of the poor within the said shire, of date 2d July (1728), appointing the heritors, ministers, and elders of the respective parishes to meet and provide for the maintenance of their poor, and for repressing of vagrant beggars within their respective parishes, as the said Act more fully bears ; and the heritors and elders in this congregation being appointed to meet for this purpose on Monday, the 5th August next, the session at this meeting did advise upon what was fit for them to propose to the foresaid meeting ; and they, considering that this session had hitherto supplied their own poor out of the public collection at the church door and other funds under their own management, without desiring any particular stent to be laid upon the heritors and others concerned in the parish, they did agree to continue in the same practice for the ensuing year, with this provision, that the heritors and others concerned, according to the order of the foresaid Act of the Justices of the Peace, will provide a fund for maintaining a constable and for freeing the parish of vagabonds and stranger beggars.'

" Thereafter the minutes of the kirk-session down to the beginning of the present century shew that the kirk-session continued year by year to make up by themselves a list of the poor and to relieve them, as well as to give other poor persons not on the list occasional assistance in name of 'charity' from the income of the funds collected and administered by them, including the bonds above mentioned, leaving to the heritors the duty of providing and paying for the constable as above mentioned." From a table laid before the kirk-session on 4th April 1745 it appeared that for the seven years preceding the average annual disbursements on account of the listed poor had been £172, 0s. 6d. Scots, and on account of the incidental poor £213, 7s. 5d. Scots. " From this time until the end of the century the kirk-session continued to give relief to both classes, the listed poor receiving quarterly payments and the incidental relief being given from time to time. The total given incidentally usually exceeded by a considerable sum the total of the quarterly payments to the listed poor, some of whom are often found receiving incidental relief."

On 12th December 1799 the heritors and the kirk-session held a joint meeting on the subject, " and the minute of that day, which appears in the heritors' minute-book, and which is the first minute relating to the poor which is to be found in the heritors' records, bears,—' The heritors and kirk-session having met this day at noon, agreeably to a call from the precentor's desk on the 1st curt. . . . The meeting having taken into consideration the state of the poor at present on the parish roll for ten months from 4th November 1799 to 4th September 1800, finds that the sum of £74, 6s. (exclusive of the funds and collections) at least will be found necessary for supporting them for these ten months at the present prices of meal, have resolved to take a bill of £71, 13s. 4d., granted by the late Mrs Hamilton to the session of Pencaitland, of date 13th November 1779, for that purpose.' The proceeds of that bill were accordingly carried into the kirk-session treasurer's account of 1799-1800, in addition to the interest on 'bonds belonging to the kirk-session,' and the expenditure of the whole upon the maintenance of the poor appears in the kirk-session treasurer's cash-account.

Kirk-Session
of Pencaitland
v. Inspector of Poor of Pen-
caitland.

"The income of the fund in question from the commencement of the present century down to the year 1845 was not specially devoted to one class of poor. The minutes and accounts of the kirk-session subsequent to 1799 do not distinguish between listed and incidental poor, and after 1820 there is no listed poor regularly given in the minutes of the kirk-session."

The following minute occurred in the heritors' minute-book of date 5th April 1803:—"Sederunt—George Bogue, Esq., of Woodhall, presses, . . . the Revd. Mr Pyper, minister, Mr Rate, elder, James Broomfield, session-clerk. Mr Pyper, in name of the kirk-session, laid before the meeting a state of the session funds and of the annual expenditure of money for the support of the poor of the parish. . . . The meeting, having considered the statement, find it necessary to provide for these articles of charge with all convenient speed; and to prepare their way to accomplish this end, they direct that the opinion of some person or persons learned in the law be obtained respecting the bonds due to the session, that it may be known to all concerned whether or not the amount of these bonds must be applied to the relief of the poor before an assessment can be legally laid on the parish for that purpose."

The opinion of Mr Matthew Ross, advocate, was obtained, and was "considered by the heritors and kirk-session at their next meeting, held on 12th April 1803, the minute of which runs as follows in the heritors' minute-book:— . . . 'In respect the opinion of Mr Ross is by no means clear and decisive upon the point in question, and as it appears a case directly similar is presently in dependence before the Court of Session, they resolve to await the decision of that case before adopting any final regulation. But as there is an urgent necessity for money to clear off what is actually due by the kirk-session, and to answer the demand that will be necessary for the current quarter and up to the 1st August next, the meeting resolve to make a legal assessment upon the parish to the amount of £60 sterling, to be apportioned and levied according to law, without prejudice; on the contrary, expressly reserving to the meeting, so soon as the point is legally determined and fixed, that in case it shall appear the heritors have a power to uplift and apply the principal sums due by bonds for the relief of the poor, then the heritors will be entitled to receive back the sums with interest paid by them respectively in consequence of the present assessment.

"Thereafter the meeting proceeded to take under consideration the persons presently upon the poor's-roll, with the allowances made to each, and having examined such of these persons themselves who were able to appear in person, and inquire into the circumstances of their respective cases, they continue the roll as it present stands. And the meeting consider themselves much obliged by the attention and trouble which the kirk-session have paid to the management of the poor, approve of their proceedings for the time past, and return their best thanks to them."

"Nothing further, however, appears to have been done after receiving counsel's opinion, and the heritors and kirk-session continued to act on

No. 43. the principle formerly adopted, of the kirk-session making annually a report of what was required beyond the ordinary funds arising from interest of bonded money, collections at the church doors, and mortcloth dues, and the heritors assessing themselves for the difference; and the kirk-session receiving this assessment through their clerk or treasurer; and the money so received from the heritors was disbursed by the kirk-session along with the interest on the said bonds (which bonds they treated as capital) and church-door collections, and other sources of annual income already referred to."

Kirk-Session
of Pencaitland
v. Inspector of Poor of Pen-
caitland.

In consequence of the Disruption of the Church of Scotland the heritors, at a meeting on 10th June 1843, appointed (as appeared from their minute) a committee of their own number "to co-operate" with an elder, who apparently did not secede, "in the management of the poor's funds till a regular session is in the parish."

"It is admitted by the first parties that their predecessors in office at the time of the passing of the Poor-Law Act of 1845 acted as if they were of opinion that the 52d section of that Act operated as a transfer of all funds held by the kirk-session for the behoof of the poor to the new parochial board." On 18th December 1847, the following minute of the parochial board occurred,—“The board having taken into consideration the 52d section of the Act 8 and 9 Vict. cap. 83, resolve in terms thereof, and in accordance with instructions from the Board of Supervision, that all the moneys belonging to the heritors and kirk-session of this parish be now transferred from them to the parochial board. . . .” No formal transfer of the bonds was made by the kirk-session in favour of the parochial board, but the latter got the custody of the bonds, drew the interest arising therefrom from the term of Martinmas 1845 to that term in 1884, and held the bonds from December 1847 up to the 7th of June 1886, when the bonds were discharged and the proceeds, with accrued interest from Martinmas 1884, was paid over to the kirk-session, the parochial board being of opinion (as appeared from the discharge which was granted both by the kirk-session and the parochial board) that the transfer to the board in 1847 was erroneous under the Act. The first parties, however, agreed that this discharge should not be pleaded as a bar to the right of the second party to receive and administer the fund if legally entitled to do so under the Act.

The interest on the bonds during the time that it was drawn by the parochial board was applied for the benefit of the statutory poor exclusively. The proceeds of the bonds, on being received by the kirk-session, were separately invested from the rest of the kirk funds. The amount so invested at the date of the case was £590.

The first parties maintained “that, as the funds in question were obtained by them from the sources mentioned in the foregoing statement of facts, are vested in the ‘minister and kirk-session,’ and were managed exclusively by them and employed for behoof of the occasional poor as well as the listed poor . . . they . . . were not affected in their right and duty as to the said fund by section 52 of the Poor-Law Act of 1845,” and they claimed “to be entitled to hold and administer the fund for the benefit of the poor—occasional or not—as they think best in the discharge of the functions of a kirk-session.”

The second party maintained “that the 52d section of the Poor-Law Act of 1845 operated as a transfer to the parochial board of said funds, and that said Act confers on the board the right to demand and receive payment thereof from the first parties, and to administer the capital or income for behoof of the poor having a statutory claim for relief.”

The question of law was,—“Did the 52d section of the Poor-Law Act of 1845 vest in the parochial board a right to receive and administer the fund in question?" No. 43.

Argued for the first parties;—The bonds were taken in the name of the kirk-session alone, not in that of the heritors and the kirk-session. Prima facie, therefore, "the poor of the parish" did not mean the legal poor only, and the onus was on the second parties to prove that "poor" was used in its more restricted sense, so as to bring the fund within the 52d section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845.¹ This onus they had failed to discharge. The source of the funds was the ordinary revenue of a kirk-session; the persons who had received the benefit of the funds (down to the passing of the Poor-Law Act, 1845) were not the legal poor exclusively, but the poor generally; and the administration of the funds had down to 1845 been entirely in the hands of the kirk-session, the heritors, in last century at all events, taking little or nothing to do with the relief of the poor, and contributing little or nothing by way of assessment towards their support. In the administration of the fund the occasional poor had received more from it than the listed poor. The question in the case ought, therefore, to be answered in the negative.

Argued for the second party;—The case was ruled by the cases of *Kinglassie*² and Aberdour,³ particularly the latter. Every argument which had been advanced here for the first parties had been rejected by anticipation in the case of Aberdour, which settled that "poor of the parish" prima facie meant the legal poor exclusively, as in a question under the Act. The onus, therefore, was on the first parties. Then the source of the funds was the same there as here, as also was the title; there too, as here, the general poor, and not merely the legal poor, enjoyed the benefit, and the control of the heritors was rather by way of acquiescence in what the kirk-session did than by active administration, although here the case of the parochial board was stronger looking to the course of administration from the beginning of the present century. The question ought therefore to be answered in the affirmative.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The sums of money here in question came into the hands of the kirk-session of Pencaitland in name and for the use and behoof of the poor of the said parish, and in the cases which have been decided already under the 52d section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, the Court have always considered the history of a fund so coming into the hands of a kirk-session for behoof of the poor of the parish in order to ascertain upon what footing the kirk-session hold the fund. In the cases of Kinglassie, 5 Macph. 869, and Aberdour, 8 Macph. 176, the Court, having considered the history of the fund, held that though standing in name of the kirk-session the fund truly belonged to the parochial board—the heritors and kirk-session—for behoof of the "legal poor," and therefore fell under the 52d section of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, and was transferred by that Act to the parochial board.

In this case it does appear that in early times, and for a considerable period, the kirk-session acted alone ; indeed, till the year 1711 the records of the kirk-session contain nothing that would indicate that the heritors took any part in the management of the money that was applied to the relief of the poor. In 1711, however, there is found evidence of joint action. The minute of 22d October 1711 bears,—“The Act of the Justices of Peace, of date the 2d of October 1711, ordaining each parish to maintain their own poor, and for discouraging of vagabonds and stranger beggars, was produced and read. In compliance therewith there was produced a list of the poor who need maintenance within the parish of Pencaitland, which being considered by the heritors, minister, and elders, they modify the soumes underwritten to be paid to the said poor, ilk one of them for their own part as is after divided,” and the minute further bears that a sum of £100 Scots was ordered to be paid by the kirk-session, the heritors on the other hand assessing themselves for £63 odds. Now, that plainly is a proceeding by which the heritors and kirk-session took action together for the relief of the legal poor. Then in 1728 we find from a minute of the kirk-session, under date July 28th, 1728, that in accordance with an Act of the Justices of the Peace of the shire of Haddington for maintenance of the poor within the said shire, of date 2d July 1728, appointing the heritors, ministers, and elders of the respective parishes to meet and provide for the maintenance of their poor, and for repressing of vagrant beggars within their respective parishes as the said Act more fully bears, the session did advise upon what was fit for them to propose at the meeting of the heritors, ministers, and elders which was appointed to be held, and accordingly what they advised was, that as the funds which they had charge of were sufficient to meet the management of the poor, there was no need to do anything more, provided the heritors would provide a constable to keep the parish free of “vagabonds and stranger beggars.”

Apparently for some considerable time after this the actual work was done by the kirk-session, and the funds being sufficient, there was no need for any special calling together of the heritors, and we find in a subsequent minute that the heritors expressed their thanks to the kirk-session for doing this work. But in 1799 there was a meeting at which several of the heritors were present, and others were represented by mandatories, and they took into consideration the state of the poor, and found “that the sum of £74, 6s. (exclusive of the funds and collections) at least will be found necessary for supporting them (the poor).” Accordingly they resolved to take a bill for that purpose. Now, that again was a joint action dealing with the funds which were in the hands of the kirk-session, and providing other funds to meet a deficiency.

In 1803 we find a meeting was held at which the heritors, ministers, and session-clerk were present, and it was there intimated that the income from the bonds would be insufficient to meet the charges for the relief of the poor for the year, and accordingly the meeting directed that the opinion of counsel should be taken upon the point whether or not the amount of the bonds should be applied to the relief of the poor before an assessment could be legally laid on the parish for that purpose. Accordingly a memorial was laid before counsel, and the question submitted to counsel was, whether or not the amount of the bonds must be applied to the relief of the poor before the heritors could lay on a legal assessment for the purpose? That question could only be asked on the footing that the sums in these bonds were for the relief of the poor for whom the kirk-session and heritors were liable, and the question asked was whether they could assess the parish while they had this available sum? That seems to me a plain negation of the argument that at that time these sums were looked upon as being entirely subject to the will of the kirk-session. It is clear that at that time there was no dispute that these bonds were held for behoof of the poor of the parish generally. After that a report was made from time to time by the kirk-session as to the state of the funds, and the heritors assessed themselves from time to time for such sum as was necessary to make up the amount required. This is all in absolute consistency with the case of Kinglassie, which was considered by the whole Court, and decided unanimously. It has been suggested that there ought to be a certain apportionment of the fund here in question, seeing that part of it was formerly applied to the relief of the casually destitute, and that some provision ought to be made out of it for that class of persons. That idea received some countenance from the Lord President in the case of Aberdour, but it received no support from the rest of the Court, and I think it must now be held as settled that wherever we find that a fund has been applied by the heritors and kirk-session acting jointly, to the relief of the legal poor, that fund must now be handed over to the parochial board as representing the legal poor. I have, therefore, no doubt in this case, and following the decisions in the cases of Kinglassie and Aberdour, I think that we must answer this question in the affirmative.

Kirk-Session
of Pencaitland
v. Inspector of Poor of Pen-
caitland.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of opinion that the fund in question was at the passing of the Poor-Law Act, 1845, vested in the heritors and kirk-session of Pencaitland “for the use or benefit of the poor of the parish.” I do not think that it is at all material that one of the bonds stood in the name of the kirk-treasurer for the time being for the use and behoof of the poor of the parish, and that the others were in favour of the kirk-session for behoof of the poor of the parish, for I think that looking to the whole history of the fund which is given distinctly in the case before us, so far as it was vested in the kirk-treasurer or kirk-session, it was, to use the language of the statute, vested “in trustees or other parties on behalf of the heritors and kirk-session.” I think that the kirk-session held the funds on behalf of the heritors and kirk-session as the legal guardians of the poor, and the legal administrators of the funds for the use and benefit of the poor, and that if any question had arisen prior to 1845, it would have been decided that notwithstanding the terms of the investment these funds were held on behalf of the heritors and kirk-session as the legal guardians of the poor of the parish. If I am right in this there is an end of the case, because the statute says that where any property shall, at the time of the passing of the Act, belong to or be vested in the heritors and kirk-session of any parish for the use or benefit of the poor of such parish, it shall be lawful for the parochial board of each such parish to receive and administer such property. My opinion therefore is, without any doubt or difficulty, and irrespective of any decision in the matter, that the parochial board is entitled and bound to receive and administer these funds. I am also of opinion that the decisions are all to this effect, although there is language in the opinions of some of the Judges who decided these cases which I should not myself have used.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think I must follow the cases of Kinglassie and Aberdour, and following these cases, I must decide in favour of the parochial board.

No. 43.

LORD TRAYNER.—Looking to the cases of Kinglassie and Aberdour, I think the question put to us should be answered in the affirmative.

Dec. 8, 1893.
Young v. Trustee, Assets, and Investment
Insurance Co.,
Limited.

Insurance—Insurance of deposit-receipt—Default by bank—Reconstruction of bank.—An insurance company guaranteed payment to a depositor of the deposit-receipt of a bank "after default" in payment by the bank. The bank stopped payment and failed to pay the deposit-receipt at due date. It was afterwards reconstructed. In an action against the insurance company at the instance of the depositor, held that the bank was in default, and that the pursuer was entitled to a decree for the amount of his deposit-receipt.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.

ON 4th June 1890 John Young deposited £500 with Queensland National Bank, Limited, as a fixed deposit for three years, the due date being the 4th June 1893. On 6th June 1890 he effected an insurance of the deposit with the Trustee, Assets, and Investment Insurance Company, Limited, Glasgow, under which they guaranteed payment of the principal sum of £500, with the interest payable thereon, on the following among other conditions:—"After default has been made in payment by the bank pursuant to the notice to them recalling the money, and upon a transfer being made to the company of the deposit-note and the money due thereunder, so as to place the company in a position legally to sue for such money as creditors of the bank, the company will pay to the assured the principal money for the time being due under the deposit, with any interest then due thereon."

On 15th May 1893 the bank stopped payment, and Mr Young having failed on 4th June 1893 to obtain payment from it of the principal sum of £500 contained in his deposit-receipt, and £9, 11s. 1d., being the interest then payable thereon, claimed payment from the insurance company.

The company declined to pay, and Mr Young then raised an action against them concluding for payment of the two sums of £500 and £9, 11s. 1d.

The defenders in their answers set forth the condition above quoted, and averred "that the Queensland National Bank, Limited, after it stopped payment was reconstructed, and is at present carrying on business, and that default has not been made in payment by the bank in the sense of the first condition of the policy above set forth. . . . Further, the pursuer is not in a position to transfer to them the said deposit-receipt and the money due thereunder, so as to place them in a position legally to sue therefor as creditors of the Queensland National Bank, Limited, as it existed at the date of the said policy, and in terms of the said conditions therein."

The defenders pleaded;—2. The defenders are entitled to absolvitor, in respect (1) there has not been default in payment by the bank in the sense of the conditions in the said policy; (2) the conditions in the said policy, subject to the limitations of which the same was granted, have not been fulfilled; (3) the defenders are not due or resting owing the sums sued for.

On 8th November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) decerned in terms of the conclusions of the summons.* No. 44.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—There had been no default, for the bank was again carrying on business, and new documents of debt had been issued by it, which was equivalent to payment of the original deposit-receipts. Besides, the bank had been so reconstituted under the laws of Australia that no present action for recovery of sums due by it was competent. The pursuer therefore had failed to implement the conditions of the policy, for he was not able to put the defenders in the position of creditors legally entitled to sue the bank, at anyrate not to the same effect as at the date of the policy.

Dec. 8, 1893.
Young v. Trustee, Assets, and Investment Insurance Co., Limited.

The pursuer was not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Lord Ordinary has informed us that no argument was forthcoming for the defenders. I must do Mr Grierson the justice to say that a slight advance has been made on that state of matters. He has said a good deal, but unfortunately the record says nothing, and contains no foundation for the argument which counsel has stated or suggested.

On the facts admitted it is quite clear that the bank has stopped payment, and is unable to meet the demands of its creditors, and, amongst others, the claim of this depositor, whose money was due on the 4th June 1893, and was not then paid. There can be no question then about default of payment. Accordingly I do not see how, prima facie, the defenders have any answer to this claim.

But then they maintain that the conditions of the policy have not been fulfilled. There is nothing on the record to support that argument. They have been offered all the rights that the depositor has, and they do not say what more they require. They darkly hint that some reconstruction of the bank may give them trouble in working out their remedies against the defaulting debtor, but nothing tangible is either averred or pleaded in this regard which forms an answer to the pursuer's claim.

LORD ADAM.—I am also for adhering.

LORD KINNEAR.—I also agree. I think the defence is irrelevant. It is stated by counsel that there has been a change in the constitution of the bank in Australia which, by the laws of Australia, so alters the position of the creditors as to make it impossible for them now to pursue their claims to the same

* "OPINION.—No maintainable defence to the pursuer's claim is stated on record, and I am not surprised that no argument was forthcoming for the defenders. I shall therefore content myself with saying that, in my opinion, the pursuer having offered to assign to the defenders all his rights against the Queensland National Bank, and tendered them his deposit-receipt indorsed, is entitled, under his policy, to payment of the sum sued for.

"The sum deposited with the Queensland National Bank was repayable on 4th June 1893, and the bank was and is admittedly in default. The pursuer is therefore entitled to call on the defenders to implement their guarantee unconditionally. He has no concern with the steps that have been taken to reconstruct the bank. If they are successful so much the better for the defenders, who will stand in the pursuer's shoes, as it was intended by the conditions of the policy they should do in the event which has happened. But no reason has been suggested why the present condition of the bank should affect the pursuer's claim against the defenders, and I can see none."

No. 44. effect as at the date of the policy. How that may be, I do not know. There is no averment on record which would lend support to that argument. All that the defenders say is that they believe "that the pursuer is not in a position to transfer to them the deposit-receipt and the money thereunder so as to place them in a position legally to sue therefor." The pursuer, however, was quite ready to transfer the receipt, and that in my opinion satisfied his obligation.

No. 45. THOMAS BARR, Pursuer (Respondent).—Dickson—Younger.
JAMES F. WALDIE, Defender (Appellant).—Salvesen—A. S. D. Thomson.
Dec. 8, 1893.
Barr v.
Waldie.

Sale—Contract—Construction—"Equal monthly quantities of 300 tons maximum."—On 5th March 1891 Waldie, a coalmaster, by sale-note contracted with Barr to sell 2500 tons of coal "in equal monthly quantities in lots of 300 tons maximum." A letter accompanying the sale-note stated "that if necessary you"—Barr—"are to extend the period of delivery somewhat."

Barr neither asked for nor obtained delivery of any coal in March or in April. In May he asked for and got 24 tons, in June he asked for and got 4 tons, and during the succeeding months down to January 1892 he asked for and got deliveries of coal monthly, but of very varying quantities, the total amount delivered being 1071, leaving 1428 undelivered.

On 12th May 1891 Waldie wrote,—"If you cannot take up the coal now due for delivery under contract, I cannot bind myself to give it later on," and at various times afterwards he remonstrated with Barr for not taking delivery in terms of the contract. In February 1892 Waldie refused to make any further delivery under the contract, alleging that it was at an end.

Barr then raised an action against Waldie for damages for breach of contract.

Held that the contract imported that the deliveries of coal were to be in monthly quantities as nearly as might be of 300 tons each, but never more; that the pursuer therefore was himself in breach of contract in February 1892 when the defender refused to make any further delivery, and consequently that the defender fell to be assoldized.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of
Lanarkshire.

ON 5th March 1891 James Waldie, coalmaster, Glasgow, sold to Thomas Barr, coalmaster there, 2500 tons Skaterigg coal, conform to the following sale-note:—"I confirm sale to you of 2500 tons of Skaterigg cannel coal for shipment in equal monthly quantities to Brussels in lots of 300 tons maximum. Any detentions in transit, labour disputes, stoppages, or partial working of pits, accidents, or unforeseen delays excepted, and I guarantee nothing as to quality beyond the description herein specified—at 27s. 6d. stg. per ton, colliery weight—delivery being at pit. Payable net cash thirty days after despatch from pits."

In a letter accompanying this sale-note Waldie wrote,—"Referring to your Mr Urquhart's call yesterday evening, I enclose sale-note for the cannel then arranged for, and confirm further arrangements that, if necessary, you are to extend the period of delivery somewhat."

Barr did not ask for or receive any deliveries under the contract in the months of March and April 1891. In May he got 24 tons 19 cwt., in June 4 tons 17 cwt., in July 95 tons 6 cwt., in August none, in September 5 tons 11 cwt., in October 688 tons 13 cwt., in November 38 tons 4 cwt., in December 227 tons 7 cwt., in January 1892 6 tons 3 cwt.

In all 1071 tons 2 cwt. were delivered down to January 1892, leaving 1428 tons 18 cwt. then undelivered. No. 45.

Waldie having declined to make any further deliveries under the contract, Barr brought an action against him in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow for payment of £250 as damages. Dec. 8, 1893.
Barr v.
Waldie.

The pursuer averred,—“After the sale was made, parties by arrangement or agreement, or by acquiescence, so dealt with the question of delivery that the coal was not sent to Brussels, the quantities were never equal, and in some months there were practically no deliveries.”

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having illegally and unwarrantably cancelled said contract when the quantity of coal consigned on was undelivered, and the market value of the coal undelivered at the date of cancelling being at least equal to that stated, decree ought to be granted as craved, with costs.

The defender denied the alleged agreement or acquiescence, and pleaded;—(2) The period of the contract having expired at the end of November 1891, and the pursuer having failed, in breach of the contract, to take delivery of the coal tendered to him during that period, or a reasonable time after the expiry thereof, he is not entitled to delivery now from defender, or to damages.

A proof was allowed. There was no evidence that the defender ever refused to give delivery of coal to the pursuer until February 1892, when the defender intimated that the contract was at end. The defender sent the letters quoted below to the pursuer.*

On 25th July 1892 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—“Finds that the defender on 5th February wrongfully refused to implement the contract he had made with the pursuer to sell him 2500 tons of cannel coal as libelled, whereby the pursuer has sustained loss and damage: Finds that the damages are correctly stated in the condescendence; therefore decerns as craved.”

On appeal, the Sheriff (Berry) adhered.

The defender reclaimed. The arguments sufficiently appear from the opinions of the Court.¹

At advising,—

* 12th May 1891,—“Referring to my recent calls and conversation with your Messrs Urquhart and Clarkson, I confirm what I then stated, viz., that if you cannot take up the cannel now due for delivery under contract, I cannot bind myself to give it later on.”

17th June 1891,—“I am still waiting your orders for Skaterigg cannel, delivery of which is now overdue under contract.”

27th June 1891,—“Please note I am still without a reply to mine of 17th, and have again to ask you to see that orders are sent at once for the Skaterigg cannel, delivery of which is now much overdue, under contract.”

25th December 1891,—“As to your contract, the period expired on 5th inst., and any arrears are through you not taking it up in about equal monthly quantities, as per my letter to you of 17th and 22d June last, and repeated verbal communications during its currency.”

5th February 1892,—“Yours of yesterday received, and as stated by me in the conversation you refer to, your last contract with me for Skaterigg cannel has expired. If you wish further supplies of the cannel, I should be glad to quote.”

Barr v.
Waldie.

The contract alleged to be broken is in writing, and is in these terms,—“I confirm sale to you of 2500 tons of Skaterigg cannel coal, for shipment in equal monthly quantities to Brussels, in lots of 300 tons maximum,” and so on.

It is not according to the fact, as I understand, and indeed it is not alleged, that the defender ever refused to deliver 2500 tons of coal in equal monthly quantities of 300 tons maximum. It appears, on the other hand, from the evidence that it suited the purpose and business of the pursuer to take delivery of no coal at all in the first month of the contract, the month of March, and also in the month of April. In the month of May he asked for and got delivery of 24 tons, in June he asked for and got delivery of 4 tons, and between June 1891 and January 1892 he asked for and got delivery of about 1000 tons altogether. In all from the date of the contract, 5th March 1891, down to January following, when the supply ceased, he asked and got delivery of 1071 tons, and that leaves a balance of 1429 tons, which he says the defender has refused to deliver, and it is this refusal which is the breach of contract alleged. The defender repeatedly remonstrated with the pursuer for the slowness and irregularity with which he took delivery of the coal, and at last the defender declined to go on any further. At the end of January 1892, by which date, according to the defender's view, the whole coal ought to have been delivered, and less than half had actually been delivered, the pursuer desired him to deliver the balance, but the defender refused to do so, and the question is whether that refusal constituted a breach of contract or not?

Now, the first question which naturally occurs here, and which we put repeatedly to the pursuer's counsel in the course of the argument, is, what is the meaning of the contract under which the defender undertook to deliver 2500 tons of coal in equal monthly quantities of 300 tons maximum? We pressed it upon the pursuer's counsel to put any interpretation on the contract consistent with the pursuer's conduct, against which the defender, as I have said, repeatedly remonstrated. What construction is consistent with no delivery in March, no delivery in April, 24 tons only in May, 4 tons in June, and about 1000 tons between June and January? No answer was given to that question, and I think that the contract is incapable of any construction which would shew that the pursuer's conduct was in accordance with his rights under the contract. But assuming, contrary to my own opinion, that the pursuer was not himself in breach of contract when in February he made his demand that the defender should deliver the balance of the coal, it would be impossible to sustain his claim for damages unless he could shew in what quantities and at what times the defender was bound to deliver the coal which had not been delivered by January. We put it to the pursuer's counsel within what time and in what quantities was the defender bound, according to his construction of the contract, to deliver the balance of the coal? Was it to be delivered all at once, or in equal quantities, and if in equal quantities, in what equal quantities, and if not in equal quantities, in what quantities? We could get no answer to these questions either, and therefore, even if the pursuer were otherwise right, I think it would be impossible to sustain his claim to damages for breach of contract, since he has failed to specify within what time and in what quantities the defender was bound under the contract to deliver the balance of the coal.

On the whole matter, and without going into details, my opinion is, that when the pursuer made his demand in February that the defender should continue the delivery of the coal, the pursuer was himself in breach of the contract. I concur in the interpretation put on the contract by the defender. I think that its legal meaning and effect is that deliveries are to take place in equal monthly quantities of about 300 tons each. The deliveries are never to exceed 300 tons, but they may be a little less. Any other construction would leave it in the buyer's option to fix the equal monthly quantity at what amount he pleased—it might be 10 tons or even 1 ton. But I think that the rational meaning of the contract is that the buyer is to take and the seller is to deliver about 300 tons a-month until the whole 2500 is made up. Now it is not the fact,—it is not even alleged,—that the defender ever refused to give delivery on that footing; the pursuer, on the other hand, never acted on that construction of the contract. I therefore think that when the pursuer made his demand in February he was himself in breach of contract, and consequently I am of opinion that we ought to recall the judgment of the Sheriff, and, after findings in fact in accordance with the views which I have expressed, assolvie the defender.

Barr v.
Waldie.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The contract on which this action is laid is dated in March 1891, and is thus expressed,—“I confirm sale to you of 2500 tons of Skaterigg cannel coal for shipment in equal monthly quantities to Brussels, in lots of 300 tons maximum.” The deliveries under it were very irregular. The pursuer ordered no coal and took delivery of no coal in the first two months. He ordered and received 24 tons in May and 4 in June. At the end of January 1892 he had ordered and received 1071 tons. The defender refused to make any further delivery. Hence the pursuer has brought this action of damages.

The pursuer maintained that he was entitled to require the defender to deliver in the first month such reasonable quantity of coal as he might prescribe not exceeding 300 tons, and that that quantity became the amount deliverable during each succeeding month until the contract was completed. Subject to such restraint as is involved in the word reasonable, he claims the right of fixing the duration of the contract, as its duration would necessarily depend on the amount required in the first month of its existence. But from his difficulty in defining, and in indicating the means of defining, a reasonable quantity, he did not confine himself to this view. His ultimate position was that he was entitled to order for the first month any quantity he chose, and that that quantity became the amount deliverable in the succeeding months.

The defender, on the other hand, contended that the only fair construction of the contract is, that deliveries were to be made of about 300 tons in each month.

The case of the pursuer depends on the fact that a maximum is fixed. It is said that by fixing a maximum without defining the amount of the monthly deliveries, the contract necessarily gave to the buyer the power of ordering for the first month any amount within the maximum. I am unable to hold that he had any such power. A mercantile document like that which is before us must be construed reasonably, and I could not imagine a more unreasonable construction than to hold that a power was given to the buyer by which he might indefinitely prolong the execution of the contract and reduce it to an absurdity. If we are to judge of the meaning of the parties by their actions, it is very plain that it never occurred to either to give to the contract any such interpretation. The pursuer did not imagine that he was limited by the amount of his first order. He acted under the very opposite belief.

Nor can I see how this construction would avail the pursuer. He ordered no coal during either of the first two months. On his theory the contract would be brought to an end; for he could not demand in any month more than he ordered in the first. His first order in the third month was for 24 tons. If the deliveries were to be regulated by this amount it is very unlikely that he could take benefit under such a contract.

But if we cannot hold that the buyer has the power of determining the amount of the monthly deliveries, we must find from the contract what these deliveries are to be. If we cannot, the contract is incapable of execution, and therefore incapable of sustaining any claim for damages, for we would be unable to declare what are the obligations or rights of the parties. Any such result must, if possible, be avoided, and I think that if it were necessary we would be justified in doing some violence to the language of the contract in order to avoid it.

The words are, "in equal monthly quantities in lots of 300 tons maximum." The word "maximum" expresses a stipulation in favour of the seller, so as to limit his obligation to deliver. It is against the buyer in so far as it deprives him of the right to require the delivery of larger quantities. It suggests that the buyer has the power to take delivery in smaller lots. But there is nothing more than a suggestion unless we can find from the contract itself what these smaller lots may be. I cannot do so when I have rejected the construction that the deliveries can be fixed at the pleasure of the buyer. If, then, the contract is to have any force I am driven to the conclusion that its true meaning is that deliveries were to be made and taken in equal monthly quantities as nearly as might be of 300 tons, but never to exceed that amount.

Nor in my opinion is there anything unreasonable in such a construction. When a buyer enters into a contract in which the seller stipulates for a maximum, we may without any unfairness infer that he is desirous of getting in every month as large a delivery as he can, and that the amount which is called a maximum is inserted as an approximate statement of the monthly deliveries—approximate because there cannot be exact equality. It is a construction which can harm neither party, and which, so far as I can see, furnishes the only rule for the execution of the contract.

The pursuer suggested another method of fixing the deliveries. Giving up the absolute power for which he contended, he said that he was bound to take a reasonable quantity per month, or, in other words, to fix a reasonable quantity for the first delivery. He did not claim to be the judge of what was reasonable; but he could not say how the quantity was to be determined. The obligations of parties to a contract cannot be settled by the judgment of others except in the sense of interpretation. The contract does not furnish the means of determining a reasonable amount, and if a Court or jury attempted to do so, they would, in my opinion, be stepping out of their province. For the application of a rule which is not furnished by the contract is necessarily an addition to the contract.

Again, the pursuer contended that he had a right to the delivery of 300 tons per month. I agree that he had a right to the delivery of that amount for each successive month after the date of the contract until the quantity was exhausted.

The deliveries were to be made monthly, and in equal quantities. If he did not choose to take delivery within these months, he had no further right. For the contract necessarily expired with the time required for the delivery of the total amount.

Barr v.
Waldie.

If I am right, there is an end of the pursuer's case in so far as it is laid on the contract alone. I think that he was in flagrant breach of it, and that he did not and would not take delivery at the time at which alone he was entitled to demand it. Even if the views which he has put forward with respect to the construction of the contract were sound, he did not act in conformity with them. He is in breach of the contract on his own construction of it. For he did not take equal monthly deliveries or make any provision under which the deliveries should be equal. On the contrary, he refused to take any quantity except that which suited him for the time, and he has so acted that if I were to hold that the contract was still in force, I do not see how I could determine the obligations of the seller under it. If I were to hold that the seller was bound to deliver the balance in equal monthly quantities, I think that I would be making an entirely new contract.

When we heard the case, the pursuer claimed damages under the contract alone. But as I read the record, his claim is founded more on a new agreement to be discovered from the course of dealing, and I think that it was on this view that his case was presented in the Sheriff Court. I can find no such agreement. The pursuer was in evident breach of the contract very soon after it was made. The defender complained of the breach, and desired orders for equal monthly quantities. On 12th May 1891 he wrote,—“If you cannot take up the cannel now due for delivery under contract I cannot bind myself to give it later on.” Nothing could be more distinct. While the pursuer was in breach of the contract the defender adhered to it, and he never altered his position. He gave great accommodation to the pursuer, but he made no new contract. I must say that I have no sympathy with the pursuer. He has, I think, been very generously dealt with, and I am surprised that he should have brought such an action as the present.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

LORD TRAYNER was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—“Sustain the appeal: Find that by sale-note, dated 5th March 1891, the defender sold to the pursuer 2500 tons of Skaterigg cannel coal for shipment in equal monthly quantities to Brussels, in lots of 300 tons maximum: Find that under said contract 1071 tons of said coals were delivered by the defender to the pursuer as follows, viz.:—In April no delivery, in May 24 tons 19 cwt.,” &c.: “Find that the defender was ready and willing to deliver coals to the pursuer under said contract in equal monthly quantities of 300 tons maximum in each of the months following the date of the contract: Find that the pursuer, in breach of said contract, wrongfully failed to take delivery thereof: Therefore recall the interlocutors appealed against: Assolzie the defender from the conclusions of the action: Find the defender entitled to expenses.”

Entail—Disentail—Consent of next heir—Security—Curator ad litem—Personal liability—Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), sec. 12.—The Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, sec. 12, enacts that “no curator ad litem who may give any consent under this Act shall incur any responsibility on account of such consent in respect of any alleged error in judgment, or inadequacy of consideration, or want of consideration therefor, unless it shall be alleged and proved that he acted corruptly in the matter.”

In a petition for disentail a curator ad litem for the next heir, in an agreement with the petitioner, consented to a disentail “on the terms hereinafter set forth,”—(1) It is hereby agreed “that the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the entailed estate of” the next heir is £16,000, for which the petitioner agrees to grant a bond and disposition in security; (2) in exchange for the said bond and disposition in security, the curator ad litem hereby agrees to deliver “a deed of consent to the disentail”; (3) and (4) by these articles it was agreed that the estate should be preferably burdened to the extent of £48,000, and that children’s provisions to the amount of £6000 should also be ranked preferably to the £16,000 bond.

The security having proved insufficient to cover the £16,000 bond, except to a very small extent, the next heir on reaching majority raised an action for payment of £16,000 against his curator in respect of his breach of duty in failing to take adequate security for the £16,000; (1) in allowing the bond to be postponed to the burdens mentioned in the agreement; and (2) in consenting to the disentail without seeing that the estate was cleared of certain other burdens not specified in the agreement.

The defender pleaded that the action was irrelevant, in respect that he was protected by section 12 of the Entail Act, 1882, there being no averment that he had acted corruptly.

Held that as no corruption was averred the action was irrelevant (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark with respect to the averment that the defender had failed to discover the existence of certain prior burdens not mentioned in the agreement).

2d DIVISION.
Lord Kin-
cairney.

ON 16th February 1893 Guy Maxwell Heron, eldest son of Captain John Maxwell Heron, brought an action against George Dunlop, Writer to the Signet, concluding for payment of £16,000, with interest from 30th October 1883, on the ground that the defender was liable in the sum concluded for on account of a breach of duty as curator ad litem to the pursuer, under a petition by Captain Maxwell Heron for disentail of the estates of Heron and Kirrourtree.

The pursuer averred;—Captain Maxwell Heron, proprietor of the entailed estates of Heron and Kirrourtree, on 6th March 1883 presented a petition for the disentail of these lands. The pursuer was at that time a minor, having been born on 8th June 1871, and the defender was, on 25th April 1883, appointed his curator ad litem.* Authority to

* By sec. 12 of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. cap. 53), it is enacted,—“In any application under the Entail Acts, to which the consent of any person is required, where such person is disabled under the provisions of the Entail Acts or otherwise from consenting by reason of being under age or subject to other legal incapacity, the Court shall appoint his tutor, curator, or other administrator, or one of his tutors, curators, or administrators, or another person, to be curator ad litem to the person under disability, and such curator ad litem may consent on his behalf, and no curator ad litem who may give any consent under this Act shall incur any responsibility on account of such consent in respect of any alleged error in judgment or in-record the instrument of disentail was pronounced on 18th February 1884. (Cond. 4) "The pursuer's father, Captain Heron, was born prior to 2d June 1851, and therefore it was necessary that the value of the pursuer's consent to the disentail should be ascertained. Both Captain Heron and the defender obtained valuations of the entailed lands for the purpose of ascertaining the value of the consent. The valuation of the lands obtained by Captain Heron was £93,000. That obtained by the defender was £91,000. By minute of agreement between Captain Heron and the defender, dated 1st November 1883,* the larger valuation was taken by the defender as the basis for computing the value of the pursuer's interest, and that interest was accordingly fixed at £16,000, and a adequacy of consideration, or want of consideration therefor, unless it shall be alleged and proved that he acted corruptly in the matter."

* The minute of agreement was in these terms :—"Whereas the said John Maxwell Heron, on or about the 6th day of March 1883, presented a petition to the Lords of Council and Session for authority to record an instrument of disentail of the said lands and estates, upon which petition the usual procedure followed ; and, inter alia, the said George Dunlop was appointed curator ad litem to the said Guy Maxwell Heron : And whereas the said George Dunlop, as curator ad litem foresaid, has agreed to consent to the said disentail on the terms hereinafter set forth : Therefore the parties have agreed, and do hereby agree, as follows, videlicet :—

"First, It is hereby agreed between the parties that the value in money of the expectancy or interest in the said entailed estate of the said Guy Maxwell Heron is £16,000, for which sum the said John Maxwell Heron hereby agrees and binds and obliges himself to grant to the said Guy Maxwell Heron a bond and disposition in security, in ordinary form and containing all usual and necessary clauses.

"Second, In exchange for the said bond and disposition in security, the said George Dunlop, as curator ad litem, hereby agrees to execute and deliver to the said John Maxwell Heron a deed of consent to the disentail of the said estate.

"Third, The said George Dunlop, as curator ad litem foresaid, further agrees to the said John Maxwell Heron borrowing a sum not exceeding £10,500 upon the security of the said lands, to rank preferably thereon to the said sum of £16,000, the said sum of £10,500 to be applied as follows, videlicet :—(First) £3000 to be applied in the redemption of one-half of the annuity of £700 presently payable out of the said lands and estate to Mrs Charlotte Burgoyne Maxwell Heron, mother of the said John Maxwell Heron ; (second) £2500 to be applied in repayment to the petitioner of sums expended by him on permanent improvements on the said estate, or to be hereafter so expended ; (third) in payment of any sums presently borrowed by the said John Maxwell Heron on the security of his life interest on the said estate and policies on his life, and the expenses hereinafter mentioned ; (fourth) the balance to be paid to the said John Maxwell Heron at such times and in such amounts as shall be fixed by James Howden and James Alexander Molleson, both chartered accountants, Edinburgh, and by the said George Dunlop, or by a majority of them in the event of their differing in opinion.

"Fourth, The parties hereto agree that the said sum of £10,500, to be borrowed as aforesaid, and the sum of £6000, being the provision to younger children contained in the first party's antenuptial contract of marriage, shall rank on the said estate preferably to the foresaid sum of £16,000 ; and that the whole other existing debt amounts to the sum of £37,500, as will be shewn by searches to be exhibited by the said first party to the said second party.

"Fifth, The whole expenses of the said application to the Court, the bond in favour of the said Guy Maxwell Heron, and of these presents, and incident thereon in any manner of way, shall be paid by the said John Maxwell Heron."

deed of consent to the disentail was lodged in the process by the defender." (Cond. 5) "It was the duty of the defender as curator ad litem, if he consented to take security over the lands before they were dis-entailed, instead of insisting on consignation of the value of the pursuer's consent, to see that the security was proper and adequate. The defender agreed, by the said minute of agreement of 1st November 1883, to accept security over the said lands instead of consignation; but he, in breach of his duty, failed to see that the security he obtained was proper and adequate. . . ."

The pursuer then averred;—(Cond. 6) "By the 4th clause of said minute of agreement, Captain Heron undertook to shew to the defender that the debts on the lands at that time amounted to £37,500. The defender took no steps to satisfy himself of the accuracy of Captain Heron's statement. On the contrary, he, in breach of his duty to the pursuer, failed to make any adequate inquiry as to the burdens on the lands, and their sufficiency to afford a security for the value of the pursuer's interest. If the defender had made adequate inquiry he would have found that besides the said sum of £37,500 the lands were burdened with— . . . (2) An annuity to Miss Heron of £150 per annum. This annuity became payable on the death of her mother, and its capitalised value then was £2700." (Cond. 7) "Not only did the defender not inquire as to the real amount of the burdens on the lands, but, by the minute of agreement he, while accepting a bond and disposition in security over the lands in return for the consent of the pursuer, agreed that Captain Heron should burden the lands by bonds taking priority to that in favour of the pursuer to the extent of £16,500," besides £2180 being the value of insurance premiums secured on the estate. . . . (Cond. 10) "Further, the defender, in breach of his duty foresaid, failed to make adequate inquiry as to the amount of the rent-roll of the said estates. For the year 1882,—being that immediately preceding the year in which the disentail petition was granted,—the rents amounted to £3215, 13s. 8d. From that sum there fell to be deducted payments of interest on prior burdens and expenses necessarily incurred over the estates, and there was consequently left only £479, 7s. 4d. to pay the interest (£800) on the bond which the defender had accepted for the payment of the pursuer's interest in the said lands."

The pursuer further averred;—(Cond. 11) "On 11th July 1887 Captain Heron was sequestrated, and Mr J. A. Robertson, C.A., was appointed his trustee. The interest on the bond to the insurance company fell into arrear, and the premiums on the policies of assurance which the said company held were not paid. In these circumstances the said company forced the trustee to sell the lands, which he did by public roup at the price of £60,000. After paying prior burdens on the lands, only £488, 11s. 6d., subject to deduction of expenses, was left to meet the pursuer's bond for £16,000. . . ." (Cond. 12) "The pursuer has thus lost the whole of the sum payable to him for his consent to the said disentail. The defender is liable for said loss in respect that he failed to have the value of the pursuer's consent paid or properly secured, having accepted as a security for payment of the said sum of £16,000 what was manifestly an inadequate security. The defender failed to take care that the value of the pursuer's consent was properly secured on the estates. He could have insisted on consignation of the £16,000 instead of taking security for it. He allowed other bonds to be granted over the said estates in preference to the pursuer's bond. He failed to ascertain the amount of the burdens on the said estates, and he took as security on behalf of the pursuer a bond over the said estates which were already burdened to such an extent as to render these a totally inadequate security for payment of the pursuer's debt. In the circumstances condescended on said failure amounts to culpa lata."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defender having, in breach of his duty as curator and guardian of the pursuer during minority, failed to obtain proper security for the said sum of £16,000, and the pursuer having in consequence lost the same, decree should be granted in terms of the conclusions of the summons.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The action is irrelevant and incompetent. (2) The action is barred by the Entail Acts, and, in particular, by sec. 31 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, and sec. 12 of the Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882. (3) The defender as curator ad litem in the petition for disentail was entitled to give his consent for such consideration as he thought proper; and the consideration in respect of which the consent was given having been fixed in bona fide by the defender as fair and reasonable under the whole circumstances, and having been duly obtained, the defender ought to be assoilzied.

On 20th July 1893, the Lord Ordinary (Kincairney) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the averments of the pursuer are irrelevant, and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons: Therefore assoilzies the defender from the said conclusions, and decerns." *

* "OPINION.— . . . The argument was confined to the effect and application of the 12th section of the statute pleaded by the defender. The pursuer maintained that it did not apply. He maintained that the consideration for the consent of the curator ad litem was £16,000. He did not dispute that his interest was fairly estimated at that sum, and that it was, if paid, an adequate consideration for the consent. His objection therefore, he maintained, was not to the inadequacy of the consideration, but to the inadequacy of the security for it; and he maintained that in complaining of the inadequacy of the security he was not charging the defender with mere error in judgment, but with such carelessness and fault as had in various cases been held sufficient to subject in liability trustees who had invested trust funds on security which was manifestly insufficient.

"It was maintained for the defender that he was not in the position of a trustee who had invested trust funds; because, in the first place, the statute had conferred on him a much wider immunity than the law had accorded to trustees; and, in the second place, because he had never been in possession of any funds for investment; that the agreement must be read as a whole; and that, on a sound construction of it, it appeared that the consideration for the curator's consent was not the payment of £16,000 but the bond granted in terms of the agreement.

"On this argument my opinion is in favour of the defender.

"The main question is, what was the consideration obtained by the curator ad litem in respect of which he gave his consent. In considering that question it is important and instructive to distinguish between the duties imposed by the 13th section of the statute on the Court, in a case where consent is refused, and the provisions of the 12th section, which apply when consent is given. In the former case the Court is required to ascertain 'the value in money' of the interest of the heir, and to direct that the sum ascertained shall be paid into bank in name of the heir, 'or that proper security therefor shall be given over the estates.' The case of Farquharson, 14 R. 231, quoted by the pursuer, was a case where consent had been refused.

"But there are no such provisions in the 12th section relating to cases of consent. The curator ad litem is not required to ascertain the value in money of his ward's interest, or to see that the sum ascertained is consigned or invested. In such a case, as pointed out by the counsel for the defender, it may happen that no money consideration is involved, as in the case—not at all unusual—where the object of a disentail is a resettlement of the estates; and other less

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The Lord Ordinary had assumed that the defender had given his consent as curator ad litem after due consideration of the whole circumstances ; that could not be taken for granted without further inquiry. On the contrary, the defender failed in duty by overlooking the existence of burdens on the estate not disclosed by Captain Heron. The defender committed a further breach of duty by allowing certain sums to be secured on the estate prior to the bond for the value of the next heir's consent, after he had agreed to take a bond as the consideration for that consent. The agreement of 30th October and 1st November 1883 must be read as in reality two agreements. The first, consisting of articles 1 and 2, after fixing the value of usual cases may be supposed where the consideration for a disentail might be something different from a payment of money,—for example, an annuity, or a disposition of a portion of the entailed estates ; or, again, there might be reasons which might legitimately induce a curator ad litem to be moderate in his claims, as if (as is suggested in the present case) there was reason to doubt whether the entail was good against creditors. For such reasons a curator ad litem has a very wide discretion in regard to the grounds on which he shall consent to the disentail on behalf of his ward ; and the Court is not concerned with these reasons, except with the view of ascertaining whether the transaction has been honest and incorrupt.

“I am of opinion that on a sound construction of the agreement the consideration for the consent was not payment of £16,000, but a bond for that sum. That is expressed unequivocally in the second head of the agreement. Captain Maxwell Heron did not come under an obligation by the agreement to pay the £16,000 in money, and never did so, except indeed by the bond itself. It may be that the curator ad litem ought not to have accepted Captain Heron's bond, and ought to have refused his consent if he could not get the money, and so have thrown on the Court the duty and responsibility of ascertaining the sum and approving the security. But it is quite certain that he did not do so. He accepted a bond ; and if it be said that that bond has proved an adequate security, what is that but saying that the consideration was inadequate ?

“At first sight there is some difficulty in seeing how a security over an estate can be an inadequate security for a partial interest in it, and the 13th section of the statute seems to contemplate that the estate would be adequate security. But in this case the curator consented to new burdens being imposed on the estates ; and it may be doubtful whether it was advisable to do that. Still, I think it clear that the bond for which the curator stipulated was not a bond over the estate as it then stood, but a bond subject to the burdens mentioned in heads three and four of the agreement. But that, again, resolves into a question of the inadequacy of the consideration ; and from any liability on that score the curator ad litem is protected by the statute.

“I am of opinion, therefore, that the ground of liability here is really inadequacy of consideration, and that that ground of liability is excluded by the statute.

“It may be noticed that here the father, who granted the bond, was his son's administrator-at-law ; and it rather appears to me that if he had paid £16,000 to the curator ad litem, he could have demanded it back as his son's administrator-at-law, or could have uplifted it from the bank in that character if it had been consigned in bank. It is true that in that case he would have held the money in a fiduciary character, and it might, if capable of identification, be safe from his creditors ; and it was perhaps a different thing to lend him the money on his bond, but the consideration suggests how limited the duty of a curator ad litem in such cases really is.

“I decide this case on the footing that the whole question relates to the liability incurred by the defender in accepting the bond and disposition in security under the conditions specified in the agreement as a consideration for his consent to the disentail.”

the consent at £16,000, embodied the consent to the disentail on the consideration of a bond for £16,000 on the estates of Captain Heron as previously diminished by existing burdens. That bond must be a bond over the estate which was being disentailed, not a bond over that estate as subsequently reduced by further burdens. Then followed in the concluding articles a separate agreement under which the curator ad litem consented to the bond in favour of the heir being postponed to new burdens to be imposed on the estate. The new burdens, together with those disclosed by Captain Heron, and those not disclosed by him nor discovered by the defender, amounted in all to about £59,000, or more than two-thirds of the estimated value of the estate. No prudent man of business would have accepted as a security a bond over an estate already burdened beyond two-thirds of its value. In fixing the value of the heir's interest the curator might be protected by the 12th section of the Entail Act, 1882, but it was no part of his functions as curator to accept security for his ward's money, still less to consent that that security should, for the convenience of the disentailer, be postponed to new borrowings on the estate. In doing so, he was acting ultroneously, and had no protection from the statute. If the disentailer insisted upon giving a bond, and postponing that bond to new borrowings, it was the duty of the curator to refuse his consent and leave the Court to order the value of the reclaimer's consent to be ascertained and paid into bank.¹ The respondent farther failed in his duty to make adequate inquiry as to the rent-roll of the said estates, which shewed a free rental of only £479, 7s. 4d. to pay the interest (£800) on the bond which he had accepted for his ward.

Argued for the respondent;—The Entail (Scotland) Act, 1882, section 12, gave no warrant for the view that the curator's duty ended with fixing the money value of his ward's consent. He was charged with the interest of the ward, and entitled to act and give his consent to the disentail, with powers as full as the ward, if capable, would have had. In practice the consideration was more often not a money payment, but resettlement of the estates, or a bond and disposition in security. The curator had absolute discretion in fixing the consideration, and so long as he did not act corruptly was protected by the statute from all responsibility. Here the curator might have taken what was not a first-class security, but that only meant that his consent was given for an inadequate consideration. It was necessary to fix the value of the heir's consent in money, but the consideration for which the consent was given was not money, but a bond. The agreement of 30th October and 1st November 1883 could not be taken in separate parts without doing violence to its terms, for the whole was connected together by the words in the narrative clause, "consent to the said disentail on the terms hereinafter set forth." The latter clauses of the agreement might have reduced the value of the security, but it was no relevant ground of action that the bond had on that account turned out bad. All that could be alleged was that the consideration for consent was inadequate, and the respondent was also protected by the wider clause in the statute giving immunity for errors of judgment. The 12th section of the 1882 Act, read along with the 31st section of the Rutherford Act,² left to the curator the option of giving his consent with or without consideration, and there was no mention of a money payment or of proper security being insisted upon, until the 13th section of the 1882 Act, which provided for the case in which the curator had refused his consent, and had left the matter with the Court. Farquharson v. Blair did not apply here. In that case the security being unsatisfactory, the curator had refused his consent, and the duty then devolved upon the Court to order the value in money of the heir's interest to be paid into bank.¹ Having agreed to take a bond, it would have been impossible for the curator to resile and get decree for a money payment instead of the bond. The only operative clause was the second. The reclaimer could not therefore assume that he had £16,000, and meet the respondent on the question of investment. Had the respondent received the money and subsequently invested it, he would have exceeded his duties as curator, and might have been liable as negotiorum gestor. In this case he never received the money, but gave his consent on the consideration of receiving the bond.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer is the son of Captain Maxwell Heron, who was in 1883 heir of entail in possession of certain lands in the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright. The pursuer was at that time in minority, and under a petition for disentail presented by his father the defender, Mr Dunlop, was appointed to be his curator ad litem.

The particulars in regard to the position of the estate and the defender's actings at the time when he gave his consent to the disentail for his ward are, according to the pursuer's statement,—

1. That the estate was then valued as for a sale at £93,000. 2. That the debt then secured on the estate was £37,500. 3. That in addition to this sum there was further debt put upon the estate, which the pursuer puts at £18,680, and that there were certain other prior burdens which were said not to have been disclosed, the whole debt coming in round figures to £59,000, leaving a margin of £34,000. 4. That the value of the pursuer's interest, which was to be the price of consent to disentail, was £16,000. 5. That the defender agreed to accept a bond over the estate to be disentailed for the £16,000, postponed to the bonds above referred to, in exchange for his consent to the disentail. 6. That the disentail was accordingly carried through. 7. That in 1887 Captain Maxwell's Heron's estate having become insolvent, the trustee appointed upon his estate was under the necessity of selling it. 8. That it realised only £60,000, which price practically left no balance to pay the pursuer's £16,000.

In these circumstances the pursuer sues the defender for payment to him of £16,000 in respect, as stated in his first plea in law, that the defender has, in breach of his duty as curator and guardian of the pursuer during minority, failed to obtain proper security for the £16,000 fixed as the pursuer's interest, and that the pursuer has in consequence lost the amount. This plea is somewhat ambiguous, as the expression "curator and guardian" is used, but it is plain that if the defender is to be made liable, it must be in consequence of his actings as curator ad litem, appointed by the Court under the disentail proceedings. It is on his actings as curator ad litem that the pursuer must succeed if he is to obtain decree.

The defender maintains that he is not liable, he having been appointed as an officer of Court under the Entail Acts, and he maintains that he is protected from a claim stated on such grounds as are founded on by the pursuer by sec. 12 of the Entail Act of 1882, by which it is enacted,—“That no curator ad litem who may give any consent under this Act shall incur any responsibility on account of such consent in respect of any alleged error in judgment or inadequacy of consideration, or want of consideration therefor, unless it shall be alleged and proved that he acted corruptly in the matter.” It is not alleged by the pursuer that there was any corrupt action, and therefore there can be no case for the pursuer unless he has a legal plea against the defender which cannot be met by any one of the three exemptions stated in the clause, viz., “error of judgment, inadequacy of consideration, or want of consideration.”

No. 46.

Maxwell
Heron v.
Dunlop.

The pursuer maintains that the defender agreed with the heir of entail in possession that £16,000 was to be paid for his interest, and that the defender in accepting the bond on the estate—which he did accept—for the amount was guilty of such carelessness and fault as would make a trustee liable for loss of property in his hands which he had invested without proper care. He further maintains that the defender failed to ascertain some of the burdens on the estate, which he might have ascertained if he had made more close inquiry than he did, and which made the investment worse by about £2000 than he knew it to be when he accepted it.

The defender maintains that the agreement must be read as a whole, his consent to the disentail being exchanged for the agreement, and that thus he was not at any time in the position of investing £16,000. He had to consider whether he would accept a bond for £16,000 as the consideration for his consent, and had no bargain with the heir of entail by which he became a holder of a sum of money for investment.

The curator ad litem in such a case as this is called upon to exercise his discretion, and to refuse his consent or give it on such terms as in his judgment in the circumstances it would be wise for the ward to consent to if he were major. Such exercise of discretion may depend upon a consideration of a great many complex circumstances. No rule is or can be laid down as to the extent to which investigation is to be made, or at what point a line is to be drawn as to adequacy of consideration. The curator is appointed as being a suitable person fully and fairly to consider the interests involved, and all the surrounding circumstances, making such investigation as he considers to be necessary. His action may prove afterwards to have been unfortunate from depreciation of property or some similar cause, but no rules are laid down for his guidance in judging of such matters. And it is certain that in some cases it might be in the interest of the negotiating heir to accept a less high class of security for his compensation for consent than would in the ordinary case be likely to be accepted.

In this case undoubtedly the security which the defender took was not what is called, in parlance applicable to heritable bonds, a first-class security. The margin left over upon the valuation was not very great. But the question whether a security is to be accepted or not, having regard to the calculated or estimated margin, is essentially one of circumstances, and although in a case of this kind it might be said after the event, when it is proverbially easy to be wise, that there was an inadequacy or even a want of consideration for the consent, the clause of the Act precludes inquiry on such points unless a relevant averment be made of corrupt action on the part of the curator.

Taking the case upon the footing that the curator accepted a security of which it must be said now that in prudence it ought not to have been accepted, it must, I think, also be taken on the footing that the defender conscientiously believed that he had made such inquiry as it was his duty to make, and conscientiously arrived at the conclusion at which he did arrive, and acted upon it. If he erred in either of these branches of his duty, it appears to me that his error is described in the language of the statute by the words "error of judgment." It was his duty to exercise his judgment as to what inquiries he should make, and to exercise his judgment upon the information obtained as their result. It is not said that he corruptly failed to do either. But if he did not corruptly fail, then, if he did what he ought not to have done, he did so through error of judgment. But it is just from liability in respect of such error of judgment that the 12th clause of the Act protects him.

I am of opinion that the pursuer's averments do not state against the defender any acts by which the pursuer may have suffered loss which are not fairly covered by the words of the statute, which exempt him from liability for alleged error of judgment, and that, on these grounds, the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right, and ought to be adhered to.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion, and generally on the same grounds. I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I think that this is a case to which the provision of the statute applies, and that the defender, who acted as an officer of this Court, is not liable, unless it is established to the satisfaction of the Court—what is not even alleged here—that he acted corruptly. I think that there may have been an error of judgment—probably there was—in the defender taking the security which he did over the estate, even assuming that the estate was of the value which it was said to be at the time, and that a prudent, cautious, judicious man-of-business would probably have required better security to be given. But I think that that was merely an error of judgment, if it was an error at all, and that the provision of the statute applies to such an error. All one's inclination is to protect an officer of Court who honestly tries to do his duty, and it was in pursuance of such an inclination that the provision of the statute was enacted, that a curator ad litem should not be liable unless it is proved that he acted corruptly. I must add that I am not strongly favourable to the pursuer of an action such as this. It is really a question between father and son. The pursuer says that when his father became bankrupt, and the estate was sold at something like £30,000 under the value at which it was estimated, the result was that he has lost the whole of the sum paid to him for giving his consent to the disentail, and therefore that that sum is now payable to him by the defender as having been his curator ad litem. That is really the nature of the action—to make Mr Dunlop pay a debt due to the pursuer by the pursuer's father. I am, I repeat, not favourable to such an action, and on the whole matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the defence must prevail.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—The case of the defender is that under the agreement of October 1883 the consideration for the pursuer's consent to the disentail was the bond and disposition mentioned in that deed. There is great force in that view, for there is no evidence of any other arrangement, and the deed expressly states that the defender, as curator for the pursuer, has agreed to "consent to the said disentail on the terms hereinafter set forth." It is true that it is stated in the first clause that the parties had agreed that the value of the pursuer's expectancy was £16,000. But I find it difficult to separate this clause from the rest of the deed, or to hold that this sum was fixed without reference to the manner in which it was to be satisfied. We must read the clause as a whole, and I agree with the Lord Ordinary in thinking that the just construction of it is that the bond therein mentioned was the consideration for the consent of the heir. On this footing, and apart from a question to which I shall hereafter advert, the defender is protected by the statute. He incurs no liability for inadequacy of consideration when, as here, there is no corruption alleged.

Maxwell

Heron v.

Dunlop.

But I do not see that any other result can be reached if we assume that the value of the expectancy was fixed at £16,000, and that the bond was taken as a sufficient security for that sum. The curator's duty is not limited to fixing the value of the expectancy. He is entitled to give his consent to the disentail, and therefore it is part of his duty to see that the price of the consent is paid or properly secured. For he cannot give his consent till that be done. If, then, the defender fixed the value of the expectancy at £16,000, and thereafter agreed to take the bond above mentioned as a sufficient security, he was in my opinion acting within his province. He gave his consent because he believed the security to be sufficient. Nothing more is or can be alleged against him than an error of judgment. By force of the statute he incurs no responsibility on that ground.

But in my opinion the defender was bound to use due diligence to see that he got the security for which he stipulated, or, in other words, that the security was not postponed to any debts other than those mentioned in the agreement. I do not think that the statute in this respect gives him any protection from negligence. I cannot hold it to be an error of judgment if he gave his consent without getting the consideration for which he bargained. It is simply a failure in duty. Nor does the case fall within the other category mentioned in the statute, by which a curator incurs no responsibility on account of his consent in respect of any inadequacy of consideration or want of consideration. These words, in my opinion, refer to the consideration which is fixed for the consent. They do not protect the curator if he fails by negligence to obtain that consideration.

As I understood at the debate, the only charge not mentioned in the agreement which took precedence of the bond in question was an annuity in favour of Miss Heron for £150. In my opinion there should be inquiry into this matter.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the result at which the majority of your Lordships have arrived.

The agreement was not registered under section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867. Twenty £50 shares of the company were subsequently allotted to F. & Co., and the company sent to them certificates for twenty shares, "fully paid up," along with a receipt bearing,—"Received from F. & Co. £1000, being four calls of £12, 10s. for 20 shares."

1st DIVISION.

ON 26th January 1893 Christopher Furness & Company presented a petition in which they prayed the Court to order their names to be removed from the A list of contributories of the "Cynthiana" Steamship Company, Limited, in respect of twenty shares of the company. The liquidators of the company lodged answers.

On the same day Messrs Furness & Company presented a petition for an order to have their names removed from the A list of contributories of the "Felician" Steamship Company, in respect of 120 shares of the company. The liquidators, who were also the liquidators of the "Cynthiana" Company, lodged answers in this petition also.

The two companies, which were under the same management, had gone into voluntary liquidation on 23d June 1892, and the liquidators had made up the A list of contributories on which the name of Messrs Furness & Company appeared, on 10th June 1893.

The circumstances of the petitioners' connection with the shares of the two companies, as appeared from a proof which was led before Lord Kinnear, were as follows:—

The two companies in question were registered and incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862-1890, in November 1892. The shares were of the value of £50 each.

By article 55 of the companies' articles of association, Messrs M'Lean & Sutherland, Glasgow, were appointed managers, with the powers of directors,* there being no regular directors of the companies. By agree-

Article 12 provided,—"The instrument of transfer of any share in the company shall be executed both by the transferor and transferee, and the transferor shall be deemed to remain a holder of such share until the name of the transferee is entered in the register book in respect thereof."

Article 14 provided,—"The company may decline, in respect of all shares not fully paid up, to register any transfer of shares made by a member who is indebted to them or made to a minor, lunatic, married woman, or bankrupt, and every transferor who is aware or suspects that his transferee is a minor, lunatic, married woman, or bankrupt, shall be bound to intimate his knowledge or suspicion to the directors. No member shall cease to be such until a transfer or other legal title to his shares in favour of some other person has been registered."

ment dated 13th April 1891, Messrs Christopher Furness & Company, No. 47. London, who acted for the Maritime Mortgage Trust, Limited, agreed to lend to the "Cynthiana" Company £1000, and "as security" against the loan the company agreed to deposit with the Trust Company "scrip of their company" to the extent of £1000, and to give an assignment to freight and a second mortgage over the "Cynthiana" steamship.

Dec. 8, 1893.
Furness & Co.
v. Liquidators of "Cynthi-

Limited.

On 6th May 1891 Messrs M'Lean & Sutherland sent by letter to the Mortgage Company this receipt:—

"Form of Receipt Account of Call.

"Glasgow, 71 Queen Street, 6th May 1891.

"No. 74.

"Received of Messrs Christopher Furness & Coy. the sum of One thousand Pounds — Shillings, being four Calls of Twelve Pounds Ten Shillings Sterling, for Twenty shares of the 'Cynthiana' Steamship Company, Limited."

And the following certificate bearing the same date:—

"Shares fully paid up.

"This is to certify that Messrs Christopher Furness & Company, 5 and 6 Billiter Avenue, London, E.C., is registered proprietor of twenty shares of fifty pounds each, fully paid up, numbered from 193 to 212 inclusive, in The 'Cynthiana' Steamship Company, Limited, subject to the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company."

Messrs Furness & Company had previously lent on behalf of the Trust Company £6000 to the "Feliciana" Company, of which company Messrs M'Lean & Sutherland were also managers. In the agreement relative to that loan the deposit of "scrip" of the company was not mentioned, otherwise the terms of the loan were similar to those in the "Cynthiana" agreement. On 13th March 1891 a receipt for calls and a certificate of 120 shares in the "Feliciana" Company in similar terms to those granted in the "Cynthiana" Company were granted to Furness & Company.

In October 1891 Messrs Furness & Company, who had by that time got mortgages over the vessels, began to doubt whether some liability might not attach to their holding the shares in the two companies. They accordingly in that month transferred the shares in both companies to Mr Sutherland, of Messrs M'Lean & Sutherland, who was then insolvent but not bankrupt. In each case the consideration stated in the transfer was a payment of five shillings.

On 8th November 1891 the companies granted certificates in favour of Mr Sutherland as registered proprietor of both sets of shares. In these certificates the shares were certified as being fully paid up.

Owing to an omission on the part of the companies' officials the transfers of the shares were not entered in the annual return of transfers made to the registrar. The secretary of the Trust Company having noticed the omission, and leave having been obtained from the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, the return was corrected on 18th March 1892. In the return as amended the numbers of the shares transferred from Furness & Company to Sutherland were not identical with the numbers of the shares allotted to Furness & Company and transferred to Sutherland, though Sutherland admittedly had acquired no other shares of the companies, and the name of Messrs Furness & Company was not struck off the register, though a pencil note that their shares had been transferred was put opposite their name on the register. Messrs Furness & Company then wrote requesting that their names should be struck out of the registers, but that was not done before the companies went into liquidation in June 1892.

The grounds on which the petitioners maintained that their names should be removed from the list of contributories of both companies were thus stated in the petitions:—“(1) The petitioners stipulated for fully paid-up shares, and the company represented and certified that the shares taken by them were fully paid up, and the liquidators are now barred from maintaining the contrary. (2) The shares are fully paid in cash. (3) In no case do the petitioners fall to be placed on the A list, as present members, having transferred their shares about eight months before the winding up began.”

The respondents opposed the petition on the following grounds:—“(1) The petitioners are registered owners of the said shares, upon which nothing has been paid. There was no contract in terms of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, that the shares were not to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash.* (2) The transfer alleged is a collusive transfer for the purpose of avoiding liability. (3) Under the articles of association the company were entitled to decline, in respect of all shares not fully paid, to register a transfer until the whole calls due thereon were paid, and in the present case the petitioners were and are not entitled to have the said transfer registered. (4) The transfer is not duly stamped. (5) In any case, the petitioners fall to be placed upon the B list, as having held the shares in question up to 15th March 1892, and there being debts due to creditors prior to that date to an amount greatly exceeding the total calls payable upon the said shares, which the total calls payable by the contributories in the A list are unable to meet.

Argued for the petitioners in both cases;—(1) The transaction between them and the company was of such a nature that it amounted to a payment in cash for the shares. They would not have been liable for calls if such had been made before they got rid of their shares.¹ (2) They had contracted to take only fully paid-up shares, and they were entitled to rely on the statement of the company on the certificates that the shares were “fully paid up.” Holding such certificates, they could not be placed on the list of contributories.² The onus of shewing that the petitioners knew that the shares were not, in point of fact, “fully paid up,” lay on the respondents, who had certified that they were, and they had not discharged it.³ (3) The petitioners had transferred their shares before the liquidation, and their names ought at once to have been taken off the register. Though that had not been done, they were entitled to demand that it should be done now, as there had been undue delay by the directors in doing it at first.⁴

Argued for the respondents;—(1) The petitioners were not entitled to have their names removed from the list of contributories. The only money which had passed in any way connected with the shares was the loans by the Mortgage Company, and the petitioners had always acted as

* Section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, provides that “every share in any company shall be deemed and taken to have been issued and to be held subject to the payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless the same shall have been otherwise determined by a contract duly made in writing, and filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies at or before the issue of such shares.”

creditors for those loans. Such a transaction did not amount to a payment in cash for the shares. The requirements of section 25 of the Companies Act, 1867, had not been complied with, there being admittedly here no written contract as to the holding of the shares.¹ (2) The case was not within the rule of Burkinshaw.² The petitioners were not in the position of a purchaser of shares in the open market, who could not know whether the shares he bought were in point of fact fully paid up. That was the position of the purchaser in Burkinshaw's case. Here the receipt granted to petitioners shewed that the full price had not been paid for the shares, and in point of fact they had known that all along. Further, the petitioners were not transferees of these shares, but allottees.³ (3) The transfer to Sutherland was not bona fide. At its date the petitioners were indebted to the company for unpaid calls, and the transferee Sutherland was insolvent. In those circumstances, the directors ought at once under article 14 of the articles of association to have refused to register the transfer. That being so, and as the petitioners' names were actually on the register, the Court ought not to help them to escape liability.⁴

LORD PRESIDENT.—This case presents an appearance of some complexity, and the full debate which we heard involved it in many conflicting and alternative legal views. When regard is had to the salient and clearly established facts, the difficulty largely disappears.

In the first place, the petitioners were allottees of the shares now in question,—that is to say, they received them on their first issue direct from the companies. Prima facie therefore they are not in the position of third parties who acquire shares by transference from the original allottee.

Upon what contracts then did they acquire the shares? Now, upon this and upon all branches of the case some apparent confusion is created by the interposition of Messrs M'Lean & Sutherland. The position of these gentlemen, however, is easily fixed. They were, under the articles of association, managers of the two companies—there were no directors, and these managers had all the powers of directors. This is made perfectly clear by article 55 of the articles of association of either company. In the matters in question, then, these gentlemen were the executive of the companies, and their acts were the acts of the companies. Acting then in this character, Messrs M'Lean & Sutherland negotiated loans from the Mortgage Company, of which the petitioners were the managers. The securities on which those advances were made were mortgages over the steamers, policies of insurance, assignment of freights, and certain amounts of what is described in the documents constituting the agreement as "scrip" of the company.

The whole case of the petitioners is that it was represented to them that the shares thus stipulated as security were fully paid up, and that, they having advanced their money on this representation, the shares must be held to be fully paid up, the companies and the liquidators being barred from denying it.

There is a conflict of evidence as to whether in conversation between M'Lean & Sutherland on the one hand and Mr Stoker (who represented the petitioners) on the other, it was made matter of stipulation that the shares to be given as security should be "fully paid-up shares." In the correspondence, the neutral term "scrip" is employed. The fact that at an earlier stage of the ships' history the former managers of the Mortgage Company expressly stipulated for fully paid-up shares is not decisive, as this was at a time when the ships not being built, no mortgage could be granted. When the shares were delivered, however, they were accompanied by certificates that they were fully paid-up shares, and these certificates are the representation on which the petitioners substantially rely.

Now, I take it to be perfectly clear that the companies received no consideration whatever for the issue of these shares, except the loans from the petitioners, for which they were delivered as security. Further, it has not been suggested that the petitioners were told that any other consideration had been granted to the companies by anybody else. It seems to me therefore that when the petitioners had these shares allotted to them, the only representation made to them consisted in the shares being called fully paid-up shares,—their history being perfectly well known to all concerned.

The sense in which this name was given to those shares was brought home to the petitioners, had that been necessary, a month after their issue, when they got a receipt for the calls on the shares of one of the steamers, by which the £1000 advanced for that vessel was said to have been received from the petitioners "being four calls of £12, 10s. for twenty shares of the 'Cynthiana' Steamship Company, Limited." In the case of the "Feliciana" a similar receipt was asked for and obtained some time afterwards, avowedly for the purpose of supporting the assertion of the certificate that the shares were fully paid up.

All this while, and down to the present time, the petitioners have adhered to the position of creditors for the moneys advanced, have drawn interest on their loans, and, in the case of one of the two vessels, have sold her under their mortgage.

It appears to me therefore that these shares, when issued, were not de facto fully paid up in cash, that this was known to the petitioners, and that the agreement upon which they were issued was one which, if legal at all, required to be registered under section 25 of the Act of 1867. No such agreement has been registered. Now, in those circumstances the petitioners went upon the registers of the companies. They do not say that this was done without their knowledge, or that it was not according to the contract with the companies that they should become members, and they acted as members, when, subsequently, they executed transfers of the shares.

Upon this state of the facts the petitioners seem to me to have no case in law apart from the transfers to which I am presently to refer. The central facts are that, on their own shewing, they directly contract with the companies for the issue of those shares as "fully paid up," they well knowing that cash had not been paid, and that they accept the position of members of the company. It is surely in vain for them to appeal to such cases as Burkinshaw, in which third parties acquiring shares in ordinary course have been held entitled to found on the representations of the company.

The petitioners, however, have an alternative contention that they have transferred their shares to Mr Sutherland, and that the registers ought to be rectified so as to give effect to those transfers. The facts relating to this branch of the case are the same in the case of the "Feliciana" as in that of the "Cynthiana." That such transfers were executed there is no doubt. It is also proved that in March 1892 the petitioners applied to have the registers altered accordingly. This request was not refused, but, on the other hand, the registers were not effectively altered, the thing apparently having been blundered. Mr Sutherland was put on the register as holder of different sets of shares from those which were the subjects of the transfers, although he had acquired none others, while the petitioners' names were not struck off the registers, but in each case a pencil note was put opposite their names to the effect that their shares were transferred. At present I think it clear that in law the petitioners are still on the register, especially having regard to sec. 25 of the Companies Act, 1862, and sec. 12 of the articles of association of these companies. The question remains, whether the petitioners are not entitled now to have the registers rectified. Although the petitions relate to the lists of contributories, it seems competent incidentally to rectify the registers, and the respondents did not take any technical objection to our considering the question as if we had before us petitions to rectify the registers. After full consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the petitioners are entitled to have their names removed from the registers.

Furness & Co.
v. Liquidators
of "Cynthi-

I do not think that the 14th article of association applies to this case, so as to confer on the managers any right to refuse to register these transfers. The transferors were not indebted to the company, nor was the transferee bankrupt. That he was insolvent I think is now established, but I do not consider that he was bankrupt in the sense of the article. Well, then, if the constitution of these particular companies did not give to the managers a special right to refuse to register these transfers, are they open to challenge on the general law of companies? It is plain, and indeed admitted, that the reason why the petitioners transferred the shares was that, doubt having been thrown on their position as holders of paid-up shares, they wanted to be free of liability. I think it is pretty clear, on the other hand, that Mr Sutherland became transferee partly because he was insolvent. But, on the authorities, neither of these facts, nor the two combined, seem to render the transfer illegal. Nor was the position of the company such as to make it the duty of its executive to refuse to alter the register. The company had not resolved to stop or to go into liquidation; in fact it seems to have been, as it always had been, in low water, but not more. Accordingly, I think that in March 1892, when they asked it, the petitioners were entitled to have the transfers registered and their names taken off the register. As this has not been done, through no fault of theirs, I think they are now entitled to have it done.

If this should be the view of your Lordships the prayer of each petition will be granted, and we may also order the registers to be rectified. It was admitted that, in this event, the petitioners' names must be put on the B list of contributories, should such a list be required.

LORD ADAM, LORD M'LAREN, and LORD KINNAR concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Ordain the register of the 'Cynthiana' Steamship Company, Limited, to be

MATTHEW HODGART AND OTHERS (Hodgart's Trustees), Defenders (Reclaimers).—Jameson—Burnet.

Trust—Trustees—Liability of trustees—Goodwill of business carried on by truster.—An engineer who had been many years in India, on his return to this country, continued to supply native and other traders in India with cotton presses, which he bought from makers in this country. At the time of his death his average income from this source was about £300 per annum.

In an action of accounting brought some years after his death by the beneficiaries under his settlement against his trustees, the pursuers contended that the trustees were bound to account for the value of the goodwill of the testator's business which they had not sold. The trustees pleaded that as the deceased's transactions were conducted by him personally without business premises or clerks, there was no business to which a goodwill could attach.

After a proof, held (aff. judgment of Lord Kyllachy) that the goodwill was an asset of the deceased's estate which should have been sold by the trustees, and that they fell to be debited with £300 as the value thereof.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Kyllachy.

JOHN HODGART, who had been an engineer in India, returned to this country in 1868, and died on 11th February 1879, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, by which he conveyed his whole estate to Matthew Hodgart, his brother, Charles Jones, his son-in-law, and others, as trustees, for the purpose, inter alia, of payment of the liferent to his widow, and after her death, of one-fourth of the fee to the children of his deceased daughter Mrs James Donald.

The liferentrix died in April 1889. In 1891 Mrs Donald's children, along with their father, raised an action of accounting against the trustees, in which they, inter alia, concluded for declarator that they were entitled to credit for their share of the goodwill, books, and plant of the business carried on by their grandfather, the truster, with the legal interest thereof from the date of his death.

They stated that the trustees had in November 1890 produced an account of their intromissions. (Cond. 6) "The said account contains no entry whatever in respect of the plant or the goodwill of the business carried on by him. The pursuers believe and aver that a valuable asset of the estate has thus been omitted. The truster, upon retiring in 1868 from active service as an engineer in India, carried on a large business through engineers at Paisley and elsewhere in connection with cotton presses and other machinery, several valuable improvements in which he had patented. He had an extensive business connection in India, and received from his correspondents there orders for all classes and kinds of machinery, which he placed chiefly with the firm of Fullerton, Hodgart, & Barclay, engineers, Paisley. Altogether the business of the deceased was worth not less than £500 or £600 a-year. There was also, as the pursuers believe and aver, in the deceased's premises at the time of his death a considerable quantity of plant, consisting of models, drawings, patterns, &c., used in connection with his inventions and improvements, and also business books and stock in trade not accounted for in the statement given up by the trustees." No. 48.

Dec. 8, 1893.
Donald v.
Hodgart's
Trustees.

The defenders answered,—“The only business carried on by the deceased was a commission-agency for the sale of cotton presses in India, where the deceased had a number of business acquaintances from whom he procured orders. The commission he obtained on sales varied from 5 to 10 per cent, and in some years he realised as little as £20 per annum from this business. What business he had depended entirely on his personal influence and exertions, and there was thus no goodwill which admitted of being sold. The only patent taken out in the deceased's name had expired before his death.”

The pursuers further averred that it was the duty of the trustees to have sold the business as a going concern, that, instead of doing so, they allowed the business to be acquired partly by the firm of Fullerton, Hodgart, & Barclay, and partly by the defender Charles Jones, and that the firm in question had taken over most of the plant and goodwill.

These averments were denied by the defenders.

The pursuers pleaded;—(3) The defenders, having failed to realise certain assets of the trust-estate as condescended on, are bound to account therefor, or for the profits therefrom, to the pursuers.

After accounts had been lodged by the trustees, objections were stated thereto by the pursuers, who, inter alia, repeated the averments above mentioned.

On 15th January 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) allowed a proof before answer of these averments.

It appeared from the evidence that the truster had been in India for many years prior to 1868. He had held official positions first in the dockyard and afterwards in the mint at Bombay, but had been allowed to conduct private business on his own account as well. He was well known in India as a skilful engineer, and in particular had acquired a reputation in connection with machinery for pressing cotton into bales. In 1863 he took out a patent for an improved cotton press, for which he obtained many orders, both while he remained in India and after he returned to this country. Even after the expiry of the patent (about 1876) he continued to do a considerable business. He at no time manufactured the presses himself, his practice being to place the orders which he received with manufacturing engineers at home, and then to sell the finished presses at a profit. He had no business premises or plant, and employed no clerks or workmen. He kept business-books, including letter-books, and made drawings and plans of machines, some of which he preserved. Down to 1871 he employed the firm of Craig & Fullerton to make the presses for him, and after that date Fullerton, Hodgart, & Barclay, of which firm three of the trustees were partners. The patent presses were marked “Hodgart's Patent,” and were also stamped with the name “Craig, Fullerton, & Company,” or “Fullerton, Hodgart, & Barclay,” as makers. The average annual profits made by the truster were variously estimated at from £400 to £800 down to about three years from his death, the annual average during the latter period being about £300. It appeared that when Indian customers were once well served by a trader they seldom went past him * when they had other orders to give, and that this added greatly to the value of the connection formed by Mr Hodgart with native merchants.

After Mr Hodgart's death the question was not considered by his trustees whether there was a realisable goodwill. One of their number, however, Mr Jones, had assumed the title of "successor to Mr John Hodgart" on his business paper, and although he deponed that he had received no orders from Mr Hodgart's old customers he admitted that he had so described himself in the hope that he would receive such orders.

The pursuers' father, Mr James Donald, deponed that he would give £100 for the books and drawings left by Mr John Hodgart.

On 11th June 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) before further answer appointed the trustees "forthwith to expose to public sale the goodwill of the business carried on by the truster, along with the whole business-books of the deceased, including letter-books and the whole plans or drawings belonging to him." †

* Mr John Turnbull, an engineer in Glasgow, of thirty years' experience, deponed,—“It is well known that dealing with natives of India is different from dealing with any other class of merchants in the world ; if a native buys a machine and it turns out bad, he will never more, no matter what improvements are made on the machine, deal with that person ; but if it turns out good he will never go to any other person. That is an almost universal custom.”

Mr David Gray deponed,—“An Indian connection is very valuable, because it is difficult for any person to supplant you, if the machine you supply is a good one, and has been once adopted. When you get a name for a certain class of machinery in India the name carries with it a very large connection—a valuable connection. I am acquainted so far with the nature of the business carried on by the late Mr John Hodgart. I consider a business of that description has a goodwill, because of the tendency of people in India to stick to a particular machine and a particular connection.”

† “OPINION.—This is an action of accounting brought against the trustees of the late Mr John Hodgart by certain beneficiaries under the trust, and the main question involved is whether the trustees are bound to account for a certain alleged asset of the estate, viz, the goodwill of a certain business carried on by the deceased up to the time of his death. The pursuers say that this goodwill of the business, if put up to sale along with the books of the deceased and some plans and drawings which he left, would have realised a considerable sum ; and they complain that, in place of doing so, the trustees—who were for the most part relatives of the deceased, and had had business relations with him—appropriated, or in effect appropriated, the goodwill to themselves.

“The case has this peculiarity, that the deceased died so far back as 1879, and that the division of the estate has been postponed until now, by reason of the survival of his widow, who had a liferent of his estate. This makes it impossible to test by a sale as at the present time the value, if any, of the alleged goodwill as existing at the time of the death. I have been obliged to allow a proof, and that proof has, I think, sufficiently disclosed the nature of the truster's business, and the manner in which the trustees dealt with such goodwill as attached to it.

“I think the result of the proof is shortly this. The truster, who had long held an official position in Bombay, had obtained a name in connection with certain machinery for pressing cotton into bales. In point of fact, he was the inventor of an improved form of cotton press, and he held a patent for the invention ; and both before and after his return from India, which took place, I think, in 1868, he kept the supply of the patented machinery in his own hands ; that is to say, he got the presses manufactured in this country, chiefly, if not altogether, by the firm of which three of his trustees were partners, and he sold the presses so manufactured to firms in India at a large profit. After the patent expired he continued this line of business, selling, however, latterly more of an

The defenders reclaimed, but on 4th November 1892 the First Division adhered. No. 48.

On 30th November 1892 the goodwill, books, plans, and drawings were thereafter exposed for sale by public roup, no upset price being named. The pursuers' father, Mr James Donald, offered £100, and Dec. 8, 1893. Donald v. Hodgart's Trustees.

On 4th February 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) found, inter alia, "(1) That the defenders are bound, in accounting with the pursuers, to debit themselves with the sum of £300 as the value of the goodwill of the truster's business," and on 17th March 1893 he decreed against them for the balance of the trust-estate in their hands.*

unpatented press, called a finishing press, which seems to have been used in connection with the patent press. He had no place of business, and no plant or stock in trade, but he kept business-books, including letter-books. He appears to have for a number of years before his death made a profit which on an average amounted, according to one estimate, to between £700 and £800, and according to another to between £400 and £500 per annum.

"After his death, the business, or such of it as remained, was carried on for a time by one of the trustees—his son-in-law, Mr Jones—who had lived in family with him, and continued to live with his widow after his death. Mr Jones, I have no doubt in good faith, assumed the title of Mr Hodgart's successor, and so designed himself on his letter-paper. After a year or two he discontinued the business, but the firm of which the other trustees were partners, and which firm had all along manufactured the Hodgart presses, continued, and I think still continue, to supply those presses to the Indian market, the presses being still described as 'Hodgart's patent, manufactured by Fullerton, Hodgart, & Barclay.'

"These are, I think, the facts, and I think support the conclusion maintained by the witnesses for the pursuers, that Mr Hodgart's business as at the time of his death had attached to it a certain element of goodwill, and that that goodwill had a certain marketable value, greater or less. In other words, I think the proof must be held to establish that if the goodwill had been sold at the time of the truster's death, a price, greater or smaller, would probably have been obtained for the privilege of carrying on the deceased's business under his name, or as his successor; and for the benefit arising from the possession of his books, and consequent right of access to his customers. Moreover, if I am to accept the evidence of Mr Donald, the pursuers' father, he is prepared, even at this moment, to give not less than £100 for such goodwill as still survives, and more particularly for the business books and business documents of the deceased, which he says he can turn to valuable account in connection with his own business as an engineer.

"Now that being so, the question comes to be, am I to decide, on such materials as the proof affords, what is the sum for which the trustees are to account as the assumed value of the goodwill which they failed to realise? or, am I in the first place to direct that the goodwill, so far as it still subsists, shall, along with the books and documents of the deceased, be ante omnia sold? I have come to the conclusion—especially in view of Mr Donald's evidence, which I must assume to have been given in good faith, that the latter course is the course which I ought to follow. There is here, what I hold upon the proof to be, an asset of the estate which is admittedly unrealised. The trustees' first duty is to realise the assets, and they will not do so until this goodwill, including the books and papers of the deceased, have been duly sold. It will then be for consideration what additional sum, if any, is to be charged against the trustees in respect of the delay which they have allowed to take place in the realisation of this asset. I reserve that question for after consideration, and in the meantime I say nothing about expenses, and if desired I shall give leave to reclaim."

* "OPINION.—In this case I have already decided, or at least expressed the

Donald v.
Trustees.

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The trustees, who were the best judges, at the date of Mr Hodgart's death, had in perfect good faith formed and acted on the opinion that there was no realisable goodwill, and it was only ten years afterwards that their view was challenged. The action was tantamount to an action for damages, and before the trustees could be found liable there should be the clearest evidence of neglect of duty. There was no such evidence. The fact that the pursuers' father had offered £100 for the goodwill was no real test of value in the circumstances, and it was to be noted that there was no competition at the sale. Quoad ultra the pursuers' evidence was wholly speculative. The business itself was entirely personal to Mr Hodgart. He had no business premises or plant, he employed no workmen or clerks, and accordingly when he died there was nothing in existence to which goodwill could attach.¹ It was a commission business dependent entirely on the truster's personal skill.² His intimate personal relation to Indian customers was not transmissible, and could not therefore be included in bonis defuncti.³ In no opinion, that Mr Hodgart's business had, at the time of his death, a certain goodwill, and that that goodwill had a certain tangible value, greater or less. It now appears from the report of the sale, which I lately ordered, that such part of the goodwill as still survives has fetched at a public sale the sum of £100. That sum accordingly falls to be now put to the trustees' debit. The question which I have still to decide is what further sum, if any, falls to be similarly debited so as to satisfy the pursuers' demand for an account of the value of the goodwill as it stood at the truster's death.

"I have come to the conclusion—taking Mr Donald's purchase at the recent sale simply as an element in the proof, and making due allowance for the perhaps somewhat special circumstance which attended that purchase—that I shall do justice between the parties by fixing the value of the goodwill as existing at the date of the truster's death at the sum of £300. That is to say, the beneficiaries under the trust must have credit for £200 in addition to the £100 paid by Mr Donald, and that with interest at four per cent from the life-renter's death.

"I do not propose to go into the details of the proof. The view which I take is, after all, only a jury view, and it is this: I think it is pretty clear that during the three years before the truster's death—that is to say, after the expiry of his patents—his business to some extent fell off. The state No. 54 of process appears to make that clear, and that being so, I do not think that I shall go far wrong if I hold that the profits during those last three years were somewhere about £300 per annum. I shall, at all events, take them at £300, and I think I deal leniently with the trustees in holding that if the goodwill had been duly exposed to sale, either to public sale or to a sale as amongst the persons interested in the business, it would have fetched at least one year's profits. The pursuers' witnesses say, of course, that it would have fetched much more, but I think their evidence is rather exaggerated, and in particular they rather overlook the circumstance that Messrs Fullerton, Hodgart, & Barclay were, to say the least, in a very favourable position to compete with any purchaser. They had not only been in use to manufacture for Mr Hodgart his machines, patented and unpatented, but were probably entitled to continue to use after Mr Hodgart's death the nameplate No. 63 of process, which they had been accustomed to attach to his machines, the use of that nameplate giving them very considerable advantages.

"I shall therefore find that the defenders are bound, in accounting with the pursuers, to debit themselves with the sum of £300, with interest from the date of the widow's death at four per cent. . . ."

case had anything so intangible and shadowy been recognised as capable of realisation.¹ The deceased had not even an exclusive right to the use of the name "Hodgart."² Besides, after the expiry of the patent right, it was the make of the machines and not the name of the patentee which recommended them to purchasers, and the right to the title "successor to Mr John Hodgart" would have been of no avail apart from or in competition with the makers of the machines.

Argued for the pursuers ;—The sale had realised £100. It was proved, therefore, that the trustees had failed to realise an asset of the estate, whatever that asset might be called. It was, in fact, the goodwill of the truster's business, and must be credited as such to his estate.³ The interest in the business was not so personal as to be intransmissible.⁴ *Bain v. Munro*⁵ was very special, and besides, there was no analogy between the goodwill of a profession and the goodwill of a trade.⁶ Even after the expiry of the patent the truster only had right to use the name "Hodgart's Patent," and a purchaser of the goodwill after his death would have been entitled to restrain a stranger from using it.⁷ But that there was value in the goodwill was put beyond all doubt by the action of Mr Jones, who had advertised himself as "successor to" Mr Hodgart. That was just an attempt to trade on Mr Hodgart's reputation, and to make profit out of it, although it may have been made in perfect good faith. And the circumstance that gave peculiar value to the truster's business connection was the conservative tendency of the Indian traders. The delay on the pursuers' part in taking action did not alter the nature of the trustees' duties, and besides was quite justifiable, for no steps were taken by the trustees to wind up the estate until after the death of the liferentrix.

LORD PRESIDENT.—There is one feature in this case which does not strike me as being of great importance: that is the fact that Mr James F. Donald offered and paid £100 for the goodwill of the business in question. In answer to a challenge by the defenders, when he was in the witness-box, he said that he would be willing to give £100, and he proceeded to carry out that undertaking. I regard that as a natural and legitimate enough step for a litigant to take. At the same time, that does not affect my mind as being an important element of evidence in the case.

When we come to look at the other facts, I am disposed to take a broad view. John Hodgart had for a number of years prior to his death succeeded in making a considerable income out of the business he carried on, the business consisting in the supply of cotton presses and other kinds of machinery to the order of customers in India. The figures to which our attention has been drawn speak to a substantial yield from this business, whatever the business is to be called. The next fact which appears to me to be of great importance is the Indian aspect of the business. Mr Hodgart had been long in India; he had a very wide acquaintance with persons there requiring presses of the kind in question; he had a very great experience in dealing with such persons, and the evidence of gentlemen who are acquainted with the facts and with the country is to the effect that this business was of great importance and value. In this connection, it is not unimportant to note that, according to the evidence, the tendency of the natives of India is to stick to the merchant who has served them well, and to whom they have been in the habit of resorting, to a greater extent than prevails in this country. That being so, it is not of much importance to enter upon an analysis of the grounds on which this connection rested, or to say to what extent they were logical or sound. The fact is that such a connection did exist. When we come to the time of Mr Hodgart's death, we might conceive it possible that the question should be debated by his trustees whether there was a real and substantial goodwill, because of the peculiar nature of the business. But my first observation is that they did not in fact consider the question at all, and indeed were not able to consider it impartially owing to the position of some of their number, and especially of Mr Jones. But even if that question, whether there was a goodwill, was considered or not, we have real evidence that there was a goodwill, for while there were no premises, no plant, no establishment, no staff to which there could be a succession, Mr Jones asserted that he had in fact succeeded to the business and addressed his customers when he commenced business in India, two years after Mr Hodgart's death, as "successor to Mr John Hodgart." This fact seems to me pretty decisive of the question, and really amounts to a declaration on the part of this one of the trustees that Mr Hodgart's business did not necessarily die with him, which is the present contention of the defenders.

Being therefore disposed to hold that there was a saleable goodwill, for which the trustees must account, I do not find it possible to question the pecuniary value put upon it by the Lord Ordinary, and indeed no ground for meddling with that has been suggested by the trustees.

The only other point I wish to advert to is the delay that has taken place in bringing the action. It is to be noticed that the pursuers are two young girls, and it is idle to say that they should have checked or controlled the administration of the trustees,—while any earlier action taken by their father, while it might have been evidence of his opinion on the question whether there was a goodwill,—there being in his view a goodwill,—would not have been a bar to their afterwards taking proceedings. It is clear, however, that Mr Donald and the trustees were at arm's length, and even were this action to be regarded as Mr Donald's action, the challenge came within a reasonable time of the winding-up of Mr Hodgart's estate.

Paterson's
Trustees v.

Succession—Testament—Construction—"Survivor."—By a trust-disposition and settlement, dated in 1881, a testator directed his trustees to pay to W. and R., the sons of his half-sister, equally between them, the sum of £2500, "declaring that should both or either of them be at present deceased, or should hereafter predecease me, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall take the share that would have fallen to their parent if in life, equally per stirpes, and in default of such issue, the same shall fall and accresce to the survivor of the said W. and R., and the issue of the survivor, whom all failing, the same shall fall into and form part of the residue of my estate."

The testator died in 1889. Both W. and R. predeceased him, W. having died in 1867, leaving two sons who survived the testator, and R. having died in 1872 without issue.

In a competition between the trustees, who claimed R.'s half of the bequest of £2500 as having fallen into residue, and the sons of W., who claimed that half as having accresced to their own share, held upon a construction of the terms of the bequest (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the word "survivor" was to be read as equivalent to "other," and therefore that the claim of W.'s sons fell to be sustained.

ROBERT PATERSON, merchant in Glasgow, died on 9th March 1889, ^{2d Division.} leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 2d May 1881, by which ^{LdStormonth-} he conveyed his whole estate to trustees, and, inter alia, directed them ^{Darling.} "in the seventh place to pay or apply to or for behoof of William Brand and Robert Brand, children of the late Mrs Janet M'Kay or Brand, who was also a daughter of my mother by her first marriage, equally between them, the sum of £2500, declaring that should both or either of them be at present deceased, or should hereafter predecease me, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall take the share that would have fallen to their parent if in life, equally per stirpes, and in default of such issue, the same shall fall and accresce to the survivor of the said William Brand and Robert Brand, and the issue of the survivor, whom all failing, the same shall fall into and form part of the residue of my estate." The residue was left to a number of charitable institutions.

William Brand mentioned in this bequest predeceased the testator, having died in January 1867. He was survived by two sons, William Christie Brand and Robert Brand, who received payment of £1250, being one-half of the legacy, as in right of their father.

With respect to Robert Brand, the other nephew of the testator mentioned in the seventh purpose, it was found, in a petition under the Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 1891, that he must be presumed to have died on 31st December 1872, being exactly seven years after the date on which he was last known to have been alive.

In March 1893 Mr Paterson's trustees raised an action of multipoleinding for determination of the question as to the right to the sum of £1250, being the share of the legacy under the seventh purpose left to Robert Brand senior.

The trustees claimed the fund in medio, on the ground that Robert Brand senior, being presumed to have died on 31st December 1872, must be held to have survived his brother William, and having left no issue, or at least no issue having appeared to claim his share, and there being no evidence of the existence of any issue, his share of the legacy fell into residue.

No. 49.

 Paterson's
 Trustees v.
 Brand.

William Christie Brand and Robert Brand junior, the children of William Brand, claimed the fund in medio, on the ground that "on a sound construction of the seventh purpose of the trust-disposition and settlement in question, it was the testator's intention that the legacy of £2500 should, in the event of the predecease of William Brand and Robert Brand, fall and accresce to their issue or the issue of either of them failing issue of the other. As both William and Robert Brand predeceased the testator, the latter without leaving any issue, the claimants, as the only children of William Brand, are entitled to the balance of said legacy remaining unpaid."

On 5th August 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) repelled the claim for Paterson's trustees, and sustained that for William Christie Brand and Robert Brand junior, and ranked and preferred them accordingly.*

* "OPINION.— . . . As nothing was heard of Robert for a number of years, a petition was presented to the Court under the Presumption of Life Act of 1891, the result of which was that decree was pronounced finding that he must be presumed to have died on 31st December 1872, exactly seven years after the date on which he was last known to be alive. Though this date is purely statutory and arbitrary, I take it that, for all questions of succession, it must be treated as if it were the true date of death. The result, therefore, is that both the institutes must be held to have been dead before the date, not merely of the testator's death, but of his will, which was executed in 1881. (His Lordship then quoted the seventh purpose.)

"I shall first examine the clause apart from authority. It starts with a declaration that in the event of the predecease of either or both of the institutes, leaving issue, 'such issue' are to take what the parent would have taken 'equally per stirpes.' I pause there to ask, What did he mean by 'such issue'? Clearly, he meant the issue of either or both. If both were dead leaving children, each family were to take their parent's share. If one was dead leaving children, and the other survived, then the family of the predeceaser were to take their parent's share, and the survivor was to take his own. Then the testator goes on to deal with the case of there being no 'such issue,' but a surviving brother. In that case the surviving brother was to take the whole fund of £2500, which up to that time had been dealt with as two separate legacies of £1250 each. But what about the case of there being no surviving brother? The testator had already provided for that case, if both brothers were dead leaving issue. But for the case of both being dead and only one having left issue (which is the actual case) there was no provision, except the words 'and the issue of the survivor.'

"Now, are these words to be construed literally, as the trustees for the residuary legatees contend, or does the context of the will compel a wider construction? This part of the clause is introduced and controlled by the words 'in default of such issue.' That plainly means in default of issue to take their parent's share. Then it goes on to say 'the same' (i.e. the share which the brother or his issue would have taken) is to fall and accresce to the survivor, and the issue of the survivor. The testator thereby clearly shews his desire, at all events in one event, that the whole sum of £2500 is to remain in the Brand family. If one of the two stirpes fails and another survives, either in the person of one of the two brothers or his issue, the whole is to go to that surviving stirps. What possible difference could it make to the testator whether the surviving stirps was the family of the brother who died first or second? I can understand the state of mind of a testator who says,—'I shall secure to the issue of each of a number of liferenters their parent's share, but as to accruing shares, I prefer that these should go to the families of surviving liferenters.' That was the state of things in Forrest's Trustees v. Rae, 12 R. 389, and in the recent case (only as yet reported in the Scots Law Times, i. p. 138), of

The trustees reclaimed, and argued ;—The words of a will were to be read in their natural and ordinary meaning unless there was a clear implica-

Morrison's Trustees v. Macgeorge, 13th July 1893. But it is incredible to me that a testator should desire to say, 'I wish to give a legacy to two brothers and their issue, and in the event of both brothers dying and only one leaving a family, I wish that family to get the whole, provided their father died after his brother, but not if he died before his brother.'

"At the same time I am aware that (apart from some settled rule of law like the conditio si sine liberis) it is not permissible to supply words, or take away words, or distort words, in a will, merely because the construction otherwise would be capricious or even absurd. There must be something in the context of the will itself to warrant, and indeed to compel, such a liberty being taken with the ordinary meaning of language.

"In England this question has been very much canvassed, and the tendency latterly has been, I believe, towards a strict construction of the word 'survivors.' But the English Courts do still recognise at least one case in which the word must be construed as equivalent to 'others.' It is thus put by Lord Justice James in Badger v. Gregory, L. R., 8 Eq. 78 (at p. 84),—'When, for instance, Blackacre is given to A for life, with remainder to his children, and Whiteacre to B for life, with remainder to his children, and in case either should die without children, then his acre to go to the survivor and his children, the presumption is almost conclusive that the word "survivor" is put in contradistinction to "the one so dying," and means the one that does not die childless. If, in addition to this, the will goes on and says and if both shall die without children, then the whole shall go to C, the conclusion that "survivor" means "other" becomes irresistible.' This was the kind of case which I think Lord Shand had in view in Forrest's Trustees v. Rae, when he said, 'If a case should arise in which there is a gift over, it will be for consideration whether the effect of the terms in which the gift over is made ought to be to control the destination of accrescing shares to survivors, but in the meantime that question is entirely open.'

"Now, I am of opinion that such a case has arisen here. The gift over, on the strength of which alone the residuary legatees can take, begins with the words 'whom all failing.' Who are the 'all'? Clearly, I think, the issue of both the brothers, because the issue of both have been referred to in the preceding part of the clause. I therefore think I am warranted in adopting the canon of construction which governed the long chain of English authorities, of which Badger v. Gregory, Waite v. Littlewood, L. R., 8 Ch. App. 70, Wake v. Varah, L. R., 2 Ch. Div. 348, and Lucena v. Lucena, L. R., 7 Ch. Div. 255, are striking examples. I desire particularly to refer to the very guarded way in which Lord Justice Baggallay puts his judgment in Wake v. Varah, limiting the operation of the latitudinarian construction strictly to cases where the context requires it, and sufficiently saving the salutary rule that in all other cases the strict construction shall prevail.

"It is this peculiarity in the present case which enables me to decide it in favour of the claimants William Christie Brand and his brother without infringing to any extent on the authority of the two Scots cases I have mentioned, or of the case of Hairsten's Judicial Factor v. Duncan, 18 R. 1158, which was held to be ruled by the case of Forrest's Trustees v. Rae. The contest there was between the issue of predeceasing liferenters and residuary legatees, but the clause of residue contained no words declaring or importing that the fund was to fall into residue only on the failure of all the issue.

"Nor am I obliged to resort to English cases merely, as authority for the proposition that, if the context requires it, the word 'survivors' may be read in a non-literal sense. The case of Ramsay's Trustees v. Ramsay, 4 R. 243, decided that it may be so read in order to avoid intestacy, and it seems to me that that is a less cogent reason for doing so than where, as here, the terms of the gift over are positively inconsistent with the literal construction of the word."

tion that the testator intended to use them in another sense.¹ The only case in Scotland in which the word "survivor" had been read as equivalent to "other" was the case of Ramsay.² That construction was there reached on the ground that to give "survivor" its strict meaning would have resulted in intestacy. That ratio did not apply here, for if "survivor" were read strictly Robert Brand's share would fall into residue. The English authorities founded on by the Lord Ordinary did not apply. The principle of these authorities was this: where the gift over was in terms conditional on the failure of all the children of the primary legatees, "survivor" would be read as equivalent to "other," so that if there were any children of the primary legatees they would take, rather than that the gift should fall into intestacy, which would be the necessary consequence of the strict reading, the gift over being conditional on the failure of all the children. Here, however, the words were "whom all failing." That did not mean "failing children" of both brothers, but simply "failing the prior destination taking effect," and that left the construction of the prior destination where it was.³

The argument for the respondents sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The point of difficulty in this case arises on the words "and the issue of the survivor." If these words are to be read according to their strict meaning, then the case for the children of William must fail, for Robert survived William, therefore they are not the issue of the survivor. If the words are so read, then the intention of the testator as expressed was that if one of his stepsons should leave issue, but die after his childless brother, his children should take the whole sum of £2500, but that if the childless brother died last then they should only take half of it. Such a provision in a bequest in which the testator is dealing with the case of both his stepsons having predeceased him, seems upon the face of it so irrational in itself as to make it quite inconceivable that it was intended. To suppose that he meant to give the whole to the same issue of one stepson if he survived his childless brother, but to deprive them of half if he predeceased his childless brother, is impossible. In the words of Vice-Chancellor James in the case of Badger,—"It is scarcely possible to attribute to an ancestor the intention that the position of his descendants in the second degree is to depend on the accident of whether their parent dies first or second." It seems to me therefore that this case falls within the cases quoted by the Lord Ordinary, in which it has been held possible and right to read such words as we have here according to what it is certain was the intention of the testator, viz., that those should succeed who did survive him, whether stepsons, or issue of either stepson surviving. And when we have as here a gift over only in the event of "all failing," the conclusion becomes irresistible that what the testator meant was that as long as there were children of either to take, the whole should go to such issue. I think we have here, to use the words of Lord Hatherley in the case of Corbett, a case in which "a clear and necessary inference can be drawn from the terms of the will."

¹ Fergusson v. Dunbar, 1781, 3 B. C. C. 468, note; Lee v. Stone, 1848, 1 Exchq. 674; Crowder v. Stone, 1827, 3 Russ. 217.

I do not think it right that any general rule should be laid down. The only rule which is fixed is that the words of a will must be read according to their strict and natural meaning unless in the particular case it be opposed, as above expressed, to a clear and necessary inference.

Holding it to be so here, I proceed entirely in this case upon the specialties of the case.

I concur with the Lord Ordinary in the very clear views expressed in his opinion, and move your Lordships to adhere to his interlocutor.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am very glad that your Lordship has been able to arrive at the opinion which you have expressed. I daresay it is in accordance with what we may conjecture would have been the intention of the testator in the circumstances which have occurred. I can only say that I cannot concur. In my opinion the judgment is contrary to what I believe to be a settled rule of construction.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur with the Lord Ordinary and agree with his opinion. I am further of opinion that the judgment which we are now to pronounce neither introduces a new rule of construction of such settlements nor interferes with the construction of any existing rule.

v. Thomas.

Trust—Inter vivos trust—Whether trust one for behoof of creditors—Jus quæsitum tertio—Personal liability of trustee.—By trust-disposition A, a married woman, conveyed to B, as trustee, all her interest under the will of her deceased father, for the purposes (1) of realising the same and converting it into cash; (2) of paying all debts due by her at the date of the deed; and (3) of thereafter paying over the balance to her.

B accepted the trust, and thereafter inserted the following advertisement in a newspaper,—“A having granted a trust-disposition in favour of the subscriber, all parties who have claims against her are therefore requested to lodge the same with him, along with the vouchers thereof, within fourteen days from this date.” Signed B.

C lodged a claim with B, which A had docketed as correct. Subsequently A informed B that the docket was a mistake and instructed B not to pay C. B (having paid all A's other creditors) paid over the balance of the estate to A, without having satisfied C's claim.

In an action by C against A and B, in which it was established that C's claim was due by A, held that B having represented that the trust in his person was a trust for creditors, and C having intimated her claim to him, he was not entitled to pay over the balance of the trust-funds to A without satisfying C's claim, and consequently that he was personally liable to C.

By trust-disposition granted by Mrs Catherine Muir or Thomas, residing 1st Division, in Kirkcaldy, and her husband, William Robert Thomas, dated 19th, and registered in the Sheriff Court books of Fifeshire 29th January 1892, on the narrative that Mrs Thomas was entitled to one-fourth share of the estates left by her deceased father, to whom her mother had been decerned executrix, and further, "considering that it is necessary for our interests that we should grant the following conveyance," the spouses conveyed to "Thomas Jackson, solicitor, Kirkcaldy, and his assignees, All and Whole the fourth part or share of the property, heritable and moveable, real and personal, conveyed by the said disposition and settlement by the said William Muir, my father," with the whole titles thereof, and "with full power, warrant, and authority to him to make up titles to the said heritable or moveable property in the name of me, the said Catherine Muir or Thomas . . . Declaring that these presents are granted in trust for the ends, uses, and purposes, and under the conditions following, viz. :—(First) That the said Thomas Jackson, as trustee foresaid, shall with all convenient speed realise the estate hereby conveyed and convert the same into cash . . . (Second) that Thomas Jackson, said trustee, shall pay all debts due by us at the date of these presents, and the expenses of this trust-deed, and the expenses of the trust hereby created, including a reasonable gratification for his trouble; and in particular, that he shall pay" certain specified debts, "it being hereby provided that the said Thomas Jackson shall be entitled to conduct the said trust as law-agent on the footing that he shall be paid the usual charges as such for his trouble, or that he shall be entitled to employ any law-agent he may appoint: (Third) the said trustee, after satisfying the whole foregoing trusts and purposes, shall pay or convey to me, the said Catherine Muir or Thomas, the balance or residue of the said trust-estate, . . . and we consent to the registration hereof for preservation and execution."

Mr Jackson accepted the trust, and proceeded to realise the estate.

On 20th February 1892 he inserted the following advertisement in the Fife-shire Advertiser newspaper :—

"Mrs Catherine Muir or Thomas, wife of William Robert Thomas, residing in Kirkcaldy, having, with the consent of her said husband, granted a trust-disposition in favour of the subscriber, all parties who have claims against Mrs Thomas are therefore requested to lodge the same with him, along with the vouchers thereof, within fourteen days from this date. THOMAS JACKSON, Solicitor, Kirkcaldy.

"Kirkcaldy, 15th February 1892."

A few days after the advertisement appeared Miss Margaret Jack Cruickshank lodged an account with Mr Jackson against Mrs Thomas for £39, 6s. 10d., which Miss Cruickshank held as assignee of her father. This was not one of the debts specified in the trust-deed.

Mr and Mrs Thomas at first instructed Mr Jackson not to pay this account, but on 13th December they handed it to Miss Cruickshank with the following docquet written thereon, holograph of Mrs Thomas :—

"I, Kate Muir or Thomas, authorise you, Thomas Jackson, Esq., to pay sum as claimed. This correct from me. KATE MUIR OR THOMAS. WILLIAM R. THOMAS.

"13th December 1892."

On 19th December they again instructed Mr Jackson not to pay the account, in the following letter written by Mr Thomas,—“After considering about Miss Cruickshank’s account, we find that we made an error by signing it, as it is not just, so please do not pay it.”

The estate realised by Jackson was sufficient to pay all the debts of Mr and Mrs Thomas, including Miss Cruickshank’s account, but in consequence of the letter last quoted he declined to pay her, and after satisfying the other purposes of the trust he paid over the balance of the trust funds to Mr and Mrs Thomas.

In May 1893 Miss Cruickshank raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcaldy against Mr and Mrs Thomas, and also against Jackson, for decree against the defenders, ordaining them, jointly and severally, to pay to the pursuer the sum of £39, 6s. 10d. No. 50.

The pursuer founded on the trust-disposition, the advertisement, her claim, and the docquet thereon, and pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders Thomas having granted the trust-disposition condescended on for payment of their debts in favour of the defender Thomas Jackson, and he having realised sufficient funds to pay said debts, the pursuer is entitled to decree against him. (3) The defenders Thomas having by holograph docquet annexed to said account certified the correctness of the same, and authorised the defender Jackson to pay same, are not entitled to challenge the accuracy of or to repudiate said account. (6) The defender Jackson, in the circumstances condescended on, not being entitled to wind up the trust or part with any balance of funds in his hands without making provision for payment of said debt, and in the event of there not now being funds in his hands available for payment thereof, he is liable as an individual therefor.

Dec. 9, 1893.
Cruickshank
v. Thomas.

The defenders lodged common defences, in which they stated, inter alia, that the docquet was "got from the Thomases when in drink."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(6) The pursuer or her author being no parties to the trust-deed, never having acceded to it, their names not appearing in it as creditors, and having produced to the trustee no authenticated claim upon either of the trustees, the trustee was entitled to pay over any balance of the trust-funds in his hands to his constituents, especially as he was directed by the trustees not to pay the claim on the ground that it was not due. (9) The docquet to the pass-book is not holograph of the defenders Thomas, and having been impetrated from them when under the influence of drink, is not binding on the defenders.

On 5th July 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Gillespie) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact in conformity with the foregoing narrative):—"Finds that the defenders Thomas having granted the said docquet, no relevant and sufficient grounds have been stated which would entitle them to challenge the accuracy of or repudiate the said account; that the defender Thomas Jackson was not entitled to part with the balance of funds in his hands without making provision for payment of said account: Finds . . . that each of the defenders have made themselves liable for the said account: Repels the defences: Decerns against the defenders in terms of the prayer of the petition, . . . reserving the claim of relief of the defender Thomas Jackson against the other defenders."*

On appeal the Sheriff (Mackay) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the finding in the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute of 5th July 1893 that the defender Thomas Jackson was not entitled to part with the balance of funds in his hands without making provision for payment of said account, and also in so far as it finds the said Thomas Jackson liable for such payment; and in lieu thereof, finds that no

* "NOTE.— . . . Coming now to the question of Mr Jackson's liability, there is perhaps no very direct authority as to the liability of a trustee under an inter vivos trust; but the general proposition was hardly disputed that a trustee who parted with the trust funds without providing for a claim of which he had notice incurred personal liability if the claim proved a good one. It is not necessary that vouchers should have been submitted to the trustee. It was his duty to call for them if he thought them necessary. But it may be added that in the case of an open account like this, vouchers would not be required even in a sequestration. The trustee was not of course bound to run any risk, and being interpellated by the trustees from paying this claim, his proper course was to raise an action of multipointing and exoneration—Bell's Com. ii. 504.

relevant grounds are stated for holding the said Thomas Jackson personally liable for the said account, and assailing the said Thomas Jackson from the conclusions of the action. . . . Quoad ultra adheres to the said interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.*

The pursuer appealed, and argued;—The judgment of the Sheriff assailing the defender Jackson ought to be recalled. This was a trust for creditors, which could not be recalled while there were creditors unpaid. That being so, Jackson, as the trustee, was not entitled to pay over the trust funds to the trusters before he had satisfied all their creditors, and having so paid over while the pursuer's debt was unpaid, he was personally liable to her.¹ Even if the trust were not strictly a trust for behoof of creditors, Jackson, after he had advertised for claims, and had received notice of the pursuer's debt, was not entitled to pay the balance of the trust-estate to the trusters without satisfying the pursuer's claim.

The argument for the defenders sufficiently appears from the Sheriff's note.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case sues Mr and Mrs Thomas as being originally the debtors for the debt due to her, and also Thomas Jackson,

* "NOTE.— . . . Mr Jackson became under the trust-deed trustee or mandatary for the defenders Thomas in a trust for payment of their debts. But the pursuer's author was not a party to and is indeed not named in that deed. There was therefore no direct contract under the trust-deed between the pursuer's author and either Mr Jackson or the other defenders, Catherine and William Robert Thomas. It was in the power of the parties to this voluntary trust-deed to terminate the trust at any time, and it has in fact been terminated by Mr Jackson's discharge. Neither do any of the provisions of the trust fall within the doctrine jus quesitum tertio, by which a right accrues to a party who is not a party to the contract. In that quite exceptional class of case it is necessary that it should be clearly shewn that a right was intended to be created in favour of a third party who is not himself a party to the contract or in any way bound by it. There is nothing of the kind here. The intention of the trust-deed was not to guarantee payment to the creditors, but that as between the Thomases and Mr Jackson so long as he had funds of theirs in his hands a convenient method should be provided for paying their debts. When Mr Jackson was discharged, and the balance of the funds paid over by him to the trusters, that obligation of course ceased. But it is said Mr Jackson advertised for claims, and the pursuer's claim was intimated. This is true, but such an advertisement cannot be construed as an obligation by Mr Jackson either to pay the creditors out of his own funds, or not to pay over the balance of the trusters' funds in his hands before liquidating all their debts. . . . When the balance of the funds was paid over to the trusters, the pursuer's author continued to have the liability of his proper debtors just as before; and if he has failed to enforce it until they have dissipated their funds he is himself to blame. . . . The distinction between a mortis causa trust, in which the trustee or executor represents the truster, and is liable to make his whole funds forthcoming in the proper order of preference as between creditors and beneficiaries, and an inter vivos trust, in which the trustee is only the agent of the truster, and subject to his directions, is very clearly brought out by the recent cases Lucas' Trustees v. Beresford, 19 R. 943; and The Heritable Securities Company v. Miller, 20 R. 675, 30 S. L. R. 354. . . . The trustee in a sequestration or under a trust to which creditors have acceded, and so bound themselves to accept a composition if the funds fall short, is of course in a different position, and must not part with the funds till the debts have been paid. . . ."

as trustee under the trust-disposition of Mr and Mrs Thomas. The trust-deed made over to Mr Jackson, in trust for the purposes therein mentioned, all and whole the fourth part and share of the property, heritable and moveable, real and personal, conveyed by the disposition and settlement of William Muir, the father of Mrs Thomas, and the second purpose of the trust was that Mr Jackson should pay all debts due by Mr and Mrs Thomas at the date of these presents. Cruickshank
v. Thomas.

I think the grounds on which this case must be dealt with are found in what followed after the trust-deed was granted. Mr Jackson having received that disposition, and holding the sums contained therein as a trustee for payment of the debts of the granters, advertised in the Fife-shire Advertiser for claims on the general statement that Mrs Thomas having, with consent of her husband, granted a trust-disposition in favour of the subscriber—"All parties who have claims against Mrs Thomas are therefore requested to lodge the same with him, along with the vouchers thereof, within fourteen days from this date." Mr Jackson therefore took up the position of one to whom a debtor had made a trust-disposition of his estate, and who was to settle claims of creditors of the trustor therefrom. Thereafter Miss Cruickshank lodged her account with Jackson. Mr and Mrs Thomas at first disputed this account, but ultimately signed a docquet certifying it as correct. No doubt they now say that when they signed the docquet they were intoxicated, but I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that the averment on this point on record is insufficient, and that we must hold the docquet to have been duly signed by Mr and Mrs Thomas. What happened thereafter? Mr Thomas, on behalf of himself and his wife, writes to Mr Jackson,—"After considering about Mr Cruickshank's account, we find we made an error by signing it, as it is not just, so please do not pay it." Therefore Mr Jackson's position was this, that he advertised for claims, that he got a claim certified by the debtors as correct, and that he was thereafter interpellated from paying it by the statement that it was not correct. What he did was to hand the balance of the trust funds to Mrs Thomas and her husband, and he thus left the creditor to recover her money in the best way she could. In these circumstances, I think the Sheriff-substitute was right in holding that as a trustee for creditors Mr Jackson was not entitled to hand back the money to Mrs Thomas without satisfying himself that all claims of creditors had been satisfied. If he had doubts about the claim his proper course, as stated by the Sheriff-substitute, was to raise an action of multiplepounding.

I am of opinion we should recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff, and pronounce judgment in terms of the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am of opinion that the deed created a trust for creditors, and that the trustee acted as if it did so. I therefore concur in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

LORD TRAYNER.—I concur in the result which your Lordships have reached.

I do not regard the trust-deed with which we are here concerned as a trust-deed for creditors in the ordinary sense. It was, I think, primarily a trust for behoof of the granters, although it contains a clause authorising the trustee to pay "all debts due" by the trusters at the date of the deed. But then the defender Jackson, by the advertisement which he published calling on all parties having claims against the trusters to lodge the same with him within a limited period, may reasonably enough be held to have thereby represented that the trust in his person was for behoof of those whose claims he desired to be sent to him, and further, that he had funds for the purpose of meeting those claims. The claim now sued for was duly lodged with Jackson, and after that was done I doubt his right to part with the estate in his hands until that claim had been settled, or at all events to part with the estate without due notice to the claimants that he intended to do so. The pursuer lodged with Jackson an account of his claim, docqueted by the trustees as correct, and authorising him to pay it. The defenders Thomas now say that the docquet was obtained from them when they were "in drink." I think such a defence cannot be listened to here. The docquet must stand until it is regularly set aside, and standing that docqueted account, I think Jackson cannot excuse himself for parting with the trust funds before paying the debt which was not only admitted but payment of which out of the trust funds was authorised. I prefer to affirm Jackson's liability for the sum sued for rather on the ground of his own actings in the circumstances which I have stated than upon the view that the trust-deed was in itself one for behoof of creditors in the ordinary sense.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE SCOTTISH INVESTMENT TRUST COMPANY, LIMITED, appealed to the Commissioners of Income-Tax for the county of Midlothian against the following assessment under Schedule D of the Income-Tax Act, 1842,* for the year ending 1st November 1892:—

* The Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, Schedule D, First Case, Rule First, enacts,—“The duty to be charged in respect thereof” (i.e., “in respect of any trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade not contained in any other schedule of this Act”), “shall be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of such trade, &c. upon a fair and just average of three years, ending on such day of

Total (after deduction of loss on sales of stock), £6103 0 3

Upon which the duty at 6d. was £152, 11s. 6d.

The ground of appeal was that the sums second above mentioned (£2138, 17s. 3d.) being "increases on realisation of stocks of this company are capital sums, and therefore not liable to assessment for income-tax."

The Commissioners refused the appeal.

The company obtained a case for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer.

The case stated, inter alia, that the company was established in 1887 "for the objects set forth in the original prospectus, and in the memorandum of association."* The articles of association did not form part of the case.

"II. The capital of the company is invested in various securities, and its revenue is derived from dividends and interest. It was registered 27th July 1887, and has issued five annual reports and statements of accounts to its proprietors. From these it appears that balances of profits on sales of securities have been made annually from the commencement, but they are entered in the 'revenue' account in the report and statement for year to 1st November 1891 only.

"III. The present assessment is based upon the fifth annual report and statement for year to 1st November 1892."

Then followed the schedule of assessment as given above. The case then proceeded,— "It appears from the report by the trustees, appended hereto, that these profits on sales of securities were applied to write down the 'book value' of the company's investments, as also was a further sum of £40,000, making a total of £42,138, 17s. 3d., the whole of which the trustees consider permanent loss."

The case stated that the Surveyor of Taxes "did not," before the com-the year immediately preceding the day of assessment in which the accounts of the said trade, &c. shall have been usually made up," &c.

* The prospectus of the company contained, inter alia, the following statements,— "The object of the Scottish Investment Trust Company is to apply the principle of co-operation to the investment of money, so that investors may by uniting their means spread their investments over a wide field, thus obtaining a higher rate of interest with greater security and exemption from liability than if the amount subscribed by each shareholder were independently invested."

The memorandum of association provided, inter alia :—" 3. The objects for which the company is established are :—(a) To raise money by share capital, on such terms and conditions as may be thought desirable, and invest the amount thereof in, or otherwise acquire and hold, any of the investments following,—that is to say, the shares, stock, &c. of any company. (b) To borrow or raise money by the issue or sale of any bonds, mortgages, debentures, or debenture stock of the company, whether perpetual or otherwise, and to invest any money so raised in any such investments as aforesaid. (c) To acquire any such investments as aforesaid by original subscription, tender, or otherwise, and whether or not fully paid-up, and to make payments thereon as called up, or in advance of calls, or otherwise, and to subscribe for the same, either conditionally or otherwise, and to vary the investments of the company, and generally to sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of, deal with, or turn to account any of the assets of the company."

missioners "dispute that loss on sales would have been a deduction from profit, but pointed out that the sum now in question was 'net profit.'"

From a schedule of the stocks sold during the year of assessment, appended to the case, it appeared that the cost of these stocks amounted to 3·6 per cent of the original cost of investments, and that in the cases of five out of seventeen of the stocks, both the purchase and sale (resulting in a profit) had taken place within the year in question.

The Commissioners stated that they, being of opinion "(1) that the net profits on sales of securities during the year, fell to be reckoned among the profits and gains of the company, irrespective of the manner of book-keeping; and (2) that writing such profits against reduction of 'book value' of securities held by the company did not afford a ground of relief, refused the appeal."

The questions for the opinion of the Court were:—"1. Whether the net gain made by the company during the year, by realising investments at larger prices than were paid for them, falls to be reckoned among the profits and gains of the company for assessment under the Income-Tax Acts? 2. Whether the fact that such profits and gains have been written against depreciation in book value of investments held by the company, as part of its capital, is a ground for relief from such assessment?"

Argued for the company;—The profits on the sales of stocks had been properly charged to capital account, and had never entered the income account; they were therefore not liable to income-tax. The schedule of particulars of stocks sold appended to the case shewed that the original cost of the company's investments was £804,165, 13s. 1d. That was book value, but the real value was much less, and they were entitled to set off the appreciation in the value of certain of the stocks, as shewn by the proceeds of the sales, against the much larger depreciation of others, some of which were not only much depreciated, but were unsaleable and of no value at all. The gain on the sales was not profit of the company in the sense of being earnings on its capital, but was an appreciation of capital, and the general depreciation being, in the opinion of the directors, permanent, it was only their duty to keep the capital at as nearly as possible its true value, as opposed to its book value, by setting off appreciation on the capital against depreciation. If it had been the business of the company to trade in stocks, and if they had looked to such trading for payment of their dividend, then the assessment would have been right, but such trading was no part of their business. The power given to the company in article 3 (c) of the memorandum, "to vary the investments of the company," did not contemplate trading in shares, but was ancillary and necessary to the power of acquiring and holding shares or stock of other companies. It was just such a power as trustees had in ordinary trusts to enable them to carry on the trust to the best advantage. That it was no part of the business of the company to trade in stocks and shares distinguished the case from those quoted by the Surveyor, and particularly from the case of the Northern Assurance Company.¹ In all those cases the question had come to be—what was the nature of the fund, and how had it been applied? In the Northern Assurance case the directors had barred themselves from saying that profit on realisation of assets was not true profit, because they had treated it so themselves by bringing it into their "profit and loss account," out of which they paid dividends. The decision of that case, therefore, only decided the question on those circumstances. Here the company had never treated the sum gained as profits in the true sense of the word, but had always kept it in the capital account. Again, the case of the *Edinburgh Southern Cemetery Company*¹ was distinguishable from the present, because there the profits out of which payments were made to capital account were the profits on the ordinary business of the company to which the company looked for payment of dividend, and by the constitution of the company they were devoted to income purposes. So also the ground of judgment in the Coltness Iron Company case,² was that the sum invested in sinking new pits was in reality a deduction from annual profits of capital employed in the company's business.

Argued for the respondent;—The case was precisely ruled by the *Northern Assurance Company's*³ case. The rule laid down by the Court there (16 R. at p. 475) was not qualified in any way, and indeed the present case was less favourable to the company objecting to the tax than the other, because it was admittedly no part of the business of the Northern Assurance Company to traffic in shares, while one of the objects of the appellants' company was, as stated in article 3 (c) of their memorandum "to vary the investments of the company, and generally to sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of, deal with, or turn to account any of the assets of the company." These words clearly pointed to a traffic in shares as one of the objects of the company, and the schedule of "Particulars of Stocks" appended to the case shewed that the company had themselves taken that view of their business, as in five of the sales there recorded the purchases had evidently been made with a view to a rise, as the shares bought were only held for a few months, or even days. The question the Court had to decide was, what was the nature of the money proposed to be taxed? Was it profits or gains? If it was, then the Court had nothing to do with its destination. That was the view taken by the Court in the cases of the Northern Assurance Company,³ the Coltness Iron Company,² and the Edinburgh Southern Cemetery Company,¹ and there were other cases to the like effect.⁴ Here, where it was evident that the company had carried on business in buying and selling shares, the profits of that business must be looked on as ordinary income, and, just as in the Edinburgh Southern Cemetery case, the Court would not take into account that the profits or income won by that business had been applied to capital purposes.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The Commissioners have amended the case in terms of our remit, and we have now before us the memorandum of association of the appellant company. I observe that the articles of association are not made part of the case, but the memorandum affords information as to the business and objects of the company, which is of the highest importance for the decision of the questions submitted to us.

As its name indicates, this is an investment company, and the memorandum makes it plain that its profits are to be derived from various operations relating to the investments. The third head of the memorandum professes to state the objects of the company, and in head (c) of this enumeration occur the words, "to vary the investments of the company, and generally to sell, exchange, or otherwise dispose of, deal with, or turn to account any of the assets of the company."

It is true that the doing of any of these things might be incidentally necessary in the conduct of the business of any company. It is also true that this memorandum states in the latter heads of the same article several things which are less properly described as objects of a company than as incidental acts of administration. But from the structure of the memorandum it appears that the varying the investments and turning them to account are not contemplated merely as proceedings incidentally necessary, for they take their place among what are the essential features of the business. In my view, such speculations are among the appointed means of this company's gains. Accordingly, I should consider it legitimate for the directors to divide profits so made, although, in determining the amount divisible they would necessarily have regard not alone to the individual transaction yielding profit, but to the general results of their changes of investments. It would be right that they should maintain as strictly as possible the relative rights of separation between capital and income, and make all apportionments necessary in that behalf.

My view of this company is, therefore, that its position in the present question is entirely distinguished from that of a private individual or an ordinary trader. Accordingly I think that it is wrong in its contention that increases on realisations of stocks of the company are capital sums and therefore not liable to assessment for income-tax. As regards the sums in question, they are stated in the report of the company to be net profits on sales of securities during the year. There is nothing before us to shew that a wider view of the operations of the company would prove this statement to be misleading, and if the appellants point to their third contention in the case,—“In the year in which the tax is charged, the capital account of the company has had greater losses than profits, and the permanent loss on the capital account during the year has been considerable,”—I must observe that there is no statement of fact in the case to instruct it. This remark applies with the more force now that, after the various points had been mooted in debate, the case has been reconsidered and amended by the Commissioners.

In determining this question I own to being influenced by the decision of this Division in the Northern Assurance Company v. Inland Revenue, which is cited in the case. The words quoted from it in the present case are evidently well considered; they form part of the judgment of the Court; they are laid down as forming a rule for subsequent practice, and they in terms apply to the case before us. I should be slow to depart from so authoritative an expression of opinion, and the argument has failed to satisfy me that it is erroneous.

I am for answering the first query in the affirmative, and the second in the negative.

LORD ADAM and LORD KINNEAR concurred.

The LORD PRESIDENT intimated that LORD M'LAREN, who was absent when the case was advised, concurred in the judgment.

THE COURT affirmed the determination of the Commissioners.

Public officer—Jurisdiction—Nobile officium—Notary-public.—Held that the Court of Session has jurisdiction to deprive a notary-public of office.

Circumstances in which the Court deprived two notaries-public of office.

1ST DIVISION.

ON 30th October 1893 the Incorporated Society of Law-Agents in Scotland presented a petition to the First Division of the Court of Session, in which they prayed the Court to deprive Richard Laing, Alloa, and John Stevenson, Kilmarnock, of the office of notary-public, and to direct the clerk to the admission of notaries to strike their names off the list of notaries-public.

The petitioners averred that John Stevenson, writer in Kilmarnock, was in the year 1881 admitted to the office of notary-public; that the said John Stevenson, having pleaded guilty to a charge of embezzlement, was, on 14th January 1891, sentenced by the High Court of Justiciary to five years' penal servitude, and is now undergoing that sentence; that Richard Laing, writer in Alloa, was, on 12th January 1891, tried before the High Court of Justiciary for breach of trust and embezzlement, and, being found guilty, was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment; that in May 1891 the petitioners presented a petition to the Court setting forth these facts in regard to the said Richard Laing, and praying that his name should be struck off the register and roll of law-agents, and that no answers having been lodged, the Court granted the prayer of the petition; that the said Richard Laing had been in the year 1873 admitted to the office of notary-public.

Laing lodged answers, in which he admitted the facts stated in the petition, but submitted that the petition should be refused in respect of "(a) Incompetency. The charter under which the petitioners exist contains no power entitling them to interfere with notaries-public; and (b) Mora. The respondent, after enduring the punishment awarded him by the Court, and notwithstanding the proceeding adopted by the petitioners for the removal of his name from the register of law-agents, found that he retained the confidence, and still does, of a considerable number of clients who previously entrusted to him their concerns. Accordingly, he resumed business as a writer in Alloa, and continues so to act. In any view, suspension ought to be enough."

Stevenson did not lodge answers.

Argued for the respondent;—The Court had no power to deprive a notary-public of office. Notaries were appointed by the Crown, and they were not servants of the Court. Their office was as much a public office as that of a Judge, and the Court had no jurisdiction over them. The only function of the Court with regard to notaries was to see that, at the time of their appointment, they were duly qualified in learning and in conduct. After the Court had certified to that, they had no further jurisdiction over them.¹ Further, this petition was presented by an incorporated society which had nothing to do with notaries-public, though it chanced that most of its members were undoubtedly notaries. They had therefore no title to insist in the prayer. But, in any event, the prayer should not be granted, as the respondent had already suffered his punishment for the offence he had committed, and it would be hard if, when he had succeeded in recovering the confidence of the public, he should, at the end of two years, be debarred from practising as a notary.

Incorporated Society of

in Scotland v.
Laing.

Argued for the petitioners;—(1) The Court had power to grant the prayer, and this was a most proper case for their interference, considering the international character of the office of notary. The Court was the hand appointed by the Crown, not only to superintend the admission of notaries, but to see that notaries did their duty while they held office. In the middle ages there were two classes of notaries—the papal and the royal notaries. This distinction continued down to the end of the 16th century, when the former class was abolished in Scotland. By the Act, 1503, c. 64, power was given to the bishops to deprive all notaries who had misbehaved of their office, and Sir George Mackenzie, in his observations on the Scots Acts (p. 112, written in 1686), stated that though originally the bishops alone had that power, the Court of Session had, at the date of writing, the jurisdiction which the bishops originally held. By the Act 1563, c. 79, it was ordained that all notaries were to be presented by the Crown and to be examined by the Court, and by the Act 1587, c. 45, which appointed a general examination of existing notaries, all ignorant notaries were to be deprived of office. By Act of Sederunt, 30th July 1691, it was determined that notaries should be of good fame and breeding, and the Court had on various occasions considered whether applicants were suitable persons in reputation as well as in learning.¹ But, in point of fact, the Court had on two occasions at least removed notaries from office on the ground of malpractices.² In the last case cited the notary was not removed, but he was reprimanded, and the Court considered whether he should be deprived of office. (2) As to title. In questions of this kind title depended largely on interest, and the Law-Agents' Society had the strongest interest to keep the office of notary pure. Further, in Mitchell's case,¹ the Court considered the title of the writers, and had no difficulty on the question. (3) There had been no undue delay. The petitioners had been in communication with the Lord Advocate, and came to the Court immediately they learned that he would not do anything until application had been made to the Court. Any delay there had been was favourable to the respondent, as he had been practising as a notary ever since he came out of prison.

At advising, the opinion of the Court was delivered by LORD PRESIDENT.—The authorities cited by Mr Dundas satisfy us that the Court of Session has the power of depriving delinquent notaries-public of office. There is the passage from Sir George Mackenzie expressly stating the power of deprivation to reside in the Court, and the two cases of Stuart and Hope are instances of the exercise of that power.

This being so, it is the duty of the Court to deprive when cases of delinquency are brought to its knowledge, and there is no valid objection to the Court being moved to act by the present petitioners.

The notaries against whom this petition is directed have been convicted of breach of trust and embezzlement, crimes directly within the region of the office in question, and it is quite plain that persons so situated are unfit holders of that office. It is true that, in the case of the respondent Laing, the conviction was in January 1891, and his sentence expired in January 1892. But it is manifest that, if in May 1891, when the name of that respondent was struck

We are unable to find, in the circumstances which I have mentioned, adequate ground for refusing now to do what we should unquestionably have done then had we been asked.

The prayer of the petition is therefore granted.

Sale—Sale of heritage—Defect in title—Right to cancel—Tender of valid title after action raised for implement.—A purchaser of heritage objected to the title tendered by the seller on the ground that it was defective. The seller having written a letter refusing to give any other title, the purchaser repudiated the contract.

In the course of an action brought by the seller against the purchaser for implement, the pursuer admitted that the title previously tendered was defective, but tendered a valid title.

Held (rev. judgment of Lord Wellwood) that the purchaser had been justified in rescinding from the contract, and was entitled to absolvitor.

In March 1893 Thomas Gilfillan, writer in Glasgow, advertised for 1st DIVISION.
sale a ground-annual of £40, payable out of property in Glasgow. Ld. Wellwood.

On 27th March, Cadell & Grant, W.S., Edinburgh, made an offer of £810, "subject to the title being in order. . . ." This offer was accepted.

On receiving the titles of the property the purchasers discovered that there were standing on record, undischarged, two bonds, one granted in 1819 for £200, and the other granted in 1822 for £150, in favour of a Mr Henry. It further appeared that Mr Henry had in 1825 sold the property by a disposition, which expressly declared the subjects to be burdened with the two bonds, the sasine following upon this disposition being the basis of the progress of titles tendered to Cadell & Grant. The latter accordingly called upon the seller to clear the record. In the course of a long correspondence (the most important parts of which are quoted infra *) which ensued between the parties, the seller's agents,

* 8th April 1893.—Brown & Gilfillan to Cadell & Grant.—" . . . There is no existing burden of £350 affecting the subjects. When Mr Walter Allison bought the property from Mr Henry, when sold under the latter's bond for £200, he granted a bond for £550 to Mr Henry, which was made up of the £200 contained in the bond under which Mr Henry sold and the £200 and £150 contained in bonds, both held by him, mentioned in the sasine in favour of Mr Allison. The bonds for £200 and £150 were consequently superseded by the £550 bond, and have long since been extinguished by prescription. To this effect we enclose a letter from Mr James Gardner, writer, Paisley (the law-agent of Mr Henry's trustees), to Mr R. T. Neilson, dated 15th July last. From it you will see that no interest was paid on the bonds in question, and that Mr Henry only held a bond for £550, while, from the searches we sent you, you have testimony that they were never assigned by Mr Henry or his representatives."

3d May.—Cadell & Grant to Brown & Gilfillan.—" . . . Our object

No. 53. Messrs Brown & Gilfillan, explained that the bonds in question had been extinguished by a subsequent bond, which was discharged in 1850; that they had remained on the record per incuriam, and that no interest was paid on them, and they enclosed a letter to that effect which had been written by the agent of Mr Henry's trustees to a Mr Neilson. Ultimately, being unable at that time to clear the record, they brought the correspondence on this head to a close by intimating that unless the purchaser agreed to accept the title offered, along with a letter similar to that written to Mr Neilson, they would raise an action to have the sale implemented. The purchasers declined to accept such a title, and declared that they cancelled the transaction.

in writing this letter—which we mean to found on—is to state clearly, once and for all, that we are willing to implement our contract if the title to the property is made good; and that if you agree to clear the record we are further willing to allow you a reasonable time in which to do so. Though it is not our business to suggest how this might be done, we may state that we should be satisfied if you obtained and put on record a discharge by the late Mr Henry's representatives, they, of course, first making up a title to the bonds. Failing this, we should be satisfied with the recording of a decree of declarator of payment and extinction, such as was suggested in various reported cases. Or we are willing to consider any other method you can suggest which will enter the record, and make us safe in questions with future purchasers.

"We shall be glad to hear whether you are prepared to remedy the title in the respects to which we have called your attention, as, failing your undertaking to do so within three days, we must declare definitely that negotiations are at an end, and we shall find another investment for the money we had in view."

5th May.—Brown & Gilfillan to Cadell & Grant.—"We duly received your letter of the 3d inst. It is quite impossible for us to let you have an answer in the course of 'three days.' We shall endeavour to write you early next week."

6th May 1893.—Cadell & Grant to Brown & Gilfillan.—"Unless we have a satisfactory obligation to rectify the points which we hold are wrong by the morning post of Wednesday, 10th inst., the transaction is off."

9th May.—Clark & Macdonald to Cadell & Grant.—"Referring to your letters to Messrs Brown & Gilfillan of 3d and 6th inst., they are not prepared to either give a discharge by Mr Henry's representatives, or obtain a decree of declarator of payment and extinction. They are, however, prepared to give a holograph letter by Mr Gardner, the agent for Mr Henry's representatives, on the same lines as his letter to Mr R. T. Neilson of 15th July last. Your letter might, if you so desire, go somewhat more fully into the details of the matter than Mr Neilson's did, but beyond that our correspondents are not prepared to go.

"Unless we hear from you agreeing to what we now propose between this and Thursday morning, our instructions are to go on with the action of implement. If, therefore, you do not write us agreeing, be so good as let us have a note of your client's name and designation by the morning of Thursday first."

10th May.—Cadell & Grant to Brown & Gilfillan.—"We have to-day heard from Messrs Clark & Macdonald that you are not prepared either to give a discharge by Mr Henry's representatives or to obtain a decree of declarator of payment and extinction, and we regret that we cannot see our way to accept a holograph letter by Mr Gardner, the agent for Mr Henry's representatives, such as you mention, as we do not consider that it would be sufficient evidence, either now or in the future, of the extinction of the burdens in question.

"We have accordingly, in terms of our letter of 3d inst., no recourse but to cancel the transaction. . . ."

The pursuer stated ;—" The pursuer was not at first aware whether Mr Henry had left any representatives, and could not therefore at once undertake to obtain a formal discharge of the said two bonds, but he at once set to work to trace out Mr Henry's representatives, and having discovered the existence of his last surviving trustee, the pursuer at once intimated to the defenders that he was prepared to raise an action of declarator of payment and extinction of the said two bonds. He has since done so [on 16th June 1893], and obtained decree therein. An extract of the said decree will be produced in the course of this process."

The defenders pleaded ;—(2) The pursuer having refused to purge the record as stated, and the defenders having thereupon rescinded the contract, the defenders should be assoilzied. (3) The pursuer having failed to produce a good title and to purge the record from incumbrances affecting it, the defenders are (a) at common law and (b) in terms of their offer entitled to resile from the contract sued on.

The Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) on 7th November, inter alia, repelled the second and third pleas in law for the defenders.*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The consideration of time did to a certain extent enter into the contract, for it was intended to be a Whitsunday transaction. The defenders did not however press that view, for it was really immaterial—looking to what had actually happened—whether time was or was not of the essence of the contract. The defen-

* "OPINION.— . . . The second and third pleas in law for the defenders are based on the ground that the defenders were entitled to rescind the contract because, before this action was raised, the pursuer refused to purge the record of two bonds for £200 and £150 respectively, granted in 1819 and 1822. The position at first taken up by the pursuer in regard to these bonds was that they were extinguished by a later bond for £550, granted in 1825 ; that no interest had been paid upon them since that time ; and that they were prescribed. The pursuer was in this difficulty, that he was unable to discover the representatives of a Mr Henry, who was once in right of the bonds, and so was unable to obtain a decree of declarator of payment and extinction. Relying on the soundness of his view as to the extinction of the bond, he raised the present action of implement, but, shortly after it was raised, he discovered the representatives of Mr Henry, and obtained decree of declarator of payment and extinction of the said two bonds, an extract of which he has now produced. The decree was dated 30th June 1893, and I understand it is admitted that it will effectually clear the record.

"I am of opinion that the defenders are not entitled to resile simply because the pursuer took up what I assume to be an erroneous position at the outset. He lost no time in presenting the matter for determination by the Court ; and, finding himself in a position to remove all difficulty, at once tendered the defenders the decree of declarator of payment and extinction, and this within four months of the date of the contract.

"If time had been of the essence of the contract, the defenders might have been entitled to resile if a clear title had not been tendered within the time specified ; but here no time was stipulated for, and the transaction was for investment only. I am, therefore, of opinion that this is not a ground upon which the defenders are entitled to resile from the contract. The cases of Raeburn v. Baird, 5th July 1832, 10 Sh. 761, per Lord Balgray 765, and Carter v. Lornie, 20th Dec. 1890, 18 R. 353, per Lord Adam, 364, and Lord M'Laren, 365, substantiate, I think, the view which I take of this case. It is true that, in the latter case, there was an element (which is not here) upon which the Lord President proceeded to a certain extent, namely—that possession of the subjects had been taken by the purchaser ; but this was not, I think, essential to the judgment, as appears from the opinions of Lords Adam and M'Laren. . . ."

ders had in fact been willing to allow the pursuer a reasonable time for curing the defect in the title, but he had, on the 9th May, tabled as the only title which he could or would produce a title which he now admitted the defenders were not bound to accept. The terms of his letter were precise and peremptory, and amounted to an election by the pursuer to stand on the title then proffered. The defenders therefore were entitled to cancel the transaction.¹ The pursuer had no right to hold the contract indefinitely in suspense, and, in the circumstances, his offer of a valid title came too late.

Argued for the respondent;—In the present case time was not of the essence of the contract. Different considerations applied where, as in the case of a lease or purchase of a house for personal occupation, with entry at a definite date, time was of the essence of the bargain. The respondent was precisely in the position of the pursuer in Carter v. Lornie,² who had been held to be wrong in insisting upon the acceptance of the title which he offered, and yet even after final judgment was allowed to tender what the Court held to be necessary to the validity of his conveyance. Here the pursuer's agents took up the position that they would only do what it must be admitted was technically insufficient, though technically only, because the bonds which still stood on record were not represented to be practical incumbrances. They offered all they could offer, and did so in the bona fide belief that they were tendering what was sufficient. The pursuer was entitled to have a judgment as to whether the tender was sufficient or not, but having found himself in the position of being able to avoid going on to final judgment on that point, he at once tendered all that the defenders asked. In these circumstances, time not being of the essence of the bargain, the defenders were not entitled to cancel the transaction any more than the pursuer in Carter's case. The defenders were not damnified by the delay.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—In the view which I take of this case the second plea in law for the defender states the legal question which we have to decide.

The contract of sale could have been fulfilled by the tender by the seller within a reasonable time of a good title, the adjustment of a title being often, as we know, a matter of negotiation. The Dean of Faculty admitted that in this contract of sale it did not look as if time were of the essence of the contract, and the seller was entitled to a reasonable allowance of time within which to give a good title. But then the question is, whether a definite and sharp issue having been raised the pursuer did not, by his own choice, take up a position which amounts to a definite refusal to implement the contract.

A long correspondence took place between the parties, but comparatively early in that correspondence Messrs Cadell & Grant put their finger on the fact that two bonds on the property were undischarged, and with much pungency drew the attention of the pursuers' agents to their existence. Upon 3d May they used very definite language. They state clearly, once for all, that they are willing to implement the contract if the title is made good; and further, that if the seller agrees to clear the record they are willing to allow him a reasonable time for doing so. They then go on to say that, although it is not their business to suggest how the difficulty might be got over, they should be satisfied with a discharge from the representatives of the holder of the bonds, and they conclude by stating that they will be glad to hear that the seller is prepared to remedy the title, but failing an undertaking to do so being given within three days they declare the negotiations definitely at an end.

Gilfillan v.
Cadell &
Grant.

The pursuer's agents demur to give an answer within three days, but promise to endeavour to write within a week. Next day Cadell & Grant repeat, that failing a satisfactory obligation to rectify the title being received in four days "the transaction is off."

I pause here to observe that disclosed on the face of the correspondence is a perfectly definite and intelligible objection to the title, and one thoroughly understood by the seller's agents, who, however, are most reasonably offered time, if they will undertake to remove the objection.

Their answer is dated 9th May, and in that letter they say that they are not prepared to give a discharge by Mr Henry's representatives or obtain a decree of payment and extinction, but that they are prepared to give a holograph letter by the agent of Mr Henry's representatives. They go on to say, that unless they hear from the purchasers agreeing to what they propose they will at once raise an action for implement. To that letter the purchasers reply, in very definite terms, that they cannot see their way to accept what is offered, and that they accordingly cancel the transaction and return the titles.

Following upon that letter there is no offer to reopen the matter, and in these circumstances I must say I think the second plea in law for the defenders is made out. It is quite plain that, rightly or wrongly, the seller's agents decided that they could do no more, and informed the defenders that more was not to be looked for. Issue having been joined by the parties, and the seller's agents having said they were not prepared to do more, the question of whether time was of the essence of the contract or not goes by the board. The question really is, was the position of the seller's agents sound and defensible or not? They thought it was, and accordingly brought this action. They make no suggestion when they come into Court that they will reconsider their position; they wish it declared to have been a proper one. The defenders say that they cancelled the contract, and adhere to that position.

Now Mr Johnston, with deliberation, admitted that he could not ask us to hold that the position taken up by the seller's agents was sound, and virtually conceded that the defenders were right in what they required regarding the title. He only argued that if we thought the production post litem motam of the decree of declarator of payment and extinction sufficient to dislodge the defenders from their position of holding the contract to have been broken we should declare the bargain to be binding on the defenders. But I am of opinion that the defenders were entitled to hold the pursuer's letter of 9th May as an ultimatum, and that they were entitled to intimate, as they did, that the contract having been broken by the pursuer was no longer binding on them.

I think we should recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and assoilzie the defenders.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion.

The pursuer and defenders entered into a contract for the purchase of a certain ground-annual. When the titles came to be examined an objection appeared on the face of them. It was not incurable, but still it was an objection. Now, parties being willing to complete such a contract may come into Court to have it decided whether the title offered by the seller is a good one or not, with the view of having something further done should it be found insufficient, but that is not the position of parties here. The pursuer, when the objection was pointed out to him, did not come forward and say, "I propose to do so-and-so, but if the Court find that is not sufficient I will do what may be found necessary." The pursuer's position was quite different. He was not in a position to rectify the title, because the heir was amissing. He said what he was prepared to do, and that that was the only thing he would do, and then matters came to an issue. The purchasers pointed out the mistake and what would satisfy them, but they said that, failing this being done, they would cancel the bargain. This was on 3d May. The seller's agents replied, on 9th May, that they would not do what was asked, and that the only thing they would do was to give a letter from the agent of Mr Henry's representatives, but that beyond that they could not go.

Grant.

The parties accordingly came to an issue upon whether the position taken up by the seller was or was not defensible, and upon nothing else. The correspondence shews that the seller had stated an ultimatum, and I think the purchaser was right in refusing that final offer, and was entitled to resile from the bargain.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think that there is no question in this case as to whether time was of the essence of the contract or not, or whether the pursuer had lost his bargain by delay in performance of his part of the contract. That is not the true nature of the question between the parties.

When a contract of purchase and sale is to be carried into effect, if the purchaser objects to the title as defective, and it turns out that although defective it may be made good at some expense of time and money, then it may be that any delay in performing the contract which may be caused by the controversy will not dissolve the contract or deprive the seller of his bargain.

But that is not the nature of the objection. The objection, although it has since turned out to be curable, was not known to the seller to be curable when the time for performance of the contract arrived, and therefore he raised no question as to the expense of making good the title. He intimated to the purchaser, in perfectly plain and peremptory language, that he proposed to enforce the contract although the title was defective; he intimated that the only thing he would do towards clearing it would be to give the purchaser a letter in certain terms. There can be no question that the title so offered was insufficient. But, at the same time, it is clear that the position of the seller's agents was not adopted from an unreasonable or erroneous view of their client's obligation, but simply because they could not do more. They did not then know of the existence of the representative of Mr Henry, and accordingly declined to bring an action against him. But then it was candidly admitted by Mr Johnston that he could not maintain that the offer in the seller's letter of 9th May was an offer which the buyer was bound to accept. That being so, there was plain intimation by the seller that he was not ready or able to perform the contract. By his own writing he put himself in breach of his contract, and gave the seller a right to say, "If that is all you will do I cannot accept your terms, and the contract is off." I am of opinion that the bargain was at an end, and that it is too late to set up an answer to the purchaser's objection that the seller has now discovered that the defect may be remedied. No. 53.

Process—Proof or jury trial—Reparation—"Special cause"—Evidence Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 4.—In an action of damages, held that the probability that only a trifling award of damages would be recovered was not a "special cause" which entitled the Court to refuse to send the case to a jury.

Reparation—Agent and principal—Taking decree in absence for debt paid after action raised—Malice—Want of probable cause—Issue.—In an action for damages brought by B against X, a debt collector, the pursuer averred that the defender had been employed by A to recover a claim against the pursuer, and that the defender had raised an action in A's name in the Debts Recovery Court against him; that two hours before the diet of appearance X had received notice from A that the debt and expenses had been paid, and instructions to stop proceedings, but that notwithstanding he had maliciously caused decree in absence to be taken against B. Form of issue adjusted, in which "malice," but not "want of probable cause," was inserted.

THIS was an action of damages at the instance of John G. Rhind, 1st Division, grocer in Glasgow, against John Kemp & Company, debt collectors there, Ld Stormonth-Darling, concluding for payment of £500.

The pursuer stated, inter alia, that in May 1893 Meglaughlin, Marshall, & Company had employed the defenders as agents to recover from him a claim of £14, 1s.; that as there was a dispute about the amount, he had called on the defenders, and made an offer to settle; that on account of "illegal, improper, and malicious conduct" on the defenders' part, no settlement was effected; and that therefore the defenders had caused a debts recovery summons and expenses to be served upon the pursuer.

He further stated that on the morning of Monday, 22d May, on which day the summons was due to be called at twelve o'clock, he paid £8, 8s. 6d. in full settlement of the debt, at the instance of Meglaughlin, Marshall, & Company, to Mr Meglaughlin, who granted him a discharge, and "in his presence wrote a letter to the defenders telling them to stop proceedings at once against the pursuer, as the firm's claim against him had been settled. Mr Meglaughlin, considering that the matter was of great urgency and importance to the pursuer, sent a special messenger with said letter to the defenders. Said letter was delivered at defenders' place of business and received by them at five minutes before ten o'clock, more than two hours before the diet of appearance in the action above referred to. . . . It was the duty of the defenders to have stopped said legal proceedings and to withdraw said action forthwith. But contrary to the instructions of their clients, the defenders illegally, wrongfully, and maliciously caused decree in absence to be taken against the pursuer for said sum of £14, 1s. and expenses. This decree was taken by the defenders most wrongously and oppressively, in the knowledge that the case had been settled and ought to have been withdrawn, and in the face of the explicit written instructions timeously received by them from Messrs Meglaughlin & Company to stop said proceedings at once. This the defenders did in order to gratify their feelings of ill-will towards the pursuer, and for the purpose of ruining his business as a merchant in Glasgow."

The pursuer made further averments, to the effect that the defenders' conduct in acting as they did was malicious.

The defenders in answer denied that they had in any way been actuated by malice towards the pursuer, and explained that they had on the instructions of their clients on the 25th April transferred the case to a solicitor. They admitted receiving the letter of 22d May stating that the debt had been settled, but averred that immediately on receiving it they had written to the solicitor acting for them to do nothing further. They denied that the pursuer had suffered any damage.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having suffered loss, injury, and damage through the illegal, wrongful, and malicious conduct of the defenders in the circumstances condescended on, they are liable in reparation.

The pursuer was appointed to lodge issues. On 23d November 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) dispensed with the adjustment of issues, and allowed the parties a proof of their averments.*

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The action was one for damages, and therefore must be sent for trial by a jury unless of consent, or on special cause shewn.† Even if the amount concluded for were trivial, that was not a "special cause" in the sense of the Evidence Act.¹ Here, however, the conclusion was for £500 of damages in respect of a malicious wrong, and the assumption by the Lord Ordinary that the actual award would be trifling was premature and unwarranted. The rubric in the case of *Nicol v. Picken*² was not borne out by the report.³

Argued for the respondents;—The Lord Ordinary was justified in assuming that the award of damages, if any, would be very small, and that being so he was entitled in his discretion to allow a proof rather than send the case to a jury.² The Court was always averse to interfering

* "OPINION.—This is an action of damages, and would naturally fall to be tried by a jury, but I think the defender has succeeded in shewing cause for its being tried by way of proof. The principal wrong complained of is the failure of a firm of debt collectors to stop an action in the Debts Recovery Court after a settlement had been effected with the client who instructed them.

"This is a kind of wrong which has been held to be actionable as against a principal only when malice is alleged, and I do not see why a different rule should be applied to an agent—(Davies & Company, 5 Macph. 842). In that case great stress was laid on the fact that the party complaining of the wrong did not take the trouble to go to Court and see that the action was dismissed.

"Now, that was the case here; and therefore, although the pursuer may have a right to recover damages if he can shew that the defender acted maliciously, it is plain that the damages cannot be heavy. I think it would be an abuse of the forms of Court to invoke the aid of a jury for determining so trivial a matter. . . ."

† The Evidence (Scotland) Act, 1866 (29 and 30 Vict. cap. 112), sec. 4,— "If both parties consent thereto, or if special cause be shewn, it shall be competent to the Lord Ordinary to take proof . . ." notwithstanding the provisions of the Judicature Act, 1825 (6 Geo. interlocutor therefore should be allowed to stand.

Rhind v.
Kemp & Co.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I do not agree with the Lord Ordinary in the conclusion he has come to. I should certainly be very slow to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Ordinary if the question were as to any peculiarity which in his opinion rendered this particular action unsuitable for the ordinary course being followed, namely, of sending the case for trial by a jury.

But his Lordship has proceeded on this ground : He says that it is plain that the damages recovered cannot be heavy, and that he thinks "it would be an abuse of the forms of Court to invoke the aid of a jury for determining so trivial a matter."

Now, that is a ground of judgment of very wide and general application, and I cannot agree with it. The existing statute law is that (unless of consent of parties) actions of damages must go to a jury unless special cause be shewn to the contrary. Here we have an action for malicious wrong concluding for £500 of damages, and the mere fact that one can conjecture that there will not be a large award is not in my opinion a "special cause" which satisfies the statutory requirement. If any vindication of the course prescribed by the statute law is needed, it may be found in this,—that it affords a more rapid mode of finally settling such matters, be they trivial or weighty.

LORD ADAM.—I am of the same opinion. This being an action of damages it goes in ordinary course and of right to a jury, unless the party objecting can shew special cause why it should not go, and if the Lord Ordinary, in the exercise of his discretion, thought that in an action of this kind a special cause had been shewn, I should be very slow to interfere with his judgment. But here he has not found a special cause in the peculiarity of this particular case, but on general grounds, because he considers that the amount of damages which would be recovered would, if any, be small, and therefore he thinks (holding that a proof is a less expensive mode of trial) that the case is not fitted for jury trial. But that goes against the statute law of the matter, for the statute says that (subject to special exceptions) every action for damages must go to a jury, except where the parties consent or special cause is shewn ; and the Legislature thus saying that every action of damages must go to jury trial, we cannot hold that merely because we think the amount of damages that will be recovered will be small in any particular case, then that case is not to go to trial by jury. There is no room, in my opinion, for the exercise of any discretion in such a state of circumstances.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. If actions which the Lord Ordinary may think would result in only a small amount of damages being recovered are excluded from the operation of the statute, I suppose that those actions which from the first conclude for only a small amount of damages would also be excluded from going to jury trial. But that would be going in the face of the statute, for the statute says that all actions of damages, except on special cause shewn, are to be tried by a jury.

LORD M'LAREN was absent.

On the Issue.—The pursuer argued ;—Neither malice nor want of pro-

No. 54. bable cause should be inserted. The case of *Davies*¹ did not apply. There the defender was a person who had taken a decree for a debt due to himself. Here the defenders who had caused the decree to be taken were not the creditors, and they were not legal practitioners acting for the creditors in the Court. No privilege whatever therefore attached to their position. They were simply persons who were bound to obey the instructions of their employers, and they had failed to do so.

Dec. 13, 1893.
Rhind v.
Kemp & Co.

The defenders argued;—The same considerations arose here as in the case of Davies,² and both malice and want of probable cause should be inserted. The defenders here maintained that they had a probable cause for taking the decree, because they had not received timeous notice that the debt had been paid.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and appointed the cause to be tried on an issue in the following terms:—"Whether on or about the 22d day of May 1893 the defenders wrongfully and maliciously caused a decree in absence at the instance of Messrs Meglaughlin, Marshall, & Company, provision merchants, No. 46 North Albion Street, Glasgow, for the sum of £14, 1s. sterling, and expenses, to be taken against the pursuer in the Debts Recovery Court at Glasgow, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer? Damages laid at £500."

Church—Churchyard—Heritors—Compromise—Ultra vires.—Held that it is within the powers of the heritors of a parish to compromise questions regarding the extent of the churchyard, arising with a contemninous proprietor, subject to the control of the Court at the instance of anyone having a legitimate interest.

2D DIVISION.
Dean of Guild Court, Dunfermline.

In June 1892 Alexander Fraser, merchant, Dunfermline, presented a petition in the Dean of Guild Court there for warrant to erect a building upon property belonging to him within the burgh. This property was described in the petitioner's titles, inter alia, as bounded by "the churchyard upon the south," and the plans produced with the petition shewed that the petitioner proposed to raise the height of a wall which separated the churchyard from his property so as to convert it into the back wall of the proposed tenement. He averred that this wall was his exclusive property, as having been built wholly on his ground.

The heritors of the parish lodged answers, in which they averred that "said wall is the enclosing wall of the churchyard and belongs wholly to the heritors, or at least is mutual to them and the petitioner. The heritors and those holding of them have used the said wall from time immemorial for the purposes of inserting or building tombstones therein, and at the present time there are four tombstones inserted or built into said wall. . . . The petitioner's plans shew that he proposes taking down the said enclosing wall and rebuilding and carrying it up as the back wall of a large warehouse. In particular, the said plans shew that the petitioner proposes inserting windows in said wall below the level of the tombstones presently inserted therein. Such operations and uses would form an encroachment on the heritors' sole or mutual right of property, and be inconsistent with the purposes to which said wall has been and is dedicated." No. 55.

Fraser v.
Turner.

On 10th July Daniel Turner, solicitor-at-law, Edinburgh, was sisted as a party to the process, and was allowed to lodge answers. He averred that "the ground to the north of the Abbey Churchyard of the parish of Dunfermline, with its enclosing walls, has been dedicated as a place of sepulture, and for the insertion and erection of tombstones or memorial stones, recording the tenancy for many generations. It has also been properly designated . . . and is still in use." Further, that he was in right of a burial-place in the churchyard, conform to a minute of the kirk-session, dated 11th April 1838, in which the burial-place was described as bounded "on the north by the north wall of the churchyard" (being the wall in question); that his grandfather, to whom the right of burial was originally granted, and other relatives were buried there; that a tombstone for this burial-place had been inserted in the wall; that he proposed either to enlarge this tombstone or to insert another; and that the proposed operations of the petitioner would frustrate this object.

The petitioner pleaded, inter alia;—1. As the proposed alterations are lawful, and will be beneficial to the petitioner's property, and as they can be carried through with perfect safety, the petitioner is entitled to warrant as craved. 3. The said Daniel Turner not having any locus standi in reference to the matters referred to in the petition, he is not entitled to be heard in opposition to the prayer of the petition. 4. The said wall being the exclusive property of the petitioner, and the memorial tablet or tombstone inserted in said wall not being to be interfered with, the prayer of the petition ought to be granted.

The heritors pleaded, inter alia;—2. The said back wall being the sole property of the heritors, or at anyrate they having a joint or mutual right thereto, the petitioner is not entitled to interfere therewith.

Turner pleaded, inter alia;—3. The prayer of the petition quoad the said wall is inept, and ought not to be granted, in respect (1) of the dedication and designation aforesaid, followed by undisturbed possession for forty years and upwards; (2) of the wall not being the exclusive property of the petitioner; (3) of the terms of the petition and plans; and (4) the proposed operations of the petitioner in the churchyard and on the wall thereof are unlawful, ultra vires, and contrary to good morals and common decency. 4. Esto that the wall in question of which the tombstone forms a part is the property of the heritors, or a mutual or party wall, the petitioner has no title to interfere therewith as prayed without the consent of the heritors and respondent.

On 14th August 1893 the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the pleadings of parties raise a question of competition of heritable rights to the wall in dispute, which it is not competent for this Court to decide, and therefore sists process, leaving it to the petitioner, if so advised, to have the question as to the extent of his right to the said wall settled by a competent Court."

On 4th September the petitioner and the heritors lodged a joint minute, in which they concurred in stating that they had "agreed without prejudice to their rights and pleas, and in order to obviate further litigation, to settle the action on the following footing, namely:—That the respondents the heritors agree to give their consent to petitioner's proposed operations, conform to the new plan, No. 52 of process, and relative letter by Mr Houston, architect, No. 54 of process; * that petitioner will place the existing copestone on the top of the wall when it is lowered to the height at which it stood before it was raised by petitioner's predecessors; that the petitioner's windows shall not come below the copestone when so lowered and placed, which copestone shall form the sole of the windows to be put in the back wall of petitioner's property; that the petitioner shall relieve the heritors, respondents, of all claims for damages or expenses which may be made good against them by decree at the instance of Mr Daniel Turner, solicitor-at-law, Edinburgh, or other parties claiming to have rights in said wall." They then concurred in craving the Court to recall the sist, and to grant warrant in terms of the prayer of the petition, as varied by and under the conditions expressed in the minute.

On the same day the Dean of Guild pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the sist pronounced on 14th August last: Allows the joint minute for the petitioner and the respondents the heritors of the parish of Dunfermline to be received; and having considered the said joint minute and relative amended plan of petitioner's south wall, and heard the respondent Daniel Turner, and the agents for the petitioner and heritors, finds that by the amended plan, No. 52 of process, as varied by the joint minute, the petitioner's operations will be carried out without any interference with the memorial tombstones or tablets in the wall in dispute, including that belonging to the respondent Daniel Turner, and without prejudicially affecting any rights which the said Daniel Turner may have in the said wall; therefore grants warrant for the erection of the south wall of the petitioner's tenement in terms of the said amended plan, as varied by and under the conditions expressed in said joint minute."

Turner appealed, and argued;—There could be no doubt that the wall was the property of the heritors in trust for the church. It was the duty of the heritors of a parish to see to the erection and repair of the walls of the churchyard, and it was not to be supposed that the petitioner's predecessor would have allowed this wall to be erected on his property. At the least the wall was mutual to the heritors and the petitioner. On either view, this joint minute was a breach of trust on the part of the heritors, whose duty it was to vindicate the right to property which prima facie belonged to the church. The respondent, as the proprietor of a burial-place in the churchyard, had a title to prevent encroachment on his ground.¹

Argued for the petitioner;—The appellant had no title to appear in this application. If he suffered any injury in consequence of the proposed alteration in the wall his remedy was against the heritors,

* This letter was in these terms,—“Mr Fraser having reconsidered the rebuilding of south boundary wall of his proposed buildings, Maygate Street, I have made the modifications shewn on the accompanying plan for the approval of the heritors and Dean of Guild Court. The portion of wall above tablets to be taken down, and the new building to start at this level; and build conform to said plan. . . .”

Fraser v.
Turner.

LORD YOUNG.—The property of the solum of the churchyard is vested in the heritors, but as trustees with a duty to use it, and see that it is used, only as a churchyard, and in the performance of that duty they may be controlled by this Court at the instance of anyone having a legitimate interest. Should a question arise as to the limits of this solum,—as, for instance, whether it includes the site of a surrounding wall, or of the wall bounding it on any side or at any part, or whether it is altogether within the wall,—the proper parties to try the question are, on the one hand, the heritors as the proprietors of the solum of the churchyard, and on the other, the proprietors of the solum immediately adjoining at the place in dispute.

Here such a question occurred regarding the site of the wall on the north side of the churchyard of Dunfermline, where the respondent was and is proprietor of the solum immediately adjoining that of the churchyard—the respondent maintaining that the wall at that part was on his solum, and the heritors that it was on theirs—i.e., part of the churchyard. The question occurred in the Dean of Guild Court, and the Dean of Guild properly, I think, thought that this, being a question of heritable right, was not within his competency, and therefore sisted process that the respondent might take steps to have it settled by a competent Court.

In these circumstances it was, I think, very proper that the heritors should consider whether it was fitting and required of them, in the discharge of their public duty as the trustees and guardians of all legitimate interests in the churchyard, that they should engage in such a litigation with the respondent, or whether it would be more prudent to come to terms with him regarding his contemplated operations. They did so consider the matter, I assume with a becoming desire to do their duty as the guardians of all legitimate interests in the churchyard, which they certainly are, and with the result that they saw fit to arrange the matter with the respondent in the manner expressed in the joint minute of 4th September 1893.

No one interested in the churchyard, no one in the parish, questions or complains of this proceeding on the part of the heritors except the appellant, a fact which is prima facie adverse to the notion that the heritors have thereby violated or neglected their trust duty as guardians of the public interest in the matter, so as to call for or warrant the interference of this Court under the controlling power which I have referred to. Another fact of similar tendency was mentioned to us, viz., that other and immediately adjoining parts of the same north wall have been used in the same way by the conterminous proprietors.

But the appellant contends that under his burying-ground right he is entitled to stop the operations as assented to by the heritors until the question of heritable right which I have referred to, and which the Dean of Guild has held himself incompetent to try, is tried in the competent Court in an action with him, or (which seems the only other alternative view on which we could hinder the Dean of Guild from acting on the arrangement with the heritors) that we should hold that it is the public duty of the heritors to litigate this question of

No. 55. heritable right, and that they violated this duty by becoming parties to the joint minute.

Dec. 13, 1893.
Fraser v.
Turner.

I am unable to assent to either of these views. I think it was within the power of the heritors to make the arrangement expressed in the joint minute, and that they did not thereby violate or neglect, but legitimately, and, so far as I can judge, reasonably and judiciously performed their duty as the proprietors of this churchyard in trust and as guardians of the public interest therein.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD TRAYNER concurred.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT refused the appeal.

Fishing—Salmon-fishing ex adverso of adjacent lands—Title to sue—Possession—Prescription.—Estates belonging to A and B lying on the south side of a river marched with one another inland, but at the river side were separated by a glebe, which extended along the river for about 350 yards. No right of fishing in the river belonged to the glebe. The titles of A and B included a right to the salmon-fishings "belonging to" their respective lands, but contained no express grant to the fishing ex adverso of the glebe.

A raised an action against B to have it declared that he had an exclusive right to the fishing ex adverso of the glebe for a distance of 130 yards from his march at the river bank. The Crown was not made a party to the action. After a proof, in which A failed to prove that the glebe had been designated from his estate, or to prove prescriptive possession of the fishings ex adverso of the 130 yards, held that even assuming the defender to have no right to the salmon-fishings claimed, as the pursuer had failed to produce an express grant to the fishings, or to shew by exclusive possession for the prescriptive period that his general title to salmon-fishings included them, the defender was entitled to absolvitor.

Opinion that a right of salmon-fishing was an estate in land in the sense of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and that possession of salmon-fishings for twenty years was prescriptive possession.

1ST DIVISION.
Ld. Wellwood.

THE estates of Ardoe and Banchory, in Kincardineshire, were bounded on the north by the River Dee, except for a space of 350 yards between them where the glebe of Banchory-Devenick included the river bank.

In 1892 Alexander M. Ogston, of Ardoe, the riparian proprietor to the west of the glebe, raised an action against David Stewart and another, trustees of the late John Stewart, of Banchory, the riparian proprietors to the east of the glebe, concluding for declarator, inter alia, that "the pursuer has the sole exclusive right to the salmon-fishings in the River Dee . . . ex adverso of that portion of the glebe lands of the parish of Banchory-Devenick extending eastwards from the point where the said glebe lands meet the lands of Ardoe on the river bank to a point" [about 130 yards east of the pursuer's march] "ex adverso of the office-houses of the manse of Banchory-Devenick, or the drain proceeding from the said office-houses to the river, which drain forms the eastmost boundary of the said fishings"; that the defenders had no right of salmon-fishing in the River Dee ex adverso of the glebe lands for the distance claimed by the pursuer; and for interdict against the defenders so fishing.

Ogston v.
Stewart's
Trustees.

It appeared that the lands of Ardoe marched inland with the lands of Banchory or Banchory-Devenick, which bounded them on the east.

Ardoe was purchased by the pursuer's father in 1840. In the disposition then obtained by him, and in the instrument of sasine following thereon, and also in a charter of confirmation obtained by him from the Crown in 1853, the subjects conveyed were described as follows:—"All and Whole the town and lands of Ardoe or Ardoch, both sunny and shadowy halves thereof, . . . together with the salmon-fishings on the Water of Dee, belonging to said lands . . ."

The lands of Banchory consisted of Banchory-Devenick, and the Kirkton of Banchory, the latter estate having been acquired by the proprietor of Banchory-Devenick in 1618. In none of the titles of Kirkton as a separate subject was there any mention of salmon-fishings. Before 1645 the whole lands of Banchory had been formed into a barony, and in 1650 John Forbes, the proprietor, obtained a crown charter to the lands of Banchory, and the salmon-fishings of the same on the Water of Dee. In the later titles the description of the salmon-fishings was in similar terms, and the title of the defenders described the subjects as the lands of Banchory, "together also with the whole salmon-fishings upon the Water of Dee belonging to the said lands."

No right of salmon-fishing belonged to the glebe. The defenders averred that the glebe itself originally formed part of the lands of Kirkton of Banchory. The pursuer denied this.

The pursuer averred;—"The pursuer and his predecessors and authors have, in virtue of said titles to the estate of Ardoe, exercised peaceably and without interruption the sole and exclusive right of fishing for salmon in the River Dee ex adverso of the lands of Ardoe, and also ex adverso of the said glebe lands from the point where the lands of Ardoe meet the glebe lands on the river bank eastwards to a point opposite the manse offices, or a drain running from the offices to the river, from time immemorial, or at least for upwards of forty years. They have always understood that the said office-houses or drain formed the eastmost boundary of their fishings, and that has been the understanding in the neighbourhood. Owing to the nature of the bank, it is impossible to fish the south side of the River Dee ex adverso of the glebe with net and coble, but the proprietors of Ardoe have always exercised the right by fishing with rod and line and other lawful and possible modes. The defenders never had or exercised any right of salmon-fishing ex adverso of said lands."

The defenders answered;—"Admitted that owing to the nature of the bank it is impossible to fish the south side of the River Dee ex adverso of the glebe with net and coble. Quoad ultra denied. Explained that until about four years ago neither the pursuer nor any of his predecessors ever asserted any right to the salmon-fishing now in question, nor did they nor any of them, up to the said date, exercise any acts of possession of the said salmon-fishing. On the contrary, it is explained and averred that so far as the said salmon-fishing was capable of being possessed it has been possessed for time immemorial, or at least for more than forty years, by the defenders and their predecessors, by fishing with rod and line, and all other lawful and possible modes."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having, in virtue of his title and possession following thereon, the exclusive right of salmon-fishing in the portion of the River Dee referred to, and the defenders having no right or title to fish for salmon in the same, decree of declarator and interdict should be pronounced as craved, in terms of the leading conclusions of the summons, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The defenders having the exclusive right of salmon-fishing in the portion of the River Dee in question in this case, they are entitled to absolvitor.

On 18th November 1892 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) allowed a proof. The import of the evidence sufficiently appears from the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and Lord Adam.

On 8th February 1893 the Lord Ordinary found, declared, and interdicted in terms of the conclusions of the summons above given.*

* "OPINION.—The peculiarity of this case is that the salmon-fishings in the River Dee, which are the subject of dispute, are not ex adverso of the lands of either of the parties. The pursuer's lands of Ardoe and the defenders' lands of Banchory march inland, but at the river there is interjected between them the glebe of Banchory-Devenick, which extends along the river for about 300 or 350 yards. It is common ground that the fishings do not belong to the glebe, and it is admitted that both the pursuer and the defenders have in their titles a grant of salmon-fishing. It therefore appears that the fishings ex adverso of the glebe belong either to Ardoe or Banchory, or partly to both properties. The pursuer admits that the defenders have an exclusive right to the salmon-fishings to a point on the river opposite the offices of the manse of Banchory-Devenick, but he claims the exclusive right to the fishings to the west of that point.

"If it could have been shewn that the glebe was taken from the lands of Banchory that, if not conclusive in the defenders' favour, would have gone far to support his contention. But I agree with the pursuer's counsel that the evidence on this point is entirely inconclusive, and that no aid is to be derived from it. The pursuer's counsel passed by the point with that observation, and although the defenders' counsel did not give up the point, I was not favoured with any detailed argument. It appears that the lands of Kirkton of Banchory were originally bishop's lands, but the property of the lands was parted with at a very early date, and after the thirteenth century only the superiority remained with the church. On the other hand, the lands of Ardoe were also church lands, having originally belonged to the monastery of Arbroath, and the property as distinguished from the superiority was not parted with until long after the lands of Kirkton Banchory were in the hands of a layman. So long as the lands of Kirkton appear alone in the titles they have no grant of salmon-fishings attached to them. And it is not until 1744 when they are included in the same crown charter with the lands of Banchory that there is mention of 'the fishings belonging to the whole of said lands.' Lastly, there is positively no evidence to shew out of what lands the glebe was designed. . . .

"The evidence for which one would naturally look in such a case is evidence of possession. But unfortunately the evidence of possession by rod-fishing is unsatisfactory and inconclusive, and it is admitted for the pursuer that upon that evidence alone he cannot succeed. It is not surprising that the evidence upon this point should not be more decisive. At best the fishing in dispute is, even now, of comparatively little value. The river at that point cannot be fished with net and coble, and even for the purposes of rod-fishing it cannot be of much value, because at the upper part there is back water, and lower down it is difficult to fish. Add to this, that until recently rod-fishing was of little value in the market, and therefore proprietors of salmon-fishings were not so particular in preventing rod-fishing in those parts of a river where it would not interfere materially with the net-fishing, and they were more liberal in giving leave to fish when that was asked by friends or neighbours, or even by strangers.

"No aid is to be obtained from the older titles of the parties, because they each have a right of salmon-fishings described in general terms as belonging to their respective lands.

"In the absence of aid from the titles and satisfactory evidence of possession,

The defenders reclaimed. At the hearing in the Inner-House they were allowed to amend their record by adding the following plea:—
(1) The defenders are entitled to absolvitor in respect the pursuer has no title or right to the salmon-fishings in question.

No. 56.

Ogston v.
Stewart's
Trustees.

Argued for the defenders;—The Lord Ordinary had assumed that, because ex concessis the fishings in dispute did not belong to the glebe, they must belong to either Ardoe or Banchory, and treating the question as one of boundary had decided in favour of the pursuer. But there was no warrant for such an assumption. The legal presumption was that salmon-fishings remained in the Crown, unless a subject could produce an express grant of them. Now, the pursuer had produced only a grant in general terms, and had endeavoured to explain the grant, which, prima facie, referred only to fishings ex adverso of Ardoe, to include the fishings ex adverso of the glebe. But he had failed to shew that any part of the glebe had been once a part of Ardoe, or to establish exclusive possession of the fishings in question for the prescriptive period. He had therefore no title to the fishings. It was not necessary for the defenders to shew that they had a title to these fishings.¹

beyond doubt the most important evidence in the case is to be found in the terms of the leases of salmon-fishings granted by the respective proprietors of Ardoe and Banchory. The terms of the leases of the Banchory fishings are of themselves almost conclusive against the defenders' contention, because they shew that not merely from 1851, but for long before, the western boundary of the Banchory fishings as defined in the leases was the manse offices, which is the boundary claimed by the pursuer as the eastern boundary of the Ardoe fishings.

"No 70 of process is an admittedly correct copy of the conditions on which the witness Robert Clark took the Banchory fishings in 1851. They are headed 'Conditions on which Banchory salmon-fishings are to be let.' . . . The limits of the fishings are thus described:—'The fishing to be let as formerly possessed by Hector. The eastern boundary is 200 yards or thereby below the burn of Hildontree, marked by a stone. The western boundary is at the manse offices.' It will be seen that the limits there described are said to have been those observed by the previous tenant, Hector; and that carries the evidence back far beyond the years of prescription. . . .

"The leases of the Ardoe fishings are not so conclusive, because I do not find a description by boundaries in the earlier leases; but, supplemented by parole evidence, they complete the pursuer's proof; and, taken in connection with the Banchory leases, present, it seems to me, an irresistible body of evidence that the drain is the true boundary. . . .

"There is a good deal of conflicting parole evidence as to this or that place having been pointed out as the boundary of the fishings. I think on the whole that the evidence on that subject given for the pursuer is more reliable, because the witnesses who speak to the drain having been pointed out as the boundary applied for and received information in most cases from the persons who had the most accurate information, viz., the lessees of the respective fishings, or Dr Paul, the venerable minister of Banchory-Devenick. There is some of the evidence, however, which cannot easily be explained on the ground of mistaken recollection on the one side or the other. . . .

"As I have said, the evidence of rod-fishing is inconclusive. There is evidence on both sides, but its value is much diminished by considerations which I have already indicated, and it is still further confused by the fact that many of the persons who, from time to time, fished that piece of water had permission to do so both from Banchory and Ardoe.

"On the whole matter, I think that the pursuer is entitled to declarator and interdict, in terms of the first alternative conclusions of the summons."

Ogston v.
Stewart's
Trustees.

The pursuer argued;—While, owing to the antiquity of the event, there might be no clear proof of the actual designation of the glebe, there was a strong presumption that it had been taken partly out of Ardoe and partly out of Banchory, both these estates having been church lands, and there being no evidence of the existence at any time of a third estate intervening which had a right to salmon-fishings. It came, therefore, to be a question of boundary or extent of fishing belonging to each estate. Now, on the evidence it was established that the proprietors of both Banchory and Ardoe had invariably recognised the manse drain as the march, and that this was the march also recognised by the people in the neighbourhood. The proprietor of Banchory had consistently during the prescriptive period leased his fishings up to but not beyond the drain. The evidence throughout contradicted the suggestion that there intervened between the fishings of Banchory and Ardoe a piece of water claimed by no man. It might be that Ardoe had not fished with net and coble, but that was simply because such a mode of fishing was there impracticable. In the circumstances fishing with rod was sufficient.¹ Besides, a grant of fishing in general terms might be explained to comprehend the right of fishing ex adverso of adjacent lands.² The evidence clearly established that the pursuer had for the prescriptive period fished the waters in question in the only practicable way, to the exclusion of other persons, and he had therefore a title to sue.

At advising,—

LORD ADAM.—The pursuer is proprietor of the lands of Ardoe, situated on the south bank of the River Dee. Immediately adjoining the lands of Ardoe on the east is the glebe of the parish of Banchory-Devenick, and adjoining this glebe are the defender's lands of Banchory. All these subjects are bounded by the River Dee on the north, the glebe lands lying between the lands of the pursuer and defenders.

The object of the action is to have it declared that the pursuer has sole and exclusive right to the salmon-fishings in the River Dee ex adverso of the lands of Ardoe, and also ex adverso of that portion of the glebe lands extending eastwards from the point where the said glebe lands meet the lands of Ardoe on the river bank, to a point ex adverso of the office-houses of the manse of Banchory-Devenick, or the drain proceeding from the said office-houses to the river; and to have the defenders interdicted from fishing for salmon in any part of the river ex adverso as aforesaid.

There is no question as to the pursuer's right of fishing ex adverso of the lands of Ardoe. The sole controversy is as to the right of fishing ex adverso of the portion of the glebe lands above specified.

The Lord Ordinary has decided the case in favour of the pursuer. After describing the situation of the subjects, he says,—“It is common ground that the fishings do not belong to the glebe, and it is admitted that both the pursuer and the defenders have, in their titles, a grant of salmon-fishings. It therefore appears that the fishings ex adverso of the glebe belong either to Ardoe or Banchory, or partly to both properties.” It is on that assumption that the Lord Ordinary has decided the case. But it does not follow that the fishings in question, because they are not claimed as belonging to the glebe, necessarily belong either to the pursuer or defenders. I think that as the fishings in question are not ex adverso of the lands either of the pursuer or defenders, the legal presumption is that they belong to the Crown, and that in order to displace that presumption the pursuers or defenders, as the case may be, must establish a right to them, either by shewing an express grant, or by proof of possession following upon and explaining a general grant of salmon-fishings. That this is the ordinary rule of law cannot, I think, be disputed; but it is maintained that there are specialities in this case arising from the fact that the fishings are ex adverso of the glebe, and from the circumstances attending its designation, which are sufficient to displace that presumption.

Trustees.

It is said by the pursuer that the glebe was designated partly out of the lands of Ardoe and partly out of the lands of Banchory, but that the right of salmon-fishing ex adverso of the lands designated did not pass to the proprietors of the glebe, but remained with the proprietors of these lands, and hence it is, he maintains, that the pursuer and defenders are now in right of the fishings. On the other hand, it is maintained by the defenders that the glebe was designated solely out of the lands of Kirkton of Banchory, which are now part of the lands of Banchory, and that the fishings remained with the proprietors of these lands.

As it appears that the glebe was designated about the year 1602, and as it further appears that the right of salmon-fishing was attached to the lands of Ardoe prior to that date—if it had been shewn that part of the glebe had been designated out of these lands, that might have been sufficient to overcome the presumption in favour of the Crown as regards these lands. But there is no evidence that any part of the glebe was designated out of Ardoe.

As regards the lands of Kirkton of Banchory, it appears, from the titles, that these lands were originally held as a separate subject from the lands of Banchory-Devenick, and belonging to different proprietors. In 1618, the proprietor of Banchory-Devenick purchased Kirkton of Banchory, and these lands have since belonged to the same proprietor.

In the titles of Kirkton of Banchory, however, there is no mention of salmon-fishings so long as it remained a separate subject. In November 1743, James Gordon of Banchory disposed to Alexander Thomson the whole lands of Banchory, including the Kirkton, with "the whole salmon-fishing in the Water of Dee belonging to the said whole lands," and that was followed by a crown charter of resignation in Thomson's favour, dated 8th May 1774, in similar terms. This is the first time a grant of salmon-fishings appears in the titles in connection with Kirkton of Banchory. It appears to me, therefore, that at and prior to the date of the designation of the glebe the salmon-fishings of Kirkton of Banchory presumably belonged to the Crown, and if it be that the glebe was designated out of these lands there is nothing to displace the presumption that these fishings now belong to the Crown. But, as has been pointed out by the Lord Ordinary, there is no evidence to shew out of what lands the glebe was designated, whether wholly out of Kirkton of Banchory, or partly out of these lands and partly out of Ardoe.

In these circumstances, it appears to me that the pursuer must, in order to succeed in this action, shew a title to the fishings either by express grant or by a general grant followed by possession.

This view of the case, however, does not appear to have been presented to the Lord Ordinary, and has not been considered by him, but the defenders were allowed, in the Inner-House, to add a plea to the effect that the

No. 56. pursuer had no right or title to the fishings, and that plea must be first disposed of.
Dec. 13, 1898.
Ogston v. Stewart's Trustees.

The grant of salmon-fishings on which the pursuer founds is expressed in his titles in the following terms :—" All and Whole the town and lands of Ardoe or Ardoch, both sunny and shadowy halves thereof, with the mill of Ardoe or Ardoch, mill lands, astricted multures, sucken, sequels, and knaveships of the same, together with the salmon-fishings on the Water of Dee belonging to the said lands."

The pursuer has, it thus appears, no express grant of these fishings, and the question therefore is whether he has proved exclusive possession of them for the time requisite to give him a right to them.

I may premise that although there have been some changes in the extent of the glebe since it was designated, none of these affect the present question. Thus in the year 1797 the march between the lands of Ardoe and the glebe was straightened, but there is nothing to shew that any alteration was made where these lands met at the river.

It also appears that, when the turnpike road was made along the banks of the river in 1837, certain parts of the lands of Banchory facing the river were added to the glebe in place of part of the glebe which was taken for the road, but this was at the east boundary of the glebe, where it joins the lands of Banchory, and does not affect the present question.

The part of the glebe ex adverso of which the fishings are claimed by the pursuer is of limited extent, being only about 130 yards in length. It is common ground that the river at this place cannot be fished by net and coble in the usual way, and it further appears that there is at the upper part of it a back water in which fishing for salmon, even with the rod, is not practicable, so that the dispute between the parties in fact relates merely to the angling in a small portion of the river between the end of this back water and the top of the manse pool, the fishing in which admittedly belongs to the defenders.

The pursuer avers that he has exercised, peaceably and without interruption, the sole and exclusive right of fishing for salmon in this water from time immemorial, or at least for upwards of forty years. I doubt, however, whether the pursuer requires to undertake so heavy an onus. A right of salmon-fishing is a heritable subject, and is therefore an estate in land in the sense of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, and by the 34th section of that Act possession for twenty years would appear to be sufficient to constitute a prescriptive right to the fishings.

This action was raised in September 1892, and therefore I think the question is whether the pursuer has proved that he, and his predecessors and authors, have had sole and exclusive possession of these fishings for at least twenty years prior to that date. I further think that fishing by net and coble being, in fact, impracticable in the water in question, proof of such possession by rod-fishing would be sufficient to establish the pursuer's right.

On considering the evidence in the case, one finds a great deal of evidence as to the supposed boundary of the fishing between Ardoe and Banchory, on the supposition that it belonged to one or other of these estates, but there is not much proof as to the actual possession had by the pursuer of the fishings.

Such evidence as there is appears to me to shew that, down to a comparatively recent date, everybody who chose angled on the water in question without objection. For example, David Collison, one of the pursuer's principal witnesses, says,—“When I was a boy (he was born in 1835) I used to fish at and about Ardoe and Banchory-Devenick. There was no permission wanted at that time. Rod-fishing was of little repute then. In my early days everybody fished anywhere up and down without asking permission. I have seen other people fishing there besides myself,” and there is plenty of other evidence to the same effect.

No. 56.
Dec. 13, 1893.
Ogston v.
Stewart's

But perhaps it is enough to refer to the evidence of the pursuer himself as to this. In order to understand his evidence, however, it is necessary to mention that in 1853 Mr Ogston, the pursuer's father, sold to Dr Gillan certain parts of the estate of Ardoe which marched with the glebe on the east, with the salmon-fishings ex adverso of the parts so sold. These lands and fishings, which were subsequently known as Cotbank, were thus interjected between the glebe and the parts of Ardoe which remained with Mr Ogston. Cotbank and the fishings were, however, reacquired by the pursuer in 1873.

The pursuer's evidence is in these terms :—“(Q.) During the whole time,” he is asked, “from 1853 till you bought back Cotbank, did anyone from Ardoe, or in right of the proprietor of Ardoe, fish that detached portion opposite the manse? (A.) It could not be fished by net and coble. (Q.) Did anybody fish it in any way? (A.) I cannot say; I knew there was very little rod-fishing during that time. I was absent for three or four years, from 1851 or 1852. I was frequently going about Ardoe from 1855 to 1873. (Q.) During that time did you see people sometimes fishing in the Ardoe water, friends of your father or yourself? (A.) No. I do not recollect seeing anyone fishing with rod and line there in the Ardoe water. There was not much angling in those days, it only commenced when the Dee Association took over the nets. From 1853 to 1873 I cannot name anyone who fished this piece of water in dispute, in right of the proprietor of Ardoe,” and he refers to the terms of the leases. Leases have been produced covering the period from the year 1833 till 1887. The fishings are described in general terms in the earlier leases. But in November 1878 the pursuer lets the fishings to Mr Booth and others for three years from February 1879. In that lease, for the first time, there is a description of the extent of fishings let. They are described as being “the net and rod-fishings on the south bank of the River Dee, on the estate of Ardoe, extending from the mill of Ardoe burn down to the Established Church manse of Banchory-Devenick.” The same description of the subjects let is contained in the subsequent leases.

It is not, of course, material what description of the subjects let the pursuer may have inserted in his leases, unless exclusive possession has followed thereon; but it is not immaterial to notice that it was not until 1878, after the pursuer had reacquired Cotbank, and when, as I think, he first thought of asserting a claim to the fishings in question, that these fishings were included nominatim in the subjects let.

It will be observed that the pursuer in his evidence says he cannot recollect seeing anyone fish in the disputed water with rod and line between 1853 and 1873, that he cannot name anyone who fished in right of the proprietor of Ardoe, and he does not say that anyone was ever challenged for fishing during these years.

There is, I think, no evidence that anyone angling in the water in question was ever interfered with by anyone before 1873, and there is no evidence that anyone was interfered with by the pursuer, or those in his right prior to 1887. In the year 1873 Dr Arthur, who had a Banchory permission, was challenged while angling in the disputed water by Ritchie, a water-bailiff. But Ritchie did this at his own hand, and not under the authority of the pursuer or anyone in his right, and he does not appear to have had any business to interfere in the matter. Dr Arthur is asked why he left,—“Well,” he says, “I was a boy, and water-bailiffs are water-bailiffs. I had an idea that he was a keen fisher himself, and probably wanted to preserve the best part of the pool for his own benefit, and he being a water-bailiff I did not want to come into collision with him.”

There is no evidence that anyone else was challenged until one of the fishery inspectors, a good number of years after 1881, challenged a man who had a Banchory permission. “I had no right,” he says, “to put him off the water where he was fishing legally, but I told him he was over his march.” I do not see how the pursuer can found on these two acts of interruption. They were not done by him or by his authority.

The only instances of interruption on the part of the pursuer, or those in his right, to be found, are those spoken to by James Ogg, who was gardener to Dr Stewart, who was tenant of the Ardoe fishings from 1887 to 1890 inclusive. He says that it was part of his duty to look after the fishings, and that he used to challenge people who came upon the Ardoe water without permission. “I challenged people,” he says, “on several occasions fishing at the extreme eastern boundary, and turned them off. I remember several of them saying they had a right to be there. They said they had a right from Mr Clark (the tenant of Banchory fishings). I told them they must go by the march, and they went.”

Such being the evidence adduced by the pursuer in support of his claim, I do not think it necessary to examine in detail the evidence for the defender. It shews, however, that many persons, some with and some without permission from Banchory, angled in the disputed water during the last twenty years without interruption or challenge. It shews that on one occasion a Mr Mathieson, who had a Banchory permission, while so fishing, was challenged by Mr Booth, who was tenant of Ardoe fishings for some years subsequent to 1878. But Mr Mathieson asserted his right to fish where he was fishing. “I took no notice,” he says, “and fished away. I went back and fished the same place afterwards.”

I concur in the view of the evidence expressed by the Lord Ordinary. “The evidence,” he says, “for which one would naturally look in such a case is evidence of possession. But unfortunately the evidence of possession by rod-fishing is unsatisfactory and inconclusive, and it is admitted for the pursuer that upon that evidence alone he cannot succeed. It is not surprising that the evidence upon this point should not be more decisive. At best the fishing in dispute is, even now, of comparatively little value; the river at that point cannot be fished with net and coble; and even for the purposes of rod-fishing it cannot be of much value, because at the upper part there is back water, and lower down it is difficult to fish. Add to this, that until recently rod-fishing was of little value in the market, and therefore proprietors of salmon-fishings were not so particular in preventing rod-fishing in those parts of a river where it would not interfere materially with the net-fishings, and they were more liberal in giving leave to fish, when that was asked by friends or neighbours, or even by strangers.”

I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer has failed to prove that he has had sole and exclusive possession of the fishings in question for the prescriptive period, and that the plea now insisted on by the defenders, that the pursuer has no title to them, must be sustained. No. 56.

If that be so it is enough for the decision of the case. It is not necessary to consider whether the defenders, as they claim, have made out a right to these fishings. In the absence of the Crown, I do not think it would be right to find that either party had made out such a right. Dec. 13, 1893.
Ogston v.
Stewart's
Trustees.

I therefore think that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled.

LORD M'LAREN.—I have had an opportunity of reading Lord Adam's opinion, and I concur in it.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. I think the observation of the Lord President in the case of Richardson v. Hay (24 D. 775) that the pursuer's case was not based upon the strength of his own position, but upon the weakness of his opponent's, is a very apt description of the argument which was addressed to us by the pursuer in this case; and indeed it expresses accurately also the ground of the Lord Ordinary's judgment, because the judgment appears to me to be based upon the hypothesis that if the fishings in dispute are not shewn in this action to belong to the defender, they must of necessity belong to the pursuer. Now that might be a very legitimate mode of reasoning in a question of disputed marches between conterminous proprietors; but in the present case the riparian properties of the pursuer and defender are separated from one another by the glebe lands of Banchory-Devenick, which extend for about 350 yards along the river, and we cannot assume that their fishing rights are in fact conterminous until one or other has established an exclusive right to fish ex adverso of the glebe. But no one can have such a right except by grant flowing from the Crown; and if neither party can shew a title which either includes the fishings in dispute in terms, or can be shewn by competent evidence to have been intended to embrace them, the inference is that these fishings remain in the hands of the Crown, if they have not been given out to some other grantee. The pursuer's conclusion is that he has right not only to the undisputed fishings of his estate of Ardoe, but that he has an exclusive right to the salmon-fishings in the River Dee ex adverso of that portion of the glebe lands of the parish of Banchory-Devenick, extending from one point described in the conclusion of the summons to another. Now, that is an assertion of a good right to a specific heritable estate; and before we can affirm that proposition in the pursuer's favour, he must produce a clear title to that specific subject. The earliest title which he has produced is a crown charter of 1594, including the sunny half of the estate of Ardoe, with the salmon-fishings in the Water of Dee adjacent to the said lands. The second is a feu-charter by a subject of the shadow half of the estate of Ardoe, with the fishings. Now, the first of these titles contains words of limitation. It is a fishing adjacent to the land granted out which is given to the grantee. The second title does not contain any express words of limitation, but it is a grant of the shadow half of the lands with the salmon-fishings. The two halves came to be combined in one proprietor in 1840. The connecting links have not been traced; but it is not disputed that the title of 1840, upon which the present pursuer founds, is connected by a valid series with the charters I have mentioned, and by this title he holds the estate of Ardoe, both shadow half and sunny half, with the salmon-fishings in the Water of Dee belonging to the said lands. Now, there again we have words of limitation. The question is what is meant by the salmon-fishings belonging to the lands of Ardoe. There can be no doubt at all that that is a perfectly good title to the fishings ex adverso of the lands included in the charter, but it is not an express title to fishings lying beyond these limits. It may be explained by evidence to comprehend fishings ex adverso of the adjoining lands, or altogether discontinuous from the lands conveyed, but without such evidence it cannot, by force of its own terms, be made to cover any adjacent or discontinuous water. Prima facie it means the fishings ex adverso of the lands conveyed. Now, the kind of evidence by which a title of that kind may be extended so as to comprehend fishings that are not precisely ex adverso of the lands was very fully considered in the case of Fraser v. Grant, and the principle upon which such evidence is to be considered is there laid down by the late Lord President,—then Lord Justice-Clerk. His Lordship points out, in the first place, that such a title may be explained by evidence of possession; but then he goes on to say that it is also perfectly competent to shew by proof of a different kind that the true meaning of the grant is more comprehensive than could be assumed without such evidence, because the words used have a certain definite and well-known signification, and had that signification at the time that the grant was made. Now, it appears to me, in the application of that principle, that if the pursuer could have shewn that the glebe of Banchory-Devenick had been taken in whole or in part from his estate of Ardoe, or that the lands which are now glebe lands were part of Ardoe at the date of the crown grant, that would have been evidence tending to shew that the fishings ex adverso of the glebe land had been part of his salmon-fishing right. But then there is no evidence from which any inference of that kind can be drawn; and indeed the pursuer himself does not contend that there is, because his case upon record with reference to the glebe of Banchory-Devenick is that it is impossible to determine with certainty whether the glebe lands had been taken from the lands of Ardoe or from the lands of Banchory, or partly from the one and partly from the other. There is no evidence of the date when the glebe was first designed; and there is certainly no evidence by which we can identify the portion of the glebe in dispute with any part of the estate of Ardoe. And therefore the pursuer must fall back on the other kind of evidence,—the only evidence which can really be relied on in this case to shew that the salmon-fishings belong to the estate of Ardoe,—that is, evidence that from time immemorial he has exercised a right of salmon-fishing beyond the limits ex adverso of his own lands, and extending to the lands within the glebe of Ardoe, to which the conclusions of the summons relate. Now, upon the kind of evidence which is necessary to clear a title which is to be explained by possession only, the Lord Justice-Clerk, in the case I have referred to, says this,—“If the pursuer and his predecessors as proprietors of the land and fishings contained in the infeftment can shew that for forty years, or from time immemorial, they have exercised the right of salmon-fishing ex adverso of the disputed land, that will be sufficient to explain the title as applying to and comprehending these fishings.” But then his Lordship goes on to say,—“I know no authority for holding that possession to explain the terms of a crown grant of salmon-fishing can be possession for anything short of time immemorial, or forty years.” Now, agreeing with Lord Adam that the pursuer may probably be entitled in this case to substitute the period of twenty years for the period of forty years, I entirely agree with him also that there is no evidence of exclusive possession of the salmon-fishings in dispute by the pursuer or his predecessor for the period of twenty years. If the pursuer's case be considered on its own merits, apart from any weakness, real or supposed, in the defenders' case, it can hardly be maintained that he has established a right to salmon-fishing by exclusive possession during that period. I am therefore of opinion with Lord Adam that the pursuer has failed to make out his case. But while we must therefore negative the right alleged by the pursuer, I agree that we are not in a position to affirm the right put forward by the defender. Whether he may or may not be in a position to make out a title against the Crown, or any undoubted grantee of the Crown, we do not know. It is not necessary for the purposes of the present action to decide that, and, therefore, I think we can do nothing more than affirm the plea in law added in this Division.

Sale—Principal and Agent—Title to sue.—On 31st March Stewart, Brown, & Company sent the following sale-note to Biggart & Fulton:—"We have this day sold to you, on account of Stevenson & Company, Manila, 100 tons of sugar at £10, 17s. 3d. c. i. f. Liverpool . . . we to accept shippers' drafts at 3 m/s."

Biggart & Fulton authorised Stewart, Brown, & Company to take delivery of and sell the sugar on arrival in Liverpool and to credit themselves with the proceeds against the price, and their outlay in taking delivery of the sugar and selling it. The proceeds of the sale in Liverpool were insufficient to meet the price, &c., and Stewart, Brown, & Company (together with Stevenson & Company) sued Biggart & Fulton for the difference.

In defence Biggart & Fulton pleaded no title to sue, in respect that Stewart, Brown, & Company, as agents for a disclosed principal, had no title, and that Stevenson & Company had no title, as they had made no contract with Biggart & Fulton.

On a proof it appeared that Stevenson & Company were in the custom of sending cargoes of sugar to this country for sale, but instead of breaking the cargoes into quantities to suit purchasers they disposed of them entire to brokers upon contracts which bore that the broker was "buyer" of the cargo at a certain sum per ton. The broker then disposed of the sugar in lots to the buyers whom he had secured at a somewhat increased rate per ton, he receiving the difference. Stewart, Brown, & Company held the cargo, of which the 100 tons in question was a part, on a contract in these terms, and disposed of it in this way to different purchasers.

Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that Stewart, Brown, & Company, as agents for Biggart & Fulton in paying the price, taking delivery of the sugar, and reselling it at Liverpool, were entitled to recover the sum sued for.

Question (per Lord Trayner), whether the pursuers had a title to sue upon the sale-note of 31st March.

"Contingent Comn.—Buyers to return to shippers half the profit (if any), but not exceeding half of first 10 per cent profit.—Yours truly,

"STEWART, BROWN, & COMPANY."

(Cond. 2) "The pursuers Stewart, Brown, & Company were afterwards instructed by the defenders to sell the sugar on its arrival, and credit themselves with the proceeds. They did so, but the price realised was not as much as the price due under the contract quoted. To account of the difference the defenders have paid £100, but there is still left a balance of £31, 14s. 4d." which balance the defenders refuse to pay.

In defence Biggart & Fulton averred ;—(Ans. 1) "Said letter is referred to for its terms, beyond which no admission is made. Explained (1) the alleged contract is ex facie made on behalf of the pursuers W. F. Stevenson & Company, and the defenders aver and believe that the pursuers Stewart, Brown, & Company had no authority from the said W. F. Stevenson & Company to enter into the same ; (2) that ex facie of said alleged contract the pursuers Stewart, Brown, & Company are merely brokers for W. F. Stevenson & Company, and have no title to sue ; (3) that no contract has been completed between the pursuers W. F. Stevenson & Company and the defenders, and said pursuers have no title to sue."

In a statement of facts, Biggart & Fulton further averred that they had authorised Stewart, Brown, & Company, as their brokers, to purchase on their account 100 tons of a proposed shipment of sugar by W. F. Stevenson & Company ; that they themselves had no knowledge of the sugar trade, and were induced to purchase the sugar solely by the representations of William Govan, a partner of Stewart, Brown, & Company, and by concealment of material facts on his part ; that "he stated his firm strongly recommended the purchase, and were so confident of the result that their commission would be contingent on a profit being made, and he assured the defenders that unless the transaction turned out profitably his firm would derive no benefit whatever from it" ; but that on the contrary, as the defenders had recently ascertained, Stewart, Brown, & Company, instead of being interested in a contingent commission as represented, were themselves the principals, as being owners of the sugar at the date of the alleged sale to the defenders, and that they derived a profit out of the sale ; and consequently that no contract of sale had been effected between Stevenson & Company and Biggart & Fulton. There were certain other misrepresentations and concealments alleged by Biggart & Fulton which are not necessary to be here detailed.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defenders being, in terms of the contract libelled, justly indebted and resting owing to the pursuers the sum sued for, the pursuers are entitled to decree as craved, with expenses.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(1) No title to sue. (3) The defenders never having been indebted to the pursuers, are entitled to be assolizied. (4) Separatim, The alleged contract having been entered into on the faith of statements by the pursuers Stewart, Brown, & Company, which were false and fraudulent, or were at least misrepresentations of matters material to the contract, the falsity of which they knew, or ought to have known, the defenders are entitled to repudiate said contract.

Biggart & Fulton subsequently raised an action against Stewart, Brown, & Company for repayment of the £100 paid by them to Stewart, Brown, & Company to account of the price of the sugar. They averred that they had made this payment before they became aware that no contract had been made between themselves and W. F. Stevenson & Company.

The two actions were conjoined, and a proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect:—W. F. Stevenson & Company were in the custom of sending cargoes of sugar to this country for sale, the sales being effected through their representatives, who were Horsley, Kibble, & Company in London, Horsley, M'Laren, & Company in Liverpool, and Stevenson & Fleming in Glasgow. Neither Stevenson & Company nor their representatives were in the way of breaking up the cargoes into quantities to suit purchasers. Mr H. F. Stevenson, of Stevenson & Fleming, deponed,—“We never sell in these small quantities; we only sell in large quantities by a cargo at a time.” Their practice was to intimate to a broker when they had a cargo for sale, and if the broker could find purchasers whose offers in the aggregate were equal to the amount of the cargo, he himself offered for the whole, and if the price suited Stevenson & Company the transaction was completed. In this way the cargo, of which the 100 tons now in question formed a part, came to Stewart, Brown, & Company under a contract expressed as follows:—

“Liverpool, 31st March 1892.

“Messrs Stewart, Brown, & Company, “per Messrs Stevenson & Fleming, Glasgow.

“Dear Sirs,—We have this day sold to you, on account of Messrs W. F. Stevenson & Company about 700 tons usual American assortment of Iloilo sugar at £10, 12s. 3d. c. i. f. Liverpool.

“Shipment by steamer and/or steamers from Iloilo during the months of April and/or May and/or June 1892.

“Payment.—Buyers to accept shippers' drafts at 3 m/s., with shipping documents attached, deliverable against payment.

“Insurance.—Horsley, Kibble, & Company to insure on their floating policies f. p. a. at buyers' expense.

“Contingent Comm.—Buyers to return to shippers half the profit (if any), but not exceeding half of first 10 per cent profit.

“Brokerage $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to buyers.—Yours truly,

“HORSLEY, M'LAREN, & COMPANY.”

In some of the contracts with Stewart, Brown & Company, there was a clause entitling them to so much of the price by way of commission—usually 5s. per ton, but under the contract just quoted the whole price (£10, 12s. 3d. per ton) was to be paid to Stevenson & Company, Stewart, Brown, & Company being entitled to add 5s. per ton in fixing the price to be paid by their buyers, thus bringing out the £10, 17s. 3d. per ton set forth as the price in the sale-note to Biggart & Fulton (supra, p. 294).

John Stewart, of Stewart, Brown, & Company, deponed,—“Our understanding as to our position with Stevenson & Company was that we were entirely their agents. . . . Cross-examined.—(Q.) How did you come to sell the sugar for the defenders? (A.) We got the sugars from them to sell in the usual way. (Q.) Did the increase in price that you put on not cover the selling? (A.) Yes, that was part of it. The selling was part of that item of 5s. (Q.) So that you were acting for them there also? (A.) We do not admit that we were acting for them in buying. (Q.) But you were acting for them in selling? (A.) Yes. (Q.) And you charged for it in your original price? (A.) No. Of course the 5s. includes the selling at the beginning to Biggart & Fulton. By the Court.—(Q.) Does it also include the selling for them? What remuneration did you get for selling for them? (A.) We got nothing for selling for them. Cross continued.—(Q.) Did the 5s. not include the selling for them? (A.) It included the financing and looking after the transfer and all that. (Q.) And the selling for them? (A.) Yes, it would include that too. By the Court.—You regard the selling for them as part of your financing? (A.) Yes. (Q.) It is a consequence of your financing? (A.) Yes. Cross continued.—(Q.) So that you were paid for this selling for them in your original price? (A.) You can take that as the position if you wish it.”

Mr Govan, of Stewart, Brown, & Company, examined as a witness by Biggart & Fulton, deponed,—“(Q.) What particulars did you give to your buyer (Biggart) when you got this order? (A.) I told him the price. I gave him the price and the ship. (Q.) What further particulars did you give him? (A.) I told him about the contingent commission. I told him all about the contract, as far as I remember. (Q.) What particulars did you give as to your position in the transaction? (A.) I did not begin to talk about that at all. I did not say anything about that. (Q.) What did you say about your brokerage? I said nothing about brokerage. I told him about the contingent commission; that was all I said. I told him the first advance of ten per cent was to be divided between the shippers and the receivers of the sugar, the buyers. (Q.) Did you represent that you were only to have a brokerage in the event of it turning out profitable? (A.) I did not. I told him that our people had sold the sugar at a price so near the bone that unless the market advanced and they participated in the contingent commission, it would leave them practically nothing. . . . (Q.) Did you undertake to carry through the transaction to a close, and simply render accounts? (A.) I told Mr Biggart we could do all that—that they would not need to take up the drafts—that we would see the sugar sold, and that sort of thing. (Q.) You arranged that you would do so? (A.) That we would see it done. (Q.) And you so arranged? (A.) Yes—that is, that they would not need to take up their sugar when it arrived—that they would not need to pay for the sugar—that they would not be saddled with 100 tons of sugar that they did not know what to do with. (Q.) So you had a conversation about realising the sugar? (A.) Yes, about that. (Q.) And at the time you arranged to undertake that? (A.) To see the transaction completed. (Q.) Was this to be taken along with your financing, the realising of it? (A.) No; that did not include any commission for the selling of the sugar. (Q.) I am not asking about commission; was this work to be taken along with the financing, that you would carry the transaction right through and render accounts at the close? (A.) Yes, I should say so. (Q.) They were to have no trouble whatever until it was all closed? (A.) Just so. (Q.) And you would render accounts? (A.) Yes."

John F. Fulton, of Biggart & Fulton, deponed that Stewart, Brown, & Company had "acted purely and simply as brokers. We dealt through them as brokers. . . . I never discussed with them any business matters in any other position. . . . Govan said that his commission was to be a contingent commission on the profit. That was to be his entire commission, that if we had no profit on our transaction, they, as a firm, would have no profit either. They were willing to enter into this arrangement, because they were so very strong in the belief that the market would rise. This was held forward to us as an inducement. He also said that we would have no trouble whatever in the transaction—that they would accept the shippers' drafts—that in all probability the cargo would be sold before arrival, and that we would have no financing whatever to do—that they would do everything for us and sell the sugar, and the selling commission was also to be covered by this contingent commission." Mr Fulton further deponed that he was not familiar with the sugar trade.

Mr Biggart in substance corroborated this evidence.

The sugar was sold in Liverpool through a firm of brokers there, who charged $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent on the price realised by the sale, and of this commission Stewart, Brown, & Company got one-half, but they received nothing by way of commission on the sale in Liverpool from Biggart & Fulton direct. The sum realised by the resale was about £130 short of that required to pay the price and the costs of the resale. Biggart & Fulton paid Stewart, Brown, & Company £100 to account, and the sum sued for by the latter was the balance.

On 28th July 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Guthrie) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that by contract, dated 31st March 1892, the parties Stewart, Brown, & Company, as agents for W. F. Stevenson & Company, Manilla, sold 100 tons of sugar to the parties, Biggart & Fulton, on the terms condescended on by Stewart, Brown, & Company: Finds that Stewart, Brown, & Company were not in said sale acting as brokers or as agents for Biggart & Fulton: Finds that the said sale was not induced by fraud or misrepresentation of Stewart, Brown, & Company: Finds that the parties Stewart, Brown, & Company sold the sugar on arrival on behalf of the parties Biggart & Fulton, and that on a true accounting between the parties the sum of £29, 9s. 10d. is due and resting owing by Biggart & Fulton to Stewart, Brown, & Company: Therefore in the action Biggart & Fulton v. Stewart, Brown, & Company assoilzies the defenders, and decerns; and in the action Stewart, Brown, & Company v. Biggart & Fulton, decerns in terms of the petition as restricted by minute," &c.

Biggart & Fulton appealed, and argued;—(1) Stewart, Brown, & Company had no title to sue upon the sale-note of 31st March 1892 granted by them to Biggart & Fulton, for in it they were described as agents, and when a broker gave a sale-note describing himself as acting for a named principal, he could not sue personally on the contract.¹ Nor had W. F. Stevenson & Company a title to sue, for though described as principals in the sale-note they were not so in fact. They had sold the sugar to Stewart, Brown, & Company. It was clear on the proof that Stevenson & Company were not sellers under any contract with Biggart & Fulton as buyers, and that Stewart, Brown, & Company were de facto at the date of the alleged sale the owners of the sugar. It was true that Biggart & Fulton, if it had been their interest to do so, might have sued Stewart, Brown, & Company for damages, and Stewart, Brown, & Company might have met the action by tendering the sugar, but Stewart, Brown, & Company would have been sued, not as sellers under a contract of sale, but as brokers who were in breach of a contract to effect a sale between Stevenson & Company and Biggart & Fulton. Stewart, Brown, & Company, therefore, had no converse right of action. Nor (2) had Stewart, Brown, & Company a title to sue as on an accounting with respect to the sale of the sugar in Liverpool. Doubtless independent brokers employed by Biggart & Fulton could have recovered their outlay and commission, notwithstanding any invalidity in the contract between Stevenson & Company and Biggart & Fulton, but Biggart & Fulton's action against Stewart, Brown, & Company for damages for breach of contract would have remained. Stewart, Brown, & Company, however, were not in the position of independent brokers selling sugar which had come into the hands of Biggart & Fulton under a contract of which they knew nothing. What they had contracted with Biggart & Fulton to do was in the first place to effect a sale between Stevenson & Company as sellers and Biggart & Fulton as buyers; and secondly, to sell the sugar so purchased for behoof of Biggart & Fulton. If, then, they had never effected a sale to Biggart & Fulton they were not entitled to plead any rights which they might otherwise have had as brokers effecting a resale. If the sugar had never been sold to Biggart & Fulton the sale in Liverpool was either on account of Stewart, Brown, & Company themselves or on account of Stevenson & Company. Biggart & Fulton, therefore, were entitled to recover the £100 paid by them to account of a contract which de facto had no existence.¹

Argued for Stewart, Brown, & Company and Stevenson & Company;—
(1) The true relation between Stevenson & Company and Stewart, Brown, & Company was that of principals and agents, not that of sellers and purchasers. That for their own convenience, and in accordance with the custom of the trade, they had chosen, in the contract-note between themselves, to describe themselves as sellers and buyers respectively, was a matter with which Biggart & Fulton had no concern. If they had chosen to call themselves principals and agents the result to Biggart & Fulton would have been the same. Biggart & Fulton had got the sugar which they had contracted for, at the price which they had stipulated, and they had resold it, and what they now wished to do was to saddle the loss arising on a resale on someone else. The pursuers of the principal action consequently had a title to sue. But (2) even if the title to sue as on the sale-note of 31st March could not be sustained, Stewart, Brown, & Company had a title to sue for recovery of the outlay incurred by them on account of Biggart & Fulton. In selling the sugar in Liverpool they were acting, and that for the first time in this transaction, as the agents of Biggart & Fulton, and any technical informality in the contract as between Stevenson & Company and Biggart & Fulton could not affect Stewart, Brown, & Company's rights as agents of Biggart & Fulton. Had they been independent brokers no question on this head could have arisen, and it made no difference that in one view they were themselves the sellers of the sugar to Biggart & Fulton, when in truth and substance the sellers were Stevenson & Company. Biggart & Fulton had suffered no prejudice.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In this case, though there has been a long proof, the circumstances may be shortly stated. Stevenson & Company had a cargo of sugar—700 tons—which they wished to dispose of, but they did not sell in small lots, but only in large lots, and they applied to Stewart, Brown, & Company with the view that Stewart, Brown, & Company should endeavour to get the sugar placed with a number of buyers. Biggart & Fulton, the defenders in this case, had interviews with a representative of Stewart, Brown, & Company, and as the result of these interviews they agreed to take 100 tons of sugar, and the form which the transaction took is shewn by the letter of 31st March 1892. It bears on the face of it that Stewart, Brown, & Company “sold on account of Stevenson & Company, of Manila and Iloilo, sugar, about 100 tons usual American assortment.” It appears that Stevenson & Company stipulated with Stewart, Brown, & Company that the sugar was not to be sold for less than £10, 11s. 3d. per ton, while in point of fact there was more paid for the sugar per ton in the transaction between Biggart & Fulton and Stewart, Brown, & Company, and what Biggart & Fulton complain of is that Stewart, Brown, & Company were taking a profit out of the transaction—in reality, that they had arranged only to sell at a lower price, and that the sale to Biggart & Fulton has been at a higher rate than that which they were authorised to take. Now, I am not satisfied that as regards that part of the case there was anything wrong in the transaction at all. I think it is satisfactorily made out that Stevenson & Company, while they stipulated that they were not to get less than £10, 11s. 3d., were quite willing that the sugar should be sold for them at such higher price as Stewart, Brown, & Company could get, the latter keeping the difference for their trouble in working the transaction. Biggart & Fulton's case is this—that this was not the nature of the transaction at all, but that they, Biggart & Fulton, purchased the sugar direct, and that in the transaction Stewart, Brown, & Company were only acting for them. I have been unable on consideration of the evidence in this case to come to any such conclusion. The case as presented by Stewart, Brown, & Company is, I think, the true one. I do not attach the same weight to Biggart & Fulton's evidence on the matter as to the evidence given for Stewart, Brown, & Company. But then what happened was this, the price was paid to Stevenson & Company. Biggart & Fulton, who were not themselves dealers in sugar at all, and were engaged in other business—a class of work of quite a different kind, and who were entering into this as a speculation in the hope of making some money out of it—arranged with Stewart, Brown, & Company that on the arrival of this sugar Stewart, Brown, & Company should act as their agents in getting it disposed of. The market for sugar fell remarkably, and the result was that on the realisation of the transaction by Stewart, Brown, & Company for Biggart & Fulton there was a considerable loss. Now, it seems to me that it is upon this latter part of the transaction that the true question between the parties arose. Stewart, Brown, & Company sell for Biggart & Fulton, and a loss of £130 ensues. £100 had been already paid to Stewart, Brown, &

Stewart,
Brown, & Co.
v. Biggart &
Fulton.

I think the pursuers in the action at the instance of Stewart, Brown, & Company are entitled to prevail, and are not liable in the action at Biggart & Fulton's instance to pay back the £100.

I have stated my views very shortly after perusing the opinion of Lord Trayner, in which I entirely concur.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—On 31st March 1892 the respondents advised the appellants that they had sold to them on account of Stevenson & Company 100 tons of sugar at £10, 17s. 3d. per ton. The appellants paid to the respondents £100 to account of the price, and instructed them to sell the sugar on arrival. The respondents did so, but they say that the sum realised, after crediting the £100, fell short of the price by £29, 9s. 10d. We have before us two actions, in the one of which the appellants seek to recover the sum of £100 before mentioned, and in the other the respondents sue for the foresaid sum of £31, 14s. 4d.

The case of the appellants is that there was no sale by Stevenson & Company to them, that they paid £100 to the respondents in ignorance of that fact, and that in the same ignorance they desired them to sell the sugar on arrival. They further say that the respondents represented themselves as acting as their brokers in making a contract with Stevenson & Company, while the fact was that the respondents had bought the sugar from Stevenson & Company at the price of £10, 12s. 3d. per ton, being 5s. less than the price advised to themselves.

On turning to the proof we find that Stevenson & Company are produce merchants on a large scale, and that they never sell so small a quantity as 100 tons of sugar. Mr Stevenson says,—“We only sell in large quantities by a cargo at a time.”

In March 1892 Stevenson & Company had 700 tons to sell, of which it is not disputed that the sugar in question was a part. By a sale-note dated 31st March they sold these 700 tons to the respondents at the price of £10, 12s. 3d. per ton. The clauses expressive of the conditions of the sale are—

“Payment.—Buyers to accept shippers' drafts at 3 m/s, with shipping documents attached, deliverable against payment.

“Contingent Comn.—Buyers to return to shippers half the profit (if any), but not exceeding half of first 10 per cent profit.

“Brokerage.— $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent to buyers.”

With this document before me I cannot doubt that the respondents bought the sugar. It bears that they are purchasers, and they, and they only, are bound for the price. The clause relating to brokerage is unusual, but it is not inconsistent with the existence of a contract of sale. So far from it, the brokerage is given to the respondents “as buyers.”

It is said that the respondents were only acting as the agents of Stevenson & Company in finding buyers of small quantities, and that the contract was a contract of sale in name only. It is true that Stevenson & Company knew that the respondents were endeavouring to procure such buyers, and that they paid them a commission for their trouble. But it is equally certain that the buyers for whom the respondents were seeking were not to contract with Stevenson & Company, for the simple reason that that firm would sell nothing less than a cargo. The success of the respondents in finding buyers might result in the sale of the cargo. Consequently Stevenson & Company might think it right to give the respondents some remuneration. But as they would not sell less than a cargo, it follows that the respondents must be the buyers from Stevenson & Company, though they might not enter into a contract of sale until they had made arrangements for a re-sale.

No. 57.
Dec. 13, 1893.
Stewart,
Brown, & Co.
v. Biggart &
Fulton.

There is evidence to shew that the respondents, though buyers in form, were understood by Stevenson & Company to be their agents only, and that the increase of 5s. per ton which the respondents put on the price is to be regarded as a charge by way of commission, which Stevenson & Company authorised them to make. I can attach no importance to such evidence. It does not and cannot affect what was done. For in saying that they sell in cargoes only, Stevenson & Company reject the idea that the purchasers of small lots have any contract with them. Whatever might happen to these purchasers, the respondents were liable for the price in the sale-note. There was no contract under which they could be so liable except what professes to be a contract of sale, and in my opinion it is what it professes to be. Again, what is stipulated for as price must be regarded as price only. I cannot take it as including a concealed commission.

For these reasons I am satisfied that there was no contract between the appellants and Stevenson & Company; that the respondents improperly represented that they had made such a contract; and that in the belief that such a contract was made, the appellants paid £100 to account of the price and directed the sale on arrival. The question is, whether they are liable for the loss which has arisen, or whether they are entitled to recover the money which they paid under an erroneous belief.

I do not see how the appellants can be liable for any part of the price, or for any loss under a contract which they never made. If nothing had been done I think it clear that they could not have been bound by it. It is said that the respondents could have taken the place of Stevenson & Company, and insisted on implement. I am not of that opinion. It is true that the appellants might have sued them, because they have not bound Stevenson & Company, and in that case they would have been entitled to avoid any claim of damage by offering to deliver the goods. But the converse does not hold. The appellants did not agree to make any contract except with Stevenson & Company, and if that contract was not made they are necessarily free.

Can it matter that the alleged contract was acted on? I do not think so. The appellants did nothing except what they believed themselves to be bound to do, and when they came to know their error they repudiated all liability. They did nothing from which it could be inferred that they took the respondents as their sellers instead of Stevenson & Company. Besides, their error was due to the misrepresentations of the respondents, and I cannot see how they can incur any liability to the respondents by acting under an error so produced.

It is said that the question before us does not arise by reason of the alleged contract of sale, but from the fact that the appellants employed the respondents to realise the sugar on arrival. This is not so. The appellants seek to recover what they paid to account of the price—the respondents to recover the loss on the contract. No doubt that loss is in part made up by debiting their own charges on selling. But apart from these charges, the claims of each depend on

Stewart,
Brown, & Co.
v. Biggart &
Fulton.

the existence or non-existence of the contract of sale. The appellants maintain that they were never liable under it. The respondents insist that the appellants are bound to fulfil it. It is only on that ground that the respondents could have any right to retain the £100 which was paid to account of the price, and to require the appellants to make good the loss. Nor are the charges in a different position. If there was no contract, they were incurred on a sale by the respondents of their own goods. No doubt the sale was ordered by the appellants. But the order was due to the misrepresentation of the respondents, and they can take no benefit from it.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appellants should prevail in both actions. I do not require to enter on the question whether the respondents represented themselves as acting as the brokers for the appellants. It is enough, I think, for the disposal of the case that the appellants were not bound by any contract. Nor need I take any notice of the alleged custom under which it is said that apparent buyers are agents only, and that with the assent of the principals they increase the price in order to obtain a commission under the name of price. It is of no importance in this case, because I hold that the respondents were in truth the buyers from Stevenson & Company. But I am sorry that any such custom should exist. Unless it is known to all concerned, it is a means of deception. If all know of it, it is useless. It is a good rule to call things by their right names. It would be better for all parties if it were strictly followed.

LORD TRAYNER.—I agree with the Sheriff-substitute in holding that in the transaction under which the defenders (Biggart & Fulton) bought the 100 tons of sugar in question, the pursuers (Stewart, Brown, & Company) did not act as brokers or buyers for them. I think it is established on the contrary that the defenders in that transaction bought for themselves, and further, that they were not induced to make the purchase by fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the pursuers.

The defenders, however, maintain that the pursuers are not entitled to the decree which they ask, on the grounds (1) that the pursuers being represented in the contract of 31st March 1892 as agents for a disclosed principal, are not entitled to sue on that contract, the principal alone being entitled to do so; (2) that no such contract as is there expressed was made between Stevenson & Company and the defenders; and (3) that in making said contract the pursuers were not acting as agents for Stevenson & Company, or with their authority.

I am not sure that the ascertained facts support these contentions in law, but I am of opinion on another ground, which I shall state hereafter, that these pleas cannot receive effect in the present case. The facts appear to be these:—Stevenson & Company had about 700 tons of sugar to dispose of, and indirectly—that is, through their representatives in Liverpool and Glasgow—placed them in the hands of the pursuers for sale. Stevenson & Company would not sell this sugar in small quantities; they desired to place the whole 700 tons by one transaction; but they knew that the pursuers as commission-agents were or might be in a position to place the whole quantity. Accordingly the 700 tons were placed at the disposal of the pursuers at a certain price by Stevenson & Company, the latter knowing that the pursuers were not themselves buyers of the sugar, that they would merely procure buyers, and that they would get as much higher a price than Stevenson & Company required as they could, the excess obtained beyond Stevenson's price to belong to the pursuers as their remuneration for their trouble in placing the sugar. In this way Stevenson & Company got their whole quantity of sugar sold for them at the price they named, and the pursuers were remunerated for their trouble according to their success in getting a higher price than Stevenson had fixed. The defenders bought 100 tons of this sugar. Now, it may very well be said in one view of the facts as thus stated that Stevenson & Company were not the sellers to the defenders of, and never agreed to sell to the defenders 100 tons of sugar; that the price paid by the defenders for the sugar was not the price which Stevenson & Company asked or received; and that the pursuers were not directly authorised by Stevenson & Company to make as their agents the contract expressed in the sale-note of 31st March 1892. On the other hand, the truth and substance of the transaction is as stated by the pursuers. The sugar was Stevenson's and not the pursuers'; it was sold by the pursuers for Stevenson at the price fixed by the latter, with an additional price which Stevenson knew of and approved, and which went to remunerate the pursuers for their trouble in placing Stevenson's goods. It was not incorrect, therefore, for the pursuers to represent themselves as selling sugar for Stevenson which they were doing, and as to the price ultimately obtained it was no concern of the buyers how that was divided between the principal and agent; and, lastly, although Stevenson did not authorise directly a sale in his name of 100 tons of sugar to the defenders, yet he authorised it indirectly by allowing the pursuers to sell 700 tons of sugar in such quantities and to such persons as the pursuers might agree upon or with, at a price not less than that fixed, but at a price as much greater as could be obtained. In this view of the facts the pursuers were the agents for Stevenson, and the contract made with the defenders was one which came within the limits of the pursuers' authority as Stevenson's agents.

I am not, however, to be held as expressing the opinion that the view of the facts which I have last presented would have been a sufficient or successful answer to the defenders' pleas had it been necessary to decide this case upon them. I think those pleas, as well as the plea of no title to sue, would have presented very formidable difficulties in the pursuers' way if this had been an action for implement of the contract of 31st March 1892. But in my opinion this action, and the right which the pursuers seek to enforce, are not based or dependent upon that contract at all.

This transaction in sugar was, I understand, a speculation on the part of the defenders. It was not a transaction entered into in the ordinary course of their own business. Being an isolated transaction, not in the course of their own business, they arranged with the pursuers to finance the transaction for them, and on their behalf to look after the sale of the sugar on its arrival at the port of delivery, which happened to be Liverpool. This the pursuers did. The price obtained for the defenders' sugar when sold realised less (when the expenses of landing, sale, &c., were deducted) than the price they owed for it. It is for the difference thus arising that the pursuers now sue. The debt sued for therefore arises, not out of the contract of 31st March 1892, but out of the agreement entered into subsequently to that contract by the pursuers and defenders. The defenders took delivery of the sugar (by their authorised agents) on its arrival and sold it, and the contract of 31st March was then at an end. The sugar contracted for had been delivered to the defenders, they

If there was not, on what title did the defenders take delivery of the 100 tons of sugar and sell it? The pursuers made disbursements on the defenders' behalf which the sum realised by the sale of the sugar was not sufficient to repay. The balance or deficiency is the defenders' debt to the pursuers for which they are now sued. This is the view taken of the case by the Sheriff-substitute, and I think he is right. If the defenders had employed some person other than the pursuers to finance the transaction—that is, to pay the price of the sugar, and then to take delivery and sell—they would clearly have been liable to him for the difference between what he had advanced for the defenders and the amount realised by the sale of the sugar. But it was nothing more than an accident that the person authorised to sell the sugar for the defenders was the same as the person who had sold it to them. That accident does not affect the defenders' liability.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that in the purchase of the 100 tons of sugar in question, the pursuers (Stewart, Brown, & Company) did not act as brokers for the purchasers, the defenders (Biggart & Fulton); (2) that defenders were not induced to make the said purchase by fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the pursuers: Find it unnecessary in the circumstances to determine whether in said transaction the pursuers were principals or only agents for Messrs W. F. Stevenson & Company: Find further in fact (3) that the defenders arranged with the pursuers that the pursuers would finance the transaction for them, and undertake the sale of the sugar on their behalf on its arrival at Liverpool, the port of discharge; (4) that the defenders took delivery through the pursuers as their authorised agents of said sugar at the port of discharge under the contract of sale to them, and that the pursuers did on behalf of the defenders pay the sale price of £10, 17s. 3d.; (5) that the pursuers, as agents for the defenders resold the said sugar at Liverpool at a price less than said contract price; (6) that the defenders on 28th August 1892 paid £100 to account to the pursuers; and (7) that after debiting the said contract price and crediting the net price obtained for said sugar, and said payment to account, there remains on a true and just accounting between the parties the sum of £29, 9s. 10d. due and resting owing by the defenders to the pursuers: Therefore, in the action Biggart & Fulton against Stewart, Brown, & Company, assoilzie the defenders and decern; and in the action Stewart, Brown, & Company against Biggart & Fulton decern against Biggart & Fulton for payment to Stewart, Brown, & Company of the sum of £29, 9s. 10d., with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from 12th October 1892 till payment: Find Stewart, Brown, & Company entitled to expenses," &c.

Ballantine v.

of Great

Insurance—Accident insurance—Post-mortem examination—Contract—Condition precedent.—A person insured against death by accident fell into a river, while fishing, and his dead body was subsequently recovered. In an action upon the policy, the insurance company, in defence, averred that his death resulted from disease and not from drowning.

Evidence on which held that death from drowning was instructed without a post-mortem examination.

An accident assurance policy contained the following condition:—"In the case of death the legal representatives of the assured . . . shall furnish all such other information and evidence as the directors may require from time to time, or may consider necessary or proper to elucidate the case."

Opinion (per Lord Young) that upon a sound reading of the condition the refusal by the representatives of a person insured to comply with a demand by the company for a post-mortem examination, in circumstances which made the demand not unreasonable, did not of itself liberate the company from the obligations in the policy.

In December 1892 Mrs Rollo Bowman Ballantine, general disponente and sole executor of her deceased son James C. Rollo Bowman Ballantine, of Castlehill and Ashgrove, Ayrshire, brought an action against the Employers' Insurance Company of Great Britain, Limited, having its chief office in Glasgow, concluding for payment of £1000, being the sum payable under a policy of insurance taken by Mr Ballantine with the defenders, in the event of the death of the insured through accident.* The

* By the policy it was, inter alia, agreed,—“(1) The company, if, during the currency of this policy, the assured shall sustain any personal injury caused by accidental, external, and visible means within the conditions of this policy, and the direct effect of such injury shall occasion the death of the assured within three calendar months from the happening of such injury, shall pay to the legal personal representatives of the assured, within three calendar months after it shall have been proved to the satisfaction of the directors of the company that the death of the assured was occasioned as aforesaid, the sum of one thousand pounds.”

The policy also contained this proviso,—“Provided always, that this policy is subject to the conditions indorsed hereon, which are to be taken as part hereof, and are hereby agreed to be conditions precedent to the right of the insured to sue or recover hereunder.”

Among the conditions indorsed on the policy were the following,—“(3) The assured shall not be entitled to make any claim under this policy for any injury from an accident unless such injury shall be caused by some outward and visible means of which proof satisfactory to the directors can be furnished, and that this assurance shall not extend to death by suicide, whether felonious or otherwise, or to any injury caused by or arising from natural disease or weakness or exhaustion consequent upon disease, or by any medical or surgical treatment or operation rendered necessary by disease, or to any death arising from disease, although such death may have been accelerated by accident.

“(4) In the event of any accident (whether fatal or not) occurring to the assured, it is a condition, precedent to any right of the assured or his representatives to make any claim, that notice thereof in writing must be delivered to the company at their chief offices in Glasgow, or their chief offices, within fourteen days after the occurrence of the accident, stating the nature and pursuer averred that Mr Ballantine met his death through accidental drowning when fishing in the River Orchy, Dalnally, Argyllshire.

In defence, the company stated;—(Ans. 4) “ . . . Explained that the circumstances under which the pursuer's son met his death were so peculiar that the defenders had reason to believe that he died from natural disease, or some other cause against which they do not insure, and not by drowning, as alleged by the pursuer. Their consulting physician, Dr Duncan, having had the details, so far as known, laid before him, stated that he could not certify the cause of death as from accident without a post-mortem examination of the deceased's body, and accordingly he wired on 3d October to that effect to Dr Allan, the pursuer's family doctor, and asked him to see the friends and arrange for a post-mortem examination being held the following day. Dr Allan telegraphed back that the deceased's relatives, before whom he had laid Dr Duncan's request, declined to allow of the examination. The defenders at once intimated, by letter, dated 4th October 1892, to the pursuer's agents, that they were of opinion that death did not occur by accident within the scope of the policy, and that the only way of ascertaining whether it did or not was by post-mortem examination. They accordingly repeated their request that the pursuer would consent to a post-mortem examination, and that their medical adviser should be present, otherwise they would found upon the refusal. This request and other requests of the same nature were refused. The pursuer has thus failed to comply with the conditions of the policy, . . . which were declared to be conditions precedent to a claim under it. The pursuer has never offered any evidence to the defenders, with a view to satisfying them that the cause of Mr Ballantine's death was an accident within the meaning of the policy founded on. On the pursuer furnishing evidence to this effect, satisfactory to the directors, the defenders are willing to pay or consign the sum in the policy.”

In answer, the pursuer averred;—(Cond. 4) “ . . . The correspondence referred to in the explanations in answer is referred to for its terms. Quoad ultra said explanations are denied; and it is explained that no request of the nature indicated in the answer was ever made by defenders to pursuer.”

The pursuer pleaded;—The said Mr Ballantine having effected said policy on his life, and having been accidentally drowned, the sum sued for falls to be paid to the pursuer, as concluded for.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuer having failed to comply with the conditions of the policy, which were thereby declared conditions precedent to her right to sue or recover under the same, the defenders should be assoilzied. (2) Separatim, The pursuer's son not having met his death from accident within the meaning of the policy founded on, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. The evidence was to the following effect:—Mr date of the injuries, the place where and the manner in which they were received. . . .

“(5) In case of death, the legal representatives of the assured must deliver to the company a certificate from the medical attendant of the assured stating as fully as possible the nature, extent, and duration of the injuries, and the cause of death, and shall produce all documents necessary to prove their title as such legal representatives, and shall furnish all such other information and evidence as the directors may require from time to time, or may consider necessary or proper to elucidate the case.

“(6) In all the above-mentioned cases, the certificates, information, and evidence to be given shall be at the expense of the assured, and shall be in such forms and of such nature as the company may prescribe.”

Ballantine, who was twenty-seven years of age at the time of his death, No. 58. and was unmarried, was a strongly-built man, about 6 feet in height, to outward appearance of a very vigorous constitution, and was a good swimmer. He had gone to Dalmally for some days' fishing, and on the 30th September he left the hotel to fish for salmon in a pool on the Orchy called the Elbow and Treepool. The day was raw and cold, and the river was 4 or 5 feet above its usual height, was running rapidly, and was very cold owing to the melting of snow on the hills. Mr Ballantine put on waders for the first time, as it appeared, in his life. The waders which he put on were trouser waders, coming up to the chest and fastened round his waist by a rope. They were not his own, and as the brogues belonging to them were somewhat too small for him, he put on the waders next his bare feet. He fished down the pool during the forenoon, and, after taking luncheon, was in the course of fishing the pool a second time. Peter MacGregor, the ghillie attending him, gave this account of what then took place,—“While I was preparing an extra cast, I heard a scream, and turned round and saw Mr Ballantine falling in the river, slanting backward. He made a movement with his legs, and that movement of his legs pushed him into the rapids. The moment his legs made the movement, the current caught him and carried him into the rapids. His head got up in the rapids once, and then he disappeared. At the point where Mr Ballantine was fishing the water was going pretty fast, and he was near the place which I have described as the rapids. When he disappeared I had nothing but a short gaff, and I could do nothing with it to help. . . . After Mr Ballantine's head disappeared it reappeared in the eddy, and he gave a low scream, but not so loud as the first one. I heard it quite well, however. Mr Ballantine called out again, but it was a very low scream or gurgle,—more of a gurgle. . . . I kept opposite to Mr Ballantine while he was being carried down the river. In the stream he was carried down very fast. . . . While Mr Ballantine was in the eddy I thought that he was swimming towards me. . . . When I thought that Mr Ballantine was swimming towards the tree I think his eyes were open, but I don't think there was any recognition in his face at that time. He looked flushed and red in the face. . . . About 30 yards below the eddy he appeared again for a minute, and his head turned round, and then he disappeared. . . . That was the last I saw of him. . . . From the time Mr Ballantine fell into the water till I lost sight of him would just be about three minutes altogether, as far as I could judge. Cross.—. . . The gravel bottom on which Mr Ballantine stood is one that gives a good rough footing, if there are no rocks. There were nails in the brogues which Mr Ballantine had on. I had seen the under surface of the brogues, and they were in good condition. At the time he fell into the water he was standing at the edge of what I call the rapids. (Q.) At the point where he was actually standing I suppose it would be comparatively slack water? (A.) No, it was a running stream; it was slack at the edge. He was not standing in the run of the stream. He could not have stood where the stream was most rapid. . . . The depth of the water in the centre of the run would be 6 or 7 feet. The bottom sloped gradually from the point where Mr Ballantine was standing to the centre of the run. At the place where Mr Ballantine fell the water would be fully 2½ feet in depth. As far as I could see he was standing in a perfectly safe place. It was a peculiar scream which Mr Ballantine gave—an undecipherable sort of scream. (Q.) Was it a death-like scream? (A.) A death-like scream, or like one falling in an epileptic fit, or the like of that. (Q.) It was not like a strong, healthy man shouting for assistance? (A.) There was no intelligence in the scream. My impression was that he was in sudden agony. The second scream which he gave vent to was of the same nature, but lower. There would not be half a minute between the time when he gave the first and second scream. (Q.) A few seconds? (A.) A few seconds. From the time he gave the first scream until he was in the eddy and gave the low gurgle which I have described would be a minute and a-half, or thereabout."

Robert Macdonald, a ghillie who was in attendance on a Mr Radcliffe on the opposite side of the pool, and was on the bank about 250 yards above the point where Mr Ballantine fell in, substantially corroborated MacGregor's evidence, but deponed,—“I could not describe the cry which he gave more than just as an ordinary shout. (Q.) Was it not much more like a scream of a man in pain? (A.) It might—one taking fright, or the like of that. (Q.) In fright or pain? (A.) But I did not observe that at the time. I was 250 yards away, but I heard it quite plainly."

The body was found two days afterwards (2d October) in a pool about 300 yards below the point at which Mr Ballantine fell in. John Ferguson, the defenders' inspector, was present, and Dr Ebenezer Duncan deponed that on 3d October "Mr Ferguson reported to me what he had learned of the circumstances under which the death of Mr Ballantine had occurred. Having heard that report, I advised that I did not think it was possible for any person to be certain of the cause of death in this case, and consequently I thought it necessary to have a post-mortem examination to ascertain what the cause of death was. It was arranged that I should telegraph to Dr Allan."

Accordingly Dr Duncan, on the same day, sent the following telegram to Dr Allan:—"As medical adviser of the Accident Company where Ballantine insured, am asked to certify death as from accident; for this post-mortem examination necessary; will you see friends? arrange for to-morrow, and wire to-night time fixed."

Dr Allan replied,—“Have seen friends, and your proposal is refused."

Dr Allan deponed that before sending off this telegram he consulted Mr Cleminson and Mr Scott, two intimate friends of the deceased, but not related to him, and that he did not consult Mrs Ballantine,—“I considered it an unnecessary piece of cruelty to inform Mrs Ballantine anything about it. She had very strong feelings on the matter. She expressed herself before the body was found as dreading that there would be any mutilation. I knew her feeling as regards that, and I told her nothing about the proposal. She was suffering dreadful anguish at the time."

It was not disputed that Mrs Ballantine was never asked personally to consent to a post-mortem examination.

On 4th October the defenders' manager wrote as follows to Messrs John Emslie & Guthrie, solicitors, Ardrossan:—"Referring to telegram sent yesterday by Dr Duncan to Dr Allan, I have now to intimate to you that from the information we have, we are of opinion that death did not occur by accident within the scope of our policy. The only means of ascertaining whether it did or did not is by post-mortem examination, and we have therefore to repeat our request, before it be too late, that you will consent to a post-mortem examination, and that our medical adviser be present, otherwise we shall be obliged to found upon your refusal. Meantime we must repudiate all liability under our policy."

Messrs John Emslie & Guthrie replied next day,—“When we intimated on 1st inst. the accident to your office, we did so in the ordinary way, as agents for your company. We had no instructions from Mr Ballantine's representatives to do so, and the terms and tone of your letter were surprising . . . We have no power to consent to a post-mortem examination. No. 58.

The letter of the 1st here referred to was a letter sent by John Emslie & Guthrie to the defenders, intimating Mr Ballantine's death. Mr Emslie and Mr Guthrie both deponed that they had sent their letter as local agents for the defenders, through whom the policy had been effected; that they were agents for the Ayrshire Foundry Company, Limited, of which Mr Ballantine had been chairman, but that they were not his own agents; and that, although they became Mrs Ballantine's agents on the 7th October (two days after the funeral) they were not her agents, and had no authority to act for her before that.

Dec. 15, 1898.
Ballantine v.
Emslie & Guthrie
Employers' Insurance Co. of Great Britain,
Limited.

After Messrs John Emslie & Guthrie became Mrs Ballantine's agents some correspondence followed between them and the defenders, from which it, inter alia, appeared that the defenders desired to make the present case a test case on the question of their right to demand a post-mortem examination. (See letter quoted in Lord Young's opinion.) They made no request for the exhumation of the body.

Dr Allan, who was present when the body was recovered, deponed,—“When he was lifted out of the river the froth came from his mouth and nostrils. I had no doubt that the cause of death was drowning. (Q.) Was that manifest to anyone of ordinary skill who saw him? (A.) It was the natural inference. (Q.) I believe you looked at the body more minutely in the hotel? (A.) I may say only the face; I did not see him undressed. (Q.) You know the peculiar appearance which drowned people have, what is called goose-skin? (A.) I did not see that, but I inquired afterwards, and I found that he had it. Assuming that that was present, that confirms my opinion that death occurred by drowning. I think that the froth coming from the nostrils and mouth is a certain sign of death by drowning. That is caused by attempted breathing—water being drawn into the lungs and mixed with the air already in the lungs.”

Professor T. R. Fraser, of Edinburgh University, deponed that he had examined Mr Ballantine for the Standard Life Assurance Company about three weeks before his death, and that “personally he was a good life.” He further deponed that he had “no doubt that he died of drowning. No other suggestion occurs to me with regard to the cause of death which would be reasonable. . . . With regard to the suggestions which have been made, and taking first the case of epilepsy, the circumstances seem to me entirely against anything of the sort. I take into account particularly the two screams, subsequent to the assumed attack, shewing that he was not unconscious in the water. With regard to the suggested possibility of death from aneurism, I have no doubt that I should have discovered some evidence of aneurism if it had been present. As regards angina pectoris, I give entirely the same answer. In the first place, it is most improbable in a man of his years, and I should have found some sign of it when I examined him. With regard to the suggestion of apoplexy, he would not have screamed when he fell into the water, and at his age apoplexy would be caused by some diseased condition of the blood vessels, which I should certainly have found when I examined him. . . . Cross.—(Q.) Where a question is raised as to what has caused death, a post-mortem is the proper way of ascertaining an answer to that question? (A.) Not when it can be answered otherwise. I should think a post-mortem would be regarded as the last resort. If it is entirely doubtful what a man has died of, the proper course to follow is to have a post-mortem. (Q.) Do you not think that in this case it was doubtful to a certain extent, however small, whether Mr Ballantine died of drowning or whether he died of something else, and was then swept down the stream? (A.) There is absolutely no doubt in my mind, and I do not think there is any possibility of a doubt about it. My view is that if there had been a post-mortem it would not have added any more certainty to what we already possessed. I think that sometimes the post-mortem appearances in drowning are very uncertain."

Dr Joseph Bell gave evidence to substantially the same effect as regarded the cause of death, but stated in cross-examination,—“It would have been far better had he been examined post mortem.”

On the other hand, Dr Byrom Bramwell deponed, as a witness adduced by the defenders,—“I have read the deposition upon oath by MacGregor, the ghillie. . . . Having the circumstances disclosed in the statement before me, I should certainly have thought it proper to have had a post-mortem examination. My reason for saying that is, that I think there were circumstances connected with the death which suggested that perhaps it was not merely due to drowning as one would at first sight suppose. (Q.) If such a post-mortem examination had been made, could it have been ascertained with certainty what was the cause of death? (A.) It might have been. There are some diseases which kill suddenly which would produce the same post-mortem appearance as drowning—for example, epilepsy; but in other cases you may find a definite cause distinct from drowning. . . . I think there are several conditions which might cause sudden or rapid death, and which might be consistent with the facts as I know them, although I must say I do not think that many of them are very likely, looking to the whole circumstances as disclosed in MacGregor's evidence; and putting drowning aside, I think that the rupture of a deep-seated aneurism would be one of the most likely things to cause such a death. (Q.) Is it consistent with your experience that death may be caused by the rupture of an aneurism which has not been detected, and which it was not possible to detect by an ordinary external examination, such as that made by the medical officer examining for a life insurance company? (A.) That is a fact that one is constantly meeting with; it is a well-recognised fact that there are some aneurisms of the aorta so small or so deeply situated that it is impossible to detect them, and they give rise to no definite and distinct symptoms. I have stated that in my book on the heart . . . It is not an opinion just made for the moment, but it is a well-recognised fact which is in print and acknowledged. . . . In such a case as I have just been referring to death sometimes takes place very rapidly, and at other times more slowly. (Q.) Would it be consistent with death from that cause that a man should have given a death-like scream before falling into the water, then immediately afterwards on emerging with his head from the water, another lower scream, and within half a minute or thereby a gurgle? (A.) I think it is possible that he might have done so. (Q.) Is it possible that in the case of death from certain forms of apoplexy a man may also emit cries? (A.) Certainly in some forms of cerebral hemorrhage death occurs very slowly. The popular idea is that the man falls down unconscious, but in the case of cerebral hemorrhage that is quite erroneous, as that is an exceptional mode of commencement. (Q.) He may be in a conscious or semi-conscious condition for a short time after being seized with the attack? (A.) He may be in a conscious condition from some hours. . . .” Dr Bramwell also deponed that angina pectoris might also have conceivably accounted for the death, but that at the same time the serious form of angina pectoris was very uncommon under forty years of age. By the Court.—“Looking to this young man's age, his apparent strength, and the fact of his examination by so careful a man as Professor Fraser three weeks before, would the chances be very much against his having any of the diseases you have mentioned? (A.) Certainly." No. 58.

Dr Duncan and Dr Grainger Stewart gave evidence to a similar effect. Dec. 15, 1893.
Ballantine v. Employers' Insurance Co. of Great Britain, Limited.

On 16th June 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Stormonth-Darling) decreed against the defenders.*

* "OPINION.—I gather from the correspondence that the main object of the defenders in resisting this claim was to test what they call the principle of whether they were within their right in demanding a post-mortem examination of the body of the late Mr Ballantine, and whether the refusal to allow that examination has the effect of forfeiting the pursuer's claim. If that was their object all I can say is that they have selected a very unfortunate case as a test, because, where an insurance company intends to make a demand of this kind, and to found on the refusal of it as importing a forfeiture of the right to recover, it is incumbent upon them to be very careful indeed that they make the demand on the right person. I say nothing against the view that the demand was in itself one which ought to have been granted. There is no condition in the policy obliging the representatives to allow a post-mortem examination, but they are bound to furnish all such information and evidence as the directors may require, and it is always a question for the Court to say whether the evidence so required was reasonably necessary or not. I can figure cases of death by accident where it would be unreasonable to demand a post-mortem examination. Here, however, I think there were circumstances which made it not unreasonable for the insurance company to make the demand which they did. A post-mortem examination, however painful—although I think its painfulness has been greatly exaggerated—would have undoubtedly furnished the best and most conclusive evidence on the question whether death was the result of accident or of natural disease.

"But, as I have said, the question is whether the demand was made on the right person. Now, what happened was this: A demand was first made upon 3d October, in the interval between the death and the funeral, and it was made by Dr Duncan of Glasgow, the medical adviser of the company, by telegram addressed to Dr Allan, the medical attendant of the Ballantine family. It was perhaps a natural enough proceeding for the one doctor to communicate with the other, but it is impossible to say that Dr Allan was in any way an agent of the pursuer in this case, or was entitled to grant or refuse the permission asked. Dr Allan thought the request unreasonable, and refused even to lay it before the pursuer. He took it upon him to send a telegram, which was undoubtedly misleading, to the effect that he had seen the friends, and that the friends refused. For any misstatement of that sort, if it did mislead the defenders, Dr Allan may have to answer, but certainly the pursuer cannot be fixed with liability. I do not think it can be said that the defenders were in any way misled or injured by Dr Allan's reply, for the matter did not rest there. A second demand was made, and this time it was made by the defenders themselves on the firm of John Emslie & Guthrie, solicitors in Ardrossan. Now, if John Emslie & Guthrie had at that time occupied the position of law-agents for the pursuer, which they did a few days afterwards, the pursuer might have been bound by their answer, but in point of fact they did not occupy that position. They had, it is true, acted as law-agents for a company in which the late Mr Ballantine was interested, and of which he was chairman; but that was the extent of their connection with the family, and that apparently is what misled the defenders into the belief that they were the agents for the pursuer. Clearly, therefore, the demand made on them cannot in any sense of the word be held as a demand made on the pursuer.

"It happens in this particular case that the course for the defenders to take, if they meant to found upon their demand, was a very plain one. The pursuer, who was the mother of the unfortunate gentleman, was not only the person entitled to make the claim on them, but she was the only person in the world who had any right either to grant or refuse the permission to make a post-mortem examination. She was the only near relative that the late Mr Ballantine had, and it was impossible, therefore, for anybody to grant or to refuse the permission without coming to her. It may be that the defenders were actuated by consideration for her feelings in not making their application direct, but unquestionably to her the application must in the long run have come, and if they did not choose to make the application direct, then I think it is quite clear they took upon themselves the responsibility of selecting the intermediary, and if they selected the wrong intermediary they must suffer the consequences. The only other person who can be suggested as having been in any way entitled to bind the pursuer was Mr Cleminson, a witness in the case, who, though no relation, seems to have been on the most intimate and confidential terms with the family, and indeed to have lived in the house. He was consulted by Dr Allan, and agreed in Dr Allan's view. I do not doubt that authority might very likely have been given to Mr Cleminson to act in this matter on behalf of the pursuer, if the necessity for granting that authority had arisen, but it is impossible to say that such authority was ever in point of fact given, and I cannot certainly imply it merely from the friendly relations which are proved to have existed between that gentleman and the pursuer of this action.

"That being so, I approach the consideration of the second question in the case upon the footing that no post-mortem examination was in point of fact held, and that the pursuer is not responsible for that, because the demand for it was never made on her. That this most lamentable event bore all the outward semblance of a case of death by drowning cannot for a moment be disputed. The late Mr Ballantine was a man in the prime of life, of the most energetic and buoyant spirit, of temperate habits, and apparently of a very powerful muscular frame. He was certainly the last person in the world of whom one would have expected either an accidental death without a great struggle, or a sudden death from natural causes. There is therefore undoubtedly a certain air of mystery about the occurrence, because it is difficult to account for so powerful a man having been overwhelmed by the stream of the Orchy, and for his having apparently not made so vigorous an effort to save himself as one would have expected. On the other hand, it is a most improbable thing that a man of his temperament and constitution should have been suddenly seized with a fatal affection either of the heart or head while fishing in this Highland stream, and that is really the only suggestion which is made by the defenders. Even although it were proved that Mr Ballantine had fainted in the stream, or had taken an epileptic fit in the stream, that would not absolve the defenders from liability, if it was not a seizure of a necessarily fatal kind. Their only case is that he was suddenly seized with what would have proved fatal, even if he had been on dry land, and that the circumstance of his being in the water was a mere accident, which did not in any way affect the result. Now, I have to choose between these two theories. On the one hand, I have evidence which is admitted, even by the very eminent physicians who were examined for the defenders, as pointing straight to the inference of death by drowning. They all say that that is the natural conclusion from the facts of the case, but they say, on the other hand, that there are certain medical possibilities which did, in their judgment, make the demand for a post-mortem examination reasonable, and which a post-mortem examination would in all likelihood have effectually disposed of.

"Now, the doubt in the case arises chiefly from the evidence of the ghillie MacGregor, and I shall only say of him that, while I saw no reason to doubt the honesty of his evidence, I was not equally impressed with his intelligence, and I demur very much to setting up a most improbable theory, as the defenders' case involves, upon the strength of an impression formed by this Highland ghillie. He did undoubtedly say that his impression at the time was that the deceased gentleman had taken an epileptic fit. That is excluded by all the and recover under it. The 5th condition made it incumbent on the representatives of the insured to furnish all such information and evidence as the directors might require or consider necessary and proper to elucidate the case. That included a post-mortem examination, provided that such an examination was reasonably necessary looking to the whole circumstances known to the company at the time the demand for the examination was made, and provided that the demand was made in the proper quarter. The first proviso had here been satisfied. Looking to the evidence of MacGregor and the whole circumstances attending the death, it could not well be said that the demand for a post-mortem examination was unreasonable. Then the demand had been made in the proper quarter. It was admitted that no demand had been made to Mrs Ballantine personally, but that in the circumstances was unnecessary. It was a natural and proper course for the defenders' doctor to communicate to the family doctor the fact that the defenders desired that there should be a post-mortem examination, and ask him to place the request before the friends of the deceased. The defenders could not be expected to know who were the legal representatives of the deceased, for that depended on his testamentary arrangements. When, then, Dr Duncan had communicated with Dr Allan, and had heard from him that the friends had refused to allow a post-mortem examination, the defenders were entitled to found on that as a proper intimation of a refusal. The defenders had also made a similar request to Messrs John Emslie & Guthrie. No doubt, as it now appeared, they were not at the time the agents either of Mrs Bal-doctors as untenable, and his evidence of the cry having been of a strange and death-like kind is inconsistent with the evidence of the other ghillie, Macdonald, who says the cry was only an ordinary shout. I cannot help thinking that to some extent the theory put forward by MacGregor—for it is really nothing more—may owe its origin to the fact that, through no fault of his own, he was unable to render assistance to his companion, and that it is painful for him to think that death was due to an accidental cause which he was powerless to avert. But if his opinion be discounted from the case, there is really nothing left except bare possibility and conjecture. I acknowledge that it is a little difficult to account for the fact that Mr Ballantine, who was a good swimmer, did not apparently make more strenuous efforts to save himself than he did. At the same time anyone who has used waders in a Highland stream must know how easy it is to slip, and, if one is carried into deep water, what an encumbrance and a danger the waders must be. In this case the danger was increased by Mr Ballantine being unaccustomed to the use of waders, and there may have been some stroke against a stone or a rock which would tend still further to deprive him of the use of his limbs. All that, of course is speculation; but the fact is, that he was using waders, that he was unfamiliar with the use of them, that in the effort to get further into the stream he appeared to lose his balance, and that he was carried into deep water. All the rest is entirely consistent with the idea of accident, and there is nothing to drive one into so improbable a theory as that of a sudden and fatal seizure. But what really I think excludes the latter notion from practical consideration, and puts the case beyond reasonable doubt, is the fact that only three weeks before, this gentleman was examined by one of the most competent and careful physicians in Scotland, and passed, as a good life, for the Standard Life Insurance Company. It is possible that, in spite of Professor Fraser's examination, he may have had some of these deadly diseases which are suggested by the medical witnesses for the defenders, but it is in the highest degree unlikely, and I must proceed not on possibilities, but on the reasonable inferences to be drawn from the evidence in the case. In short, I regard the evidence in favour of death by drowning as really overwhelming. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the pursuer has made out her case, and is entitled to decree as concluded for."

lantine or of Mr Ballantine; but their connection with the family was sufficiently intimate to make the request to them equivalent to a request to Mrs Ballantine. The defenders therefore fell to be assoilzied, the pursuer having failed to fulfil a condition precedent to her right to recover. But (2) assuming that the defenders failed on this ground, the onus was on the pursuer to prove her case, and she could not be held to have discharged this onus if she declined, or failed, to adduce evidence, which it was in her power, but not in the power of the defenders, to adduce. If, indeed, the evidence otherwise shewed that a post-mortem examination would have been wholly unnecessary, the pursuer would have proved her case; but if there was a reasonable doubt, as to whether the cause of death was disease or was accident, which would, or might, have been removed by a post-mortem examination (and the evidence shewed that here), then, as there had been no post-mortem examination, the pursuer's case failed.

Argued for the pursuer;—The evidence here shewed that Mr Ballantine's death was due to accidental drowning, and not to disease, and shewed further that no other conclusion would have been reached even had there been a post-mortem examination. The evidence adduced by the defenders came to no more than this, that there was a medical possibility that the death was due to disease—a possibility which must be regarded as of the slightest, looking to Professor Fraser's evidence. Therefore, apart from the defenders' argument on the 5th condition of the policy, the pursuer must be held to have established her case. The defenders misconstrued the 5th condition. Under that condition the representatives of the deceased were required to "furnish information and evidence"; that meant information and evidence which the representatives might happen to possess, and did not include permission to make a post-mortem examination. If the defenders intended that it should be a condition precedent of the right to recover under the policy that the representatives should allow a post-mortem examination whenever the directors thought it reasonable to demand one, that ought to have been made an express condition of the policy. In any case the Lord Ordinary's ground of judgment was well founded and was sufficient, for no demand for a post-mortem examination had been made to the pursuer or to anyone authorised to represent her.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—This is an action upon a policy of insurance against accident for recovery of the sum which is payable in the event of the death of the person insured through accident, and it is based on the ground that the person insured lost his life through accidental drowning.

The action is defended upon two grounds, each of which is embodied in a plea in law. The first is in these terms :—" (1) The pursuer having failed to comply with the conditions of the policy, which were thereby declared conditions precedent to her right to sue or recover under the same, the defenders should be assoilzied "; and the second is this :—" (2) Separatim, The pursuer's son not having met his death from accident within the meaning of the policy founded on, the defenders should be assoilzied, with expenses "; and the case has been argued before us on both these grounds.

With respect to the first plea in law, the defenders make the following averment as to their attitude when they received notice of the accident :—" Explained that the circumstances under which the pursuer's son met his death were so peculiar that the defenders had reason to believe that he died from natural disease, or some other cause against which they do not insure, and not by drowning, as alleged by the pursuer. Their consulting physician, Dr Duncan, No. 58. having had the details, so far as known, laid before him, stated that he could not certify the cause of death as from accident without a post-mortem examination of the deceased's body, and accordingly he wired on 3d October to that effect to Dr Allan, the pursuer's family doctor, and asked him to see the friends and arrange for a post-mortem examination being held the following day. Dr Allan telegraphed back that the deceased's relatives, before whom he had laid Dr Duncan's request, declined to allow of the examination. The defenders at once intimated, by letter, dated 4th October 1892, to the pursuer's agents, that they were of opinion that death did not occur by accident within the scope of the policy, and that the only way of ascertaining whether it did or not was by post-mortem examination. They accordingly repeated their request that the pursuer would consent to a post-mortem examination, and that their medical adviser should be present, otherwise they would found upon the refusal. This request and other requests of the same nature were refused." This averment which is inserted in the answer to the fourth article of the pursuer's condescendence and is somewhat irregularly inserted there—for it ought to have been made the subject of a separate statement of facts—derives any importance which attaches to it from the fifth of the conditions which are indorsed on the policy. That condition is in the following terms :—" (5) In the case of death, the legal representatives of the assured must deliver to the company a certificate from the medical attendant of the assured, stating as fully as possible the nature, extent, and duration of the injuries, and the cause of death, and shall produce all documents necessary to prove their title as such legal representatives, and shall furnish all such other information and evidence as the directors may require from time to time, or may consider necessary or proper to elucidate the case."

Now, it appears that the only near relative of the deceased was his mother, with whom the deceased, who was a young man and a bachelor, resided at the time when he met his death, and she is now his legal representative, and is the pursuer of this action. The averment is that the requests were made by the defenders to the pursuer to allow a post-mortem examination to be made. Evidence was led in the Outer-House in regard to these requests, and upon that evidence the Lord Ordinary has decided that the persons to whom these requests for a post-mortem examination before burial were made, namely, Dr Allan and Messrs John Emalie & Guthrie, did not, as agents or otherwise, represent the mother of the deceased, and therefore that these requests made to them do not affect her. The Lord Ordinary has in consequence rejected the first plea in law for the defenders as unsound.

It appeared to the Lord Ordinary, from some of the correspondence produced, that the directors of the insurance company desired to make this a test case upon the question of principle, whether the company under their policy are entitled to call for a post-mortem examination in any case in which they think fit to do so, and if the request is refused, to decline to pay the sum in the policy. In a letter dated 14th November 1892, written to Messrs John Emalie & Guthrie, who by that time had come to be the agents of the pursuer, the manager of the company says,—“My directors have been anxious to get the fullest information as to their possible liability in connection with this claim, and I have communicated with the managers of a number of similar companies on the subject. The directors have no wish to cavil or bargain, but feel that there is here involved an important question of principle. They are therefore inclined to make it a test case, and under the circumstances I hardly care to entertain any compromise such as you seem to suggest." The meaning of that is, that the directors wish to have the question determined whether having regard to the 5th condition attached to the policy, and to the evidence as to the requests, the company are free from liability, although it might appear to our satisfaction on the evidence otherwise that the death of the deceased had occurred through accidental drowning within the meaning of the policy.

Now, it is certainly sufficient for the determination of that question, if the view of the Lord Ordinary is right, that neither Dr Allan nor Messrs Emalie & Guthrie were the proper persons to whom the application to allow a post-mortem examination should have been made. If the company intended to plead the refusal to allow a post-mortem examination as a defence to the action, and to make it a test case, they ought to have been careful to make the application to the right persons. In this case I think that they had no excuse for any error, for it appears that they certainly had information as to the existence of the mother of the deceased, and also that they knew that she was the proper, or indeed the only, person who could give the necessary authority, yet it is plain that they did not approach her personally with their request. It is said that they did not do so from a desire not to intrude upon her grief, and I have no doubt that that is so, but as a matter of fact they did not approach her personally, and if the company chose the wrong intermediary to convey their request to her, I think, with the Lord Ordinary, that they must take the consequences. I am further disposed to agree with the Lord Ordinary that no request to allow a post-mortem examination was made to any person for whom the pursuer is responsible, or whose words and actings were binding on her in this matter. I do not think that it is proved that she would have assented to or approved of the request if it had been made to her—there is indeed evidence that she would not—but I think that it is proved that she was not approached upon the matter, and that she neither gave nor withheld her assent to the proposal. I therefore think that the Lord Ordinary was right in coming to the conclusion to which he did, that the evidence does not support the defenders' first plea in law.

In this view it is not necessary that we should decide anything as to the right of the company, under their 5th condition, to demand a post-mortem examination, but although I do not think it necessary for us to decide that question, I have no objection to express my opinion upon it. In my opinion it is not according to the true reading of the 5th condition that the insurance office may demand a post-mortem examination and may refuse to pay the sum in the policy, if that demand is not complied with and we are not satisfied on the evidence that the demand was unreasonable as at the date when it was made, and considering that the company's doctor "having had the details, so far as known, laid before him, stated that he could not certify the cause of death as from accident without a post-mortem examination." I am not prepared to affirm the proposition that under this condition we must decline to enter into any inquiry as to the cause of the death if it appears that a request for a post-mortem examination has been made and refused, even although the demand was made not unreasonably upon the details so far as known and laid before the medical officer. The fact that a demand was made and refused may influence us in reaching a conclusion as to the cause of death. I shall explain what I mean when I say that it may influence us. I think that the course taken in the Outer-House of allowing evidence to be led on the whole cause, to enable the Court to know the whole circumstances attending the death of the insured and so to judge as to the cause of death, was the proper course; and I am of opinion that the evidence which was led shews that the death of the insured was caused by drowning, and shews it to the exclusion of all reasonable doubt. But if the evidence had appeared to me to suggest a reasonable doubt as to the cause of death, which a post-mortem examination would, or might, have cleared up, and ought to have been resorted to to clear up, then I should have come to the conclusion that the case of the pursuer had not been proved; and in reaching this conclusion I should take into consideration the fact that a request for a post-mortem examination was made and was refused. But in this case I repeat that, in my opinion, the import of the evidence is overwhelming to the effect that the death of the insured was due to drowning. I can see no reasonable ground for doubt or suspicion which a post-mortem examination might have removed.

Ballantine v.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the first plea in law for the defenders is ill-founded, because the evidence shews that no demand for a post-mortem examination was ever made to the pursuer, and the second, because I think that it is proved that the death of the insured was due to accidental drowning.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I think that it is proved beyond all doubt that the deceased died by accidental drowning.

It is said that the defenders demanded a post-mortem examination, and that the pursuer was bound to furnish it as a condition precedent to her recovery under the policy. It is a sufficient answer that the defenders did not demand it from the pursuer or from any person entitled to represent her. But I may add that if the demand had been made, I have the gravest doubt whether the defenders were under the 5th condition entitled to make it. It was to my mind an unreasonable demand.

LORD TRAYNER.—I am of opinion that the proof in this case establishes beyond reasonable doubt that the late Mr Ballantine met his death through accidental drowning, and that no evidence of the cause of death which the defenders could reasonably demand was refused to them. I offer no opinion on the question whether the construction put by the defenders on the 5th condition indorsed on the policy is or is not sound, but I agree in thinking that even if that contention were affirmed, the defenders can take no advantage from it, because, as the Lord Ordinary has found, the demand made by them for a post-mortem examination was not made or addressed to the deceased's legal representatives.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK was absent.

THE COURT adhered.

MARY ANDERSON, Pursuer.—Comrie Thomson—Abel.
GLASGOW TRAMWAY AND OMNIBUS COMPANY, LIMITED, Defenders.—
Jameson—Wilton.

Reparation—Personal injury—Contract—Hired vehicle—Responsibility of hirer for fault of owner.—The hirer of a driver and vehicle is not responsible for an accident occasioned by the fault of the driver.

By contract with the post-office officials a tramway company agreed to supply drivers, horses, and vans for the conveyance of officials, mails, &c., from the post-office to a railway station. If the post-office district surveyor disapproved of any of the drivers, it was agreed that the company should be bound, on good cause shewn, to remove them and substitute others to be approved by the surveyor. The drivers were to be bound to start at such times and travel by such routes as the surveyor appointed.

A woman was injured by a hamper falling from one of the company's lorries, which was being driven by one of the company's servants by direction of a post-office official, who was on the lorry, to the railway station. She raised an action against the tramway company. When the case came before a jury it was proved that the accident was caused by the fault of the driver. The defenders asked the presiding Judge to direct the jury that, if they were of opinion that the driver was under the orders of and subject to the control of the post-office, and that he was driving the lorry in furtherance of a special order and direction given by a post-office official, the defenders were not liable for the fault of the driver in consequence of his complying with such special order and direction. The Judge refused the direction. The Court refused a bill of exceptions, on the ground that the driver was not subject to the orders and control of the post-office so as to relieve the tramway company from responsibility for the accident which was caused by the fault of their servant.

1st Division.
Lord Low.

MRS MARY ANDERSON raised an action in the Court of Session against the Glasgow Tramway and Omnibus Company, Limited, concluding for £1000 damages for personal injury.

The pursuer averred that, on 23d December 1892, while entering the Glasgow Central Railway Station from Gordon Street by the footpath alongside the carriageway she was struck and severely injured by a hamper which fell from a lorry passing into the station; that the lorry and horses belonged to the defenders; and that the driver was their servant.

The defenders admitted that the lorry and horses belonged to them, but averred that, at the time of the accident, the lorry was loaded with post-office baskets, that a post-office official was on the lorry, and that the driver of the lorry was under the control of this official.

The defenders pleaded that the pursuer was not injured through the fault of anyone for whom they were responsible.

On 18th July 1893 the case was tried before a jury, on an issue whether the pursuer was injured in her person through the fault of the defenders?

It appeared from the evidence that the defenders had entered into a contract, terminable on six months' notice by either party, with the post-office authorities in Glasgow, under which the company undertook to carry post-office officials, mails, and parcels between the chief post-office in Glasgow and the various railway stations, &c., in Glasgow, and to provide for the said conveyance drivers, vans, and horses, all as approved by the district surveyor; further, to maintain discipline among the drivers, and to provide them with regulation uniform. The contract then provided,—“That in case the said first party or his successor in office for the time being shall at any time or times, by notice under his hand, signify to the said second party his disapprobation of any of the said conveyances, horses, or drivers, so to be for the time being provided by the said second party, and require the same respectively to be removed or changed, the said second party shall on good cause shewn, and will forthwith, after receiving such notice, dismiss any such driver and change any such conveyance or horse so to be disapproved of as aforesaid, and substitute in lieu of such driver, conveyance, or horse, as the case may be, such other driver, conveyance, or horse, for the purposes aforesaid as shall be approved by the said first party or his successor in office for the time being, and so from time to time, so often as the like case shall happen: That the drivers so to be employed as aforesaid shall start with their conveyances from the several places before mentioned at such time or times, and shall travel between such places by such route, and shall deliver and take up mails on their journey at such place or places as shall from time to time be appointed by the Postmaster-general for the time being." The defenders and the drivers employed by them were also taken bound to obey the rules and regulations relating to the carriage of postmen, letters, &c., as should be signified to them by the post-office authorities.

Anderson v.
Glasgow
Tramway and Omnibus Co.,
Limited.

On 23d December 1892 a load of post-office hampers was put on a lorry belonging to the defenders, to be taken from the post-office to the Central Railway Station. On the lorry, besides the driver, there was a post-office official in charge of the hampers, who directed the driver to go to the covered way outside the station and draw up there.* At the covered way the railway officials told the men who brought the bags to go inside the station to the platform. As they were driving in round a sharp corner one of the wheels ran on to the curb, and several of the hampers were thrown off, one of which injured the pursuer.

There was some evidence that the driver was driving his horses at too great a rate, considering the angle he had to turn.

After the presiding Judge (Lord Low) had charged the jury, the defenders asked him to give the following direction to the jury:—"That if the jury are of opinion, on the evidence, that at the time of the accident William Brannan, the driver of the lorry in question, was under the orders of and subject to the control of the post-office department, and that the accident happened while the said driver was driving the lorry in

* Simmie, the post-office official, deponed,—“I take mails to station. I see to the hampers being put on the right lorries and properly placed. On the 23d December, when I came back from dinner, I found the lorry loaded. Seventeen hampers. There were two rows and a single hamper above that. There were nine on floor of lorry, then two rows of three each, and then two on top. The load was not roped in any way. I was to go to Central Station, and directed driver to go to front entrance. . . . We went to covered entrance to get unloaded there. We drew up at third door from the entrance by which we came into the covered way. . . . The porter told me to drive inside to the platform, and I told driver to go in. He was under my orders. . . .”

Brannan, the driver of the lorry, deponed,—“I was the driver of the lorry when the accident happened. It was loaded with post-office hampers. There were two horses. A post-office official was in charge of the hampers. They were three rows high. They are 4½ feet long. The postmen put on the hampers. I have nothing to do with that. The post-office people do all that. I was told by a postman to drive to Central Station, and to stop outside in the covered way. I am under his orders. I went to covered way, and stopped opposite booking office. The railway people would not take hampers off there, but said that we must go on into station. I had come to a dead stop. We were only about 3 yards from entrance to carriage entrance. That was from horses' heads. I then drove on and saw a lady coming along pavement by Station Hotel, and I shouted to her to stop several times. She stopped when we shouted, and went up the same way as the lorry at the side of the walk. The horses were walking. We could not get on to the trot. Three hampers tumbled off. Can't say about wheels being on curb. I could not see and did not feel it. . . .”

question in furtherance of a special order and direction given to him by a post-office official, the defenders are not liable in law for the fault of the said William Brannan in consequence of his complying with such special order and direction."

Lord Low refused to give the required direction, and the jury thereupon returned a verdict for the pursuer, assessing the damages at £500.

The defenders thereupon presented a bill of exceptions in respect of Lord Low's refusal to give the above direction, and further, moved for a rule on the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence.

The rule having been granted, argued for the pursuer;—The evidence justified a verdict for the pursuer on the ground that the driver was driving too fast. Apart from the special terms of the contract, there could be no doubt that Brannan was the servant of the defenders, and that they were responsible for his fault, and nothing in the contract took the case out of the rule that a person hiring a vehicle and driver was not responsible for the fault of the latter.¹ The driver here was not entirely under the control of the hirer as in Rourke's case,² the vehicle only being let out for the special purpose of taking the hampers to the railway station.

Argued for the defenders;—The evidence of reckless driving was not sufficient to justify the verdict. On the contract the defenders were not liable, as the post-office authorities had the control of the drivers. Both the post-office official who was on the van and the driver himself stated that that was their view of their relative positions. The post-office had almost unbounded control over the drivers, as they could insist on their dismissal if they did not do their duty properly, and the appointment of drivers was subject to their approval.³

LORD PRESIDENT.—If it had been clear on the evidence that the post-office official on this lorry had the control of all its movements I should have thought the verdict wrong. The evidence, however, does not come up to this. Prima facie, the horse and lorry being the property of the defenders, and the driver their servant, it is for the defenders to make out that at the time of the accident he was pro hac vice the servant of the post-office. Now, the written contract with the post-office does not necessarily imply this, and although the statement of the post-office official, "He was under my orders" points to it, yet that statement is not sufficiently precise to conclude the question. In a sense the driver of a hired carriage is under the orders of the hirer, for the driver is bound to drive where the hirer bids him; and yet it is quite settled that this relation between the hirer and the driver does not impose liability on the former. Now, I do not think that the evidence is inconsistent with this, and no more, being the true state of the facts in the present case, and this being a question of fact, it was within the province of the jury. The attention of his Lordship and of the jury was drawn to the point, as appears from the direction asked, and this part of the evidence duly considered.

The direction asked seems to me to have been too vague and ambiguous to have been else than a misleading direction. Applied as it was to a driving case, it might have led the jury into the error of finding for the defenders on the sole ground that the post-office official had the right to name the destination to which he desired the lorry to be driven.

I am therefore for refusing the rule and the bill of exceptions.

LORD ADAM.—The jury in this case returned a verdict for the pursuer, with £500 damages, and from the evidence there can be no doubt that they were of opinion that the accident happened through the fault of Brannan, the driver. Now, Brannan was undoubtedly the servant of the defenders, and prima facie they are responsible for their servant's action. But it is said that at the time Brannan was under the special control and orders of the post-office. Now, in one sense it is true that he was under the orders of the post-office, but I think the evidence shews only in this sense, that the person in charge of the mails or parcels ordered him to drive from the point of entrance to the railway station where he was, round to the platform. But as far as I can see from the evidence, he gave him no orders whatever interfering with or affecting the manner in which he was to go to his destination. We have the contract between the post-office and the defenders, and it is clear from that contract that the position of matters was this, that the contractors agreed to carry the mails and the officials in charge of them, and to provide suitable vehicles for transporting parcels to and from the post-office and stations, and various other places in Glasgow and the neighbourhood. Now, of course, the driver of vehicles so supplied was under the orders of the post-office as to where he was to go. That is clear from the contract, but it is also clear from the contract, so far as I can see, that he was under the orders of the post-office in no other way or degree. Now, it appears to me that, if this accident happened, as I think the evidence shews it did, from the fault of Brannan in carrying out the contract or doing his work for his master—namely in transporting the letters and parcels from one spot to another—it is impossible to shift the responsibility on to the post-office. Therefore, it appears to me that there is no shifting of the onus.

It appears to me that in a case of this kind, where a person hires a horse and van, it is a well-known rule that the hirer will not be involved in responsibility for accidents caused by the hired. I do not see that it makes any difference to the principle whether the hire is for a day or a month, or whether it is or is not in writing. I concur with your Lordship that we should not disturb this verdict.

For the same reasons I think it would have been entirely wrong for the Judge to have charged the jury in the terms in which his Lordship was asked to direct them.

LORD KINNEAR.—I am of the same opinion. The parties are agreed that the accident was caused by the wheel of the defenders' lorry taking the curb as it went into the station. That being so, the first question of fact which arose for the consideration of the jury was whether the accident was due to want of skill or care on the part of the driver Brannan, or whether it was the inevitable consequence of his attempt to enter the station under the direction of the post-office messenger who was in charge of the parcels with which the lorry was loaded. Now, there certainly was evidence before the jury in support of the affirmative of the first of these questions, and perhaps the evidence of Brannan was as strong as any other proof could be. That at all events was a question for the jury.

Anderson v.
Glasgow
Tramway and Omnibus Co.,
Limited.

No. 59. If, however, the accident was caused by Brannan's error in driving, then the question came to be whether Brannan was or was not the servant of the defenders, so as to make them liable for his fault, and that depends upon the meaning of their contract with the post-office, for, if they had not only hired out their lorry to the post-office, but had also transferred the entire control of their drivers and other servants to the post-office authorities, then the driver must be held to have become a servant of the post-office, which would in that case be liable for his acts in the course of his employment. But I concur with your Lordships that that is not the true effect and meaning of the contract between the Tramway Company and the post-office. In so far as it depends upon the written contract it seems to be clear enough that what the defenders undertook to do was simply to convey or cause to be conveyed these mails, and to provide the post-office with a sufficient number of good and substantial vans, brakes, and mail-carts under the charge of steady and sober drivers, not being under eighteen years of age, subject to the approval of the post-office authorities. Their obligation in the first place was to supply the conveyances and drivers, and the contract goes on to provide that the company shall maintain due discipline among the said drivers, and shall be responsible for their clothing and for the horses and harness. That shews that the company were the direct masters of the drivers in charge of the conveyances in question. There is a further stipulation in favour of the post-office authorities, that, if they disapprove of any of the conveyances, horses, or drivers, they shall be entitled to require the same to be removed or changed, and that the company shall on due cause shewn, and after due notice, dismiss any such driver. That is not a condition that the post-office should have control of the drivers at all, but that, if any driver acted wrongly, or if they were dissatisfied with any driver, they should complain of him to the company, who upon cause shewn that the complaint was justified should dismiss him. It appears to me, therefore, that there is no ground for saying that the control of the Tramway Company's servant was transferred from them to the post-office. Nor was there any evidence before the jury to enable them to come to that conclusion. I think there is only one passage in the evidence upon which an argument to that effect might be founded. But it was for the jury under the direction of the Judge to consider what was the true meaning of that evidence. It appears to me, that upon the evidence before them they were justified in holding that at the time of the accident Brannan was the servant of the tramway company, and that the error, whatever it may have been, was committed in the course of his employment by them. I entirely concur with your Lordships that, if that is so, the direction which the learned Judge was asked to give was not proper. But apart altogether from the question of fact, I think the direction itself would have been altogether misleading. The language in which it is expressed would not have been sufficient explanation to the jury of what was the true legal formula upon which the Judge refused to give that direction.

LORD LOW.—I concur in the view stated by Lord Adam.

Main v.

Process—Sheriff—Appeal—Competency—Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 33), sections 60, 61, and 150.—The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, section 61, provides that “if any difference arise respecting the kind” or number of the accommodation works which a railway company is bound to make, or respecting their maintenance, “the same shall be determined by the Sheriff or two Justices. . . .”

Held that no appeal lies to the Court of Session against a determination of a Sheriff-substitute under this section.

THOMAS MAIN, market gardener, Milton, near Bowling, and the Lanark-shire and Dumbartonshire Railway Company, having differed as to the accommodation works to be provided for Main's flower and fruit garden under the Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, Main presented a petition under the statute * in the Sheriff Court at Dumbarton, praying the Sheriff to determine the matter in dispute.

Stirling, Dumbarton, and Clackmannan.

The Railway Company lodged answers, but no record was made up.

The Sheriff-substitute (Gebbie), accompanied by Mr William Robertson, civil engineer, Glasgow, visited the ground, and having met the parties on the ground, heard their explanations.

On 9th August 1893, the Sheriff-substitute pronounced an interlocutor determining the accommodation works which the Railway Company were to make, and ordained the works to be commenced within thirty days, and to be executed with nine months.

The Railway Company appealed to the Court of Session.

At the hearing, the respondent objected to the competency of the appeal, and it was argued for him;—The Sheriff-substitute here was acting in his administrative and not in his judicial capacity, and the Court of Session could not review his determination.¹

Argued for the appellants;—The Sheriff-substitute had not been called upon, as in Strain's case,¹ to exercise his administrative function. He was acting judicially. It was competent then to come to the Supreme Court in the ordinary way to have his judgment reviewed. Where, as here, a new civil jurisdiction was conferred upon the Sheriff by statute with a power to judge in special matters, it was conferred subject to all the usual rights of appeal to the Supreme Court unless the contrary was expressly provided.² No stronger examples could be found of the soundness of this proposition than the undernoted cases on the Bankruptcy Statutes.³ Even where a statute contained the expression

Main v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

LORD ADAM.—The question is whether this appeal is competent. I may point out, in the first place, that the proceedings in question are entirely statutory, with regard to which the Court of Session has no original jurisdiction at all. The parties could not possibly have come to us in the first instance to have the matter of these accommodation works determined between them, and that fact at once distinguishes this case from the case of Marr, 8 R. 874, and the other bankruptcy cases to which we were referred. The Lord President, in the case of Marr, clearly points out the distinction. “The general rule,” he says, “is that the right of appeal from an inferior to a superior Court cannot be taken away except by express words. But that is a rule which may be said to be subject to some qualification, because if the jurisdiction exercised by the Sheriff is a jurisdiction specially given to him by statute, and in which the Court has not previously had jurisdiction, it may be much more easily implied that the Sheriff’s jurisdiction is not only privative but final, and not subject to review”; and that must be so, because it appears to me that in such a case the primary question is not whether an existing jurisdiction of the Court is to be taken away but whether a new jurisdiction is impliedly conferred on this Court. As I understand it, the principle is that this is implied on the ground that the Court of Session has jurisdiction over all inferior Courts in all civil matters, and therefore that when jurisdiction in a civil matter is conferred by statute on an inferior Court it is presumed to be conferred subject to the usual powers of review and otherwise of the superior Court. The principle is thus stated by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of the Magistrates of Portobello, 10 R. 131, —“Where,” he says, “a well-known and recognised jurisdiction is invoked by the Legislature for the purpose of carrying out a series of provisions which are important for the public without any specific form of process being prescribed, the presumption is that the ordinary forms of that Court are to be observed in carrying out the provisions, and indeed generally that the Court has been adopted and chosen and selected, because it is seen to be advisable that the ordinary rules of such Court and the forms of its procedure shall be applied to give effect to the provisions of the Legislature Act.”

The question therefore in this case is whether, when the Legislature provided that if any difference should arise concerning the kind or number of accommodation works it should be determined by the Sheriff or two Justices, it was intended to invoke the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court or the Justice of Peace Court with all their ordinary methods of procedure, and including the right of review by the Court of Session.

Now, although it was not brought under our notice by the parties, the Railway Clauses Act contains provisions regulating the matter of appeal in cases like the present. Sec. 150 enacts,—“In all cases which may come before any Sheriff-substitute under this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, in which written pleadings shall have been allowed, and a written record shall have been made up, and where the evidence which has been led by the parties shall have been reduced to writing, but in no other case whatever, it shall be competent for any of the parties thereto, within seven days after a final judgment shall have been pronounced by such Sheriff-substitute, to appeal against the same to the Sheriff of the county by lodging a minute of appeal with the Sheriff-clerk of such county or his depute; and the said Sheriff shall thereupon review the proceedings of the said Sheriff-substitute, and whole process, and, if he think proper, hear the parties viva voce thereon, and pronounce judgment; and such judgment shall in no case be subject to review by suspension or advocacy, or to reduction on any ground whatever." No. 60.

Main v.
Lanarkshire
and Dumbartonshire Railway Co.

The 151st and 152d sections of the Act provide in like manner for appeals in the case of matters brought before the Justices.

Now, it will be observed that in this there was no written record made up; there was no proof led by the parties, and therefore that there could have been no appeal even to the Sheriff. That being so, it appears to me to be difficult to come to the conclusion that, nevertheless, a right of appeal to the Court of Session was intended to be conferred. I think the clear intention of the statute was that there should be a limited appeal within the Sheriff Court itself in a certain definite class of cases, and presumably the more important, but no other appeal whatever.

It is impossible to say that the Sheriff Court is here invoked by the Legislature with its well-known and recognised jurisdiction and its ordinary rules and forms of procedure.

I think the proceedings in question are entirely statutory, and that no appeal lies to the Court of Session. I think, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed as incompetent.

Fisher's Trustees.

On 5th September 1893 Miss Fisher removed Everina Edgar from the custody of her father, and took her outwith the jurisdiction of the Court. On 21st September in a petition at the instance of James Glen Edgar, the Court ordained Miss Fisher to restore the child to her father. This she failed to do, and the Court ordained her to appear personally at the bar. She did not, however, appear, and on 10th November the Court sequestrated her estates, and appointed Mr John M. MacLeod, C.A., Glasgow, to be judicial factor thereon.

On 28th November 1893 James G. Edgar presented a petition stating the above circumstances, and praying the Court "to remove the said Margaret Brown Fisher from the office conferred upon her by the said mutual trust-disposition and settlement of the said George Fisher and Mrs Everina Burns or Fisher, dated and recorded as aforesaid, of testamentary tutor and curator to the said Everina Burns Edgar, and, in the discretion of your Lordships either to appoint such fit person as your Lordships may select to be factor loco tutoris of the said Everina Burns Edgar, with the usual powers, but only in so far as concerns her share and interest in the said trust-estate, he always finding caution before extract; or otherwise to abstain from making such appointment, and to commit the care of the said child's share and interest in said estate to the guardianship of the petitioner, her father, as her tutor, curator, and administrator-in-law."

Miss Fisher and John M'Killop and another who had been assumed as trustees into the trust were called. Miss Fisher did not appear, but the other respondents lodged answers, in which they submitted that the petition was unnecessary, but urged that, if the Court thought any appointment necessary, it should be conferred on Mr MacLeod.

On 20th December 1893 (Lord M'Laren absent) the Court, without delivering any opinions, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Appoint Mr John M. SAMUEL WAUGH, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Salvesen—Younger.
AYRSHIRE POST, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Shaw—Hunter.

Reparation—Slander—Innuendo—Issues.—In an action of damages for slander the pursuer averred that the defenders, the publishers of a newspaper, had published an anonymous letter "intending to convey to members of the public that it was written by the pursuer," and had commented thereon. He stated that the letter was not written by him, and averred that the letter falsely and calumniously represented the pursuer as "longing for an opportunity of committing murder on his Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, or at all events of shedding their blood in civil commotion." Terms of the letter on which it was held (1) that the words could be innuendoed as an incitement to riot and bloodshed, and (2) that it was slanderous to attribute to the pursuer the authorship of the letter.

Terms of the issue adjusted to try the cause.

1st Division.
Ld. Kyllachy.

On 23d October 1893, Samuel Waugh, shoemaker, Maybole, brought an action against the Ayrshire Post, Limited, proprietors and publishers of the Ayrshire Post newspaper, concluding for £500 damages for slander.

The pursuer averred that he resided at 2 Belmont Terrace, Maybole, No. 62, and that he was secretary of the County Grand Orange Lodge of Ayrshire.

He further averred;—(Cond. 2) “In the Ayrshire Post of Friday, 28th July 1893, and in the ‘Oculeus’ column of the said newspaper, there appeared the following paragraph:—

Dec. 22, 1893.
Waugh v.
Ayrshire Post,
Limited.

“‘Halt! Who goes there? An Orangeman.

“‘Belmont Terrace, Maybole, July 17th, 1893.—Mr Oculeus (or whatever they may call you), I don’t often lower myself with buying your Ayrshire Post, as I am more of a gentleman than read such rubbish of news as what is gathered up from your low scums of reporters, as your staff is made up of nothing but midden-rakers and chimney-sweeps. . . . Mr Oculeus, you must be a mean coward—like all the rest of your bloodthirsty crew—when you did not come to Irvine last Saturday and tell us about our long tile hats there. I know your reason. Mr Wallace of Cloncaird would have put his Orange sword down your throat, same as we done at Boyne Water. I only wish we may have the chance of meet you and your Radical crew. We will give you what we gave some of your Radical friends at Girvan in 1831; as we Maybole heroes is just thinking long for the time to come when we will have the chance of letting out the Papish blood once more. Mr Oculeus, I did not intend to lower my name with such trash as chimney-sweeps and midden-rakers, but if you don’t appologise for speaking about God-fearing, law-abiding people like what belongs to our Orange Order, as nothing but a good Protestant would be admitted into our ranks. . . . I will speak to Mr Wallace of Cloncaird, and see what can be done, as you are no gentleman, when you cannot give us your name.’”

The comment on the letter was as follows:—“I am a coward, are you? Because I do not give my name. Yet, while accusing me of that, you do not give your own name. . . .

“H. R. Wallace is president of a lodge of these fire-eating blitherers. Really I feel ashamed of my kinsman. . . . I would like to give my readers a little more information, but space forbids me this week.”

(Cond. 3) “The letter, or pretended letter, quoted in the above column, bears to be written from the pursuer’s address by an Orangeman, and is intended to convey the belief to members of the public that it was written by the pursuer. The said letter was not written by the pursuer, but is really a covert and malicious attack upon him and his opinions, which are opposed to those professed by the Ayrshire Post. The defenders knew that the pursuer was not the author of the said pretended letter, but they nevertheless published it as emanating from him. At all events the defenders had reason to suspect the genuineness of the said letter, and they did in fact suspect it, but they published the same without having communicated with the pursuer, although a reference was made to the pursuer in the unpublished portion of said letter referred to in the answer, and his correct address was given, and also without having obtained any knowledge of its author. In so doing they acted negligently and recklessly, and in breach of the rules in regard to publication of unsigned or anonymous letters which they print and publish in their newspaper. The defenders ought in no case to have published such a scurrilous production as the letter in question, and they would not have done so except to gratify their private malice.”

The pursuer innuendoed this letter and paragraph as follows:—“The said letter is wholly false and calumnious, and, inter alia, attributes to the pursuer sentiments of the most odious and criminal kind. In particular, the said pretended letter falsely and calumniously represented

No. 62. the pursuer as longing for an opportunity of committing murder on his Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, or at all events of shedding their blood in civil commotion. The said letter is calculated to hold up the pursuer to the contempt and hatred of the community with which he is connected, and of inciting the hatred against him of many of his fellow-citizens."

Dec. 22, 1893.
 Waugh v.
 Ayrshire Post,
 Limited.

The defenders admitted the publication, but averred that the letter was received by them by post from Maybole, and that the conclusion of the letter, which was not published, was,—“If you want any further communication with me you can address as above (Belmont Terrace), or to my father, Samuel Waugh, Orange Buildings, Maybole.” They stated that they had made inquiries, and that the letter was published in the bona fide belief that it came from the pursuer, and that he wished it to be published.

On 9th December 1893 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) adjusted the following issue for the trial of the cause:—“It being admitted that the defenders, in the issue of 28th July 1893 of the Ayrshire Post newspaper, printed and published the paragraph, including the pretended letter contained in the schedule hereto annexed: Whether the said letter and paragraph are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely impute to him that he is, and avows himself to be, a person of fanatical and odious sentiments, who desires an opportunity of shedding the blood of his Roman Catholic fellow-citizens in civil commotion; and whether the said letter and paragraph were written and published with the design and with the result of holding up the pursuer to public hatred and contempt, to his loss, injury, and damage?”*

The pursuer reclaimed, and maintained that he was entitled to an issue of slander.¹ The imputation of having written such a letter as that put in issue was slanderous, as the terms of the letter amounted to an incitement to violence and bloodshed. The form of issue allowed by the Lord Ordinary, which followed that allowed in Paterson v. Welch, only applied to cases where the statement alleged by the defender to have been made

* “OPINION.—In this case the pursuer proposes two alternative issues,—the one an ordinary issue of slander, and the other an issue in a special form similar to the issues allowed by the Court in Sheriff v. Wilson, 17 D. 52; Cunningham v. Phillips, 6 Macph. 926; Maclaren v. Ritchie (not reported); Paterson v. Welch, 20 R. 744.

“I have come to the conclusion that the second of those issues, somewhat altered in its terms, is the proper issue to try the case. I am not satisfied that the imputations on the pursuer amount to slander,—that is to say, to a charge against his character. To say of a man that he is a fanatic, or that he holds or avows sentiments which are even wildly fanatical, may be very offensive and very injurious, but I am not satisfied that such a statement is in any proper sense defamatory so as to be actionable per se, and without an express averment of intention to injure. I am not therefore prepared to send the first issue to the jury, more especially as no precedent can be found for an issue of slander in such circumstances.

“The second, I propose, should run thus:—(Quoted supra).

“It will be observed that as intention to injure is of the essence of the charge under this issue, I have put the question whether the letter and paragraph in question were written and published with that design. It will be for the jury to say at the trial, if the facts raise the question, whether an intention to injure on the part of the defender is consistent with what the defender alleges, viz., that he made all due inquiries, and had a bona fide belief in the authenticity of the letter.”

by a pursuer was not in itself of such a character as to make it slanderous to accuse a man of having said or written it.¹ No. 62.

The defenders maintained that the letter and paragraph would not bear the innuendo sought to be put upon them, and asked that the Lord Ordinary's issue (if any) should be allowed.

Dec. 22, 1893.
Waugh v.
Ayrshire Post,
Limited.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The first question to be considered is whether an issue of slander should be granted. Now, the way in which the case strikes me is this. The pursuer complains that the newspaper held out to the public that he had written and sent for publication the letter printed by them. If it would be immoral, or a piece of grievous misconduct, to offer for publication the letter attributed to him, then it is plain that an assertion that he wrote it and offered it for publication is plainly actionable. This leads me to examine the letter. It contains much trash, but it seems to me that the lines founded on by the pursuer can hardly be read otherwise than as inciting to violence and bloodshed, or I should rather say, may quite rationally be read as having that meaning. There are allusions all through the letter to acts of violence to Roman Catholics, the meaning of which is difficult to mistake. Now, Mr Shaw admits that it is actionable to accuse a man of inciting to violence, and if this letter may fairly be read as inciting to violence, then the pursuer seems entitled to have an issue of slander. I therefore propose that we should allow the following issue:—(His Lordship quoted the issue printed infra).

My opinion proceeds on the ground that to write a letter inciting to violence and bloodshed is so grave an act of misconduct that to ascribe such a letter to a man is slanderous. Under the issue which I propose that we should grant it would be quite open to the defenders to acquaint the jury with any extenuating circumstances which may have led them to publish the letter, and which might be pleaded in mitigation of damages. Thinking as I do that the pursuer is entitled to an issue of slander, that issue supersedes the necessity of resorting to the form adopted by the Lord Ordinary.

LORD ADAM.—I have no doubt that to publish of anyone that he is a person who has incited to bloodshed and violence is per se actionable, and the question comes to be whether the letter and paragraph do impute such sentiments to the pursuer. The question of libel or no libel is one for the jury, and we are not entitled to withhold the letter and paragraph from a jury unless we are satisfied that the innuendo placed upon the letter by the pursuer is unreasonable. To that extent we may construe an alleged libel. We are in short just now in the same position as if a jury had returned a verdict for the pursuer on an issue of slander, and we were being asked to upset their verdict on the ground that it was unreasonable. But I am of opinion that the innuendo here is a reasonable one. That being so, I think the issue proposed by your Lordship is the right one. Had the letter and paragraph not been per se slanderous, or capable of being innuendoeed as slanderous, then it would have been necessary to shew that the publication had been made with a view to do the pursuer injury, and had done him injury. In such a case the issue adjusted by the Lord Ordinary would have been the right one, but I do not think that that is the case we have here, and I therefore concur in the issue now proposed.

THE COURT recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and allowed the following issue:—"It being admitted that the defenders, in the issue of 28th July 1893 of the Ayrshire Post newspaper, printed and published the paragraph, including the pretended letter contained in the schedule hereto annexed: Whether the statements contained in said paragraph and letter are of and concerning the pursuer, and falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuer had written a letter for publication in a newspaper, in which letter he incited to riot and bloodshed, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?"

Lease—Tenant's right to remove buildings erected by him.—Where a tenant is entitled at the expiration of his lease to remove buildings erected by him, he cannot enforce this right when he has not implemented his obligations under the lease.

Lease—Trust-deed for creditors—Compensation—Loss by abandonment of lease—Value of buildings erected by tenant.—A tenant, several years before the termination of his lease, granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors. The lease having been abandoned by the trustee, it was arranged between the trustee and the landlord that buildings which the tenant would have been entitled to remove at the natural expiration of the lease should be taken over by the landlord at their value. Held that the landlord's agreement to pay the value of the buildings was to be construed as subject to his antecedent right to retain them till the tenant had implemented his obligations under the lease, and that the landlord was entitled to set off against the trustee's claim for the value of the buildings his loss by the tenant's abandonment of the lease.

1ST DIVISION.
 Sheriff of Caithness,
 Orkney, and Shetland.

WILLIAM S. SMITH, as factor for P. L. Smith, proprietor of the lands of the North Ness of Lerwick, let four different subjects to A. H. Harrison & Company, fishcurers, Shetland. On one of the subjects buildings were erected by the tenants.

On 30th November 1889 Harrison & Company granted a trust-deed for behoof of their creditors in favour of James Hutcheon. At this date the leases had still several years to run.

On 13th January 1890, Hutcheon, who had been arranging with Smith for the surrender of the leases, wrote to him as follows:—"Referring to our conversation of Saturday, what I have to propose is that,—(1) The loss to the end of the respective leases on the three stations I intend to give up be estimated by two valuers mutually chosen, and if no agreement can be arrived at, let the matter be referred to an oversman. (2) That the erections and improvements on the fourth station be taken over by you at mutual valuation, with reference to oversman, if need be. . . ." Smith replied on 23d January,—"In accordance with my promise made to you on 16th inst., I now beg to reply formally to your favour of 13th current. Agreeable to your suggestion to appoint valuers to value the loss I sustain to the end of the leases, and to value the erections on the £16 station, same to be taken over by me at the valuation. . . . Of course, my taking over the erections on the £16 station infers that the loss or gain on that station should also be determined by the valuator. . . .” No. 69.

On 1st November 1890 the valutors under this agreement issued an award or report which proceeded on the narrative that they had been called upon “to value the buildings erected by the said Messrs A. H. Harrison & Company, and to estimate the rents probably obtainable for these stations during what remains of the various leases.” They valued the buildings at £175. The loss to the landlord by taking over the leases was put down at £406 17 6 X and the report proceeded,—

“Deduct value of buildings, 175 0 0

“Amount for which proprietor will rank, . . . £231 17 6”

Smith thereafter raised an action against Hutcheon in the Sheriff Court at Lerwick concluding, inter alia, for decree ordaining the defender to pay him £231, 17s. 6d., or otherwise to rank him for that amount on the estate of Harrison & Company.

He averred, inter alia;—(Cond. 5) “The sum of £406, 17s. 6d. is the amount of loss sustained by the pursuer under said agreement in taking over said leases, and the sum of £175 is the value of the erections and buildings taken over by the pursuer, and the sum of £231, 17s. 6d. is the sum due by the defender to the pursuer under said agreement.”

The defender stated that the buildings formed a valuable asset of the trust-estate. “The defender, as trustee foresaid, was entitled, subject to any right of hypothec competent to the landlord, to sell and dispose of the buildings and rank the landlord as an ordinary creditor for the present value of the loss of future rents under the leases to be sustained subsequent to the date of abandonment of the leases taking effect. The agreement between the parties was that, in place of his (the defender) selling and removing the buildings, the landlord should take them over and pay for them the sum which might be fixed as their value under the informal arbitration. It was also agreed that the arbiters should estimate the amount of loss which the landlord would sustain by the leases being terminated in respect of loss of future rents payable under the leases. The only matters referred to the arbiters were to value the loss to the proprietor by the leases being terminated, and to fix the price to be paid by the proprietor for the buildings.”

The defender offered to give the pursuer a ranking for £406, 17s. 6d. on the trust-estate, but averred that the arbiters had gone ultra fines compromissi in deducting the value of the buildings from the pursuer's counter claim of damages, and ranking the pursuer for the balance, and stated pleas to that effect. He also pleaded;—(2) The pursuer's statements being irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the petition, the action should be dismissed, with expenses.

The Sheriff-substitute (Shennan), on 4th October 1893, allowed parties a proof.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The action was laid entirely on the agreement, and that being so, ought to be dismissed, for there was nothing in the agreement to warrant the plea of compensation. The only matters referred by the agreement to the arbiters were (1) the value of the buildings; and (2) the loss of rent sustained by the landlord; and they had clearly gone extra fines compromissi in setting off the one claim against the other. But assuming the question of compensation to be validly raised it failed on the merits. The landlord's claim arose out of the lease. The agreement to make over the buildings to the landlord, out of which the trustee's claim for their value arose, was a totally rison & Co.'s

The pursuer argued;—But for the words “under said agreement” in cond. 5 the action was admittedly relevant. These were not, however, sufficient to make it irrelevant, for the real question,—that, namely, of compensation,—was clearly enough raised apart from the agreement. It fell to be determined according to the rights of parties prior to the agreement, which merely ascertained the pecuniary values of these rights, and did not affect their nature. In the circumstances, then, the landlord had a right to retain the buildings, for assuming that they might have been removed by the tenant at the expiration of the lease, they had none the less become partes solæ,² and the tenant's right to remove them was entirely dependent on his implementing his obligations to the landlord under the lease. But the landlord's admitted counter claim here arose from the tenant's inability and failure to pay the stipulated rents. The landlord was therefore entitled to retain the buildings, or what was the same thing, to set off their value against the debt due to him by the tenant.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The whole question turns on the agreement contained in the two letters of 13th and 23d January 1890. As regards the report and award of the men of skill, it is perfectly plain that the men of skill had nothing to do but to value the buildings under article 2, and the loss under article 1 of the first letter. The other part of their award, in which they purport to fix the sum ultimately due has no legal effect on the question which we have now to determine.

That question is whether the pursuer is entitled to set off the ascertained value of certain buildings erected by his tenant on his land against the loss sustained by him through the tenant having gone bankrupt and failed to pay rent for the unexpired term of his lease, the pursuer's claim being to rank for the balance.

The agreement in question was entered into between the landlord and the trustee for the creditors of the bankrupt. It is elliptically expressed, but its import, so far, is sufficiently clear, especially read in connection with the defender's record. It was arranged that instead of being removed by the tenant certain buildings are to remain on the ground and be kept by the landlord, he giving value for them at a figure to be fixed by valuers; while, on the other hand, the amount of the admitted liability of the estate for the bankrupt's failing to pay the rents is to be determined by the same valuers.

As to the mode in which those values were to be made good, the letters are silent. Their silence leaves this to be determined, as I consider, according to the nature of the rights, the pecuniary amounts of which are thus ascertained.

I agree with Mr Murray, therefore, that it is necessary to consider what were the antecedent rights of the parties; and I may add that I think the account he gave of them was perfectly accurate.

To begin with, the landlord had right to damages for the tenant's confessed default in fulfilling his obligations for the years of the current lease which were yet to run. This may now be taken as amounting to between £400 and £500.

Smith v. Harrison & Co.'s
Trustee.

On the other hand, it is to be assumed that this tenant would have had right, at the expiry of his lease, to take away certain buildings. This right, however, was not absolute. We do not know exactly what those erections are, but it is enough for the argument that they are described by the defender as "buildings." Of all buildings it is certain that they are partes soli; of some buildings erected by the tenants, it is true that they may be removed by the tenant on his leaving at the expiry of his lease. But then this is the right of the tenant, as tenant, and can only be asserted on his fulfilling his obligations to the landlord. Until the tenant fulfils those obligations the landlord has a right of retention of those partes soli which the tenant may claim to remove.

Well, then, when this tenant declared his inability to meet his obligations, what was the right of his trustee regarding those buildings? He could only remove them upon paying the landlord what was still due. He could not remove and sell them to anyone unless and until the landlord's claims were satisfied. Practically, therefore, as the landlord's claims were upwards of £400, and the value of the buildings some £175, the value of the buildings to the bankrupt estate was dormant, the landlord being master of the situation.

On the other hand, the landlord might very well say,—“I am losing £400 by this man going bankrupt; on the other hand I am gaining £175 worth of buildings which, but for his bankruptcy, he would have taken away. I am willing to reduce the stated amount of my loss by the amount of my gain, and rank for the balance.” This is, to say the least, a reasonable view for the landlord to take of his own interests, and points to a sensible solution of the difficulty for both parties. It is, in my opinion, the proper construction to place upon the agreement. To suppose that the landlord went beyond this and agreed to pay for the buildings exactly as if he had no right over them seems to me a most unnatural and unsupported conjecture. We are, as I have said, by the silence of the agreement, thrown back upon the antecedent rights of the parties, it being natural to hold that no further inversion of the rights of parties was intended than what is stated.

This being my view of the case, it is hardly necessary to say that the decision which I propose in no way conflicts with the principle of such cases as Taylor's Trustees v. Paul. This case is not one in which the trustee was free to sell articles forming part of the bankrupt estate on his own terms and to whom he chose.

My opinion is that we ought to recall all the interlocutors in the case subsequent to the original interlocutor closing the record on 22d March 1893, when the case was perfectly ripe for judgment, on the grounds which I have now stated, and to ordain the defender to rank the pursuer as a creditor on the estate of A. H. Harrison & Company for the sum of £231, 17s. 6d., with legal interest from 1st November 1890, the date of the valuation.

Company—Winding-up by the Court—Failure of object of the company—Just and equitable cause—The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), sec. 79, subsec. 5, sec. 129, subsec. 1.—On 13th December 1893 a shareholder, holding 10 out of 215 shares of a limited company, incorporated to own and work a particular ship, presented a petition to have the company wound up by the Court, on the ground that the ship had become a total loss off the coast of North America on 25th November 1893. Answers were lodged by the company, in which they stated that no good reason had been given or existed for a winding-up, and that it would not be just that the company should be wound up by the Court. It appeared that notice of abandonment had not yet been formally accepted by the underwriters who had insured the vessel, and that no meeting of shareholders had been held to consider the question of a voluntary winding-up. The Court refused the petition.

1ST DIVISION.

THE "GOSFORD" SHIP COMPANY, LIMITED, was registered and incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862-1890, on 18th December 1891.

By the memorandum of association the objects for which the company was established were defined to be "the purchase, owning, and working of a steel sailing ship intended to be called the 'Gosford,' . . . and of no other ship," and power was conferred upon the company "to carry on the business of a shipowner in all its branches with respect to the said ship only. . . ."

The management of the company was vested in Briggs, Harvie, & Company, shipowners, Glasgow.

On 13th December 1893 Robert Cox, who held ten shares of the company, presented a petition under the Companies Acts* to have the company wound up by the Court.

He averred,—"The said company, which, in terms of the memorandum and articles of association, existed solely for the purpose of working the said sailing ship 'Gosford,' carried on business from the date of incorporation till November 1893, when the said ship 'Gosford' was totally destroyed by fire off the Pacific Coast of North America, near San Francisco. The said ship is a total loss. At the date of the said disaster she was insured with various underwriters and underwriting associations and clubs to the extent of £21,500 on hull, £3000 on disbursements, and £1400 representing balance of freight. The petitioner is a holder of ten

* The Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), provides, sec. 79,—"A company under this Act may be wound up by the Court. . . . (5) Whenever the Court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up."

Sec. 82,—"Any application to the Court for the winding-up of a company under this Act shall be by petition; it may be presented by the company, or by any one or more . . . contributory or contributories of the company. . . ."

fully paid shares of £100 each in the said company. By the 79th section of the Companies Act, 1862 (25 and 26 Vict. cap. 89), it is provided, inter alia, that 'a company under this Act may be wound up by the Court, as hereinafter defined, under the following circumstances (that is to say)—
 (5) Whenever the Court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that the company should be wound up.' Although Briggs, Harvie, & Company "were appointed managers of the said ship, and for the purposes of such management were empowered to do all the usual acts necessary for carrying on the business of a shipowner with respect to the said ship, they were not empowered either to wind up the company or to receive, on account of the shareholders, from the underwriters the moneys payable under the policies of said ship in respect of her total loss. In particular, the petitioner, as a contributory of the company, objects to the said managers intromitting with the moneys payable to the company by the said underwriters, in respect that they have no mandate from the company to intromit with said moneys, and for other good and sufficient reasons."

Cox v. "Gosford" Ship Co.

Answers were lodged by the company, in which they stated,—“On 25th November 1893, while the said ship ‘Gosford’ was on a voyage from Birkenhead to San Francisco with a cargo of coal, the managers received a cable from the captain from Santa Barbara, California, intimating that the ship had been destroyed by fire, and had been scuttled, and lay in 5½ fathoms of water, and that notice of abandonment should be given. . . . The managers accordingly gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters, but the underwriters have refused to accept notice of abandonment, and efforts are being made on their behalf to raise the said ship, with the view of repairing her and restoring her to the company. In these circumstances, the company is not in a position to be wound up. The petitioner is a holder of ten shares of the company, and there are other thirty-eight shareholders who hold among them 205 shares. There has not since the disaster to the ship been any meeting of the shareholders to consider what may have to be done, and it is premature to consider any proposition for winding up the company, unless and until the underwriters accept an abandonment of the said ship; but in any event, the managers have ample powers to attend to the interests of the company, and to receive and discharge all sums due to the company, including the amounts insured, if they should become payable. The managers are the proprietors of ninety-five shares of the company. No good reason has been given or exists for winding up the company, and it would not be just and equitable that the company should be wound up by the Court.”

It appeared that notice of abandonment had not yet been formally accepted by the underwriters who had insured the vessel, and that no meeting of shareholders had been held to consider the question of a voluntary winding-up.

Argued for the petitioner;—When the Court was satisfied that the subject-matter of the business of a company had ceased to exist it would make an order for a compulsory winding-up although the majority of the shareholders desired to continue the company.¹ That was the position of matters here, for it was not seriously disputed that the “Gosford” had been abandoned as a total loss, and it would be ultra vires of the company to build or substitute another vessel in her place. To refuse the petition would be to postpone the date of winding-up, even assuming that a resolution for a voluntary winding-up would be carried. The delay might be injurious to the petitioner. Besides, his application being perfectly competent, it was for the respondents to shew that they would be prejudiced by its being granted, and they had failed to do so. There were dicta to the effect that such an application would be granted where, liquidation being unavoidable, a shareholder presented his petition prior to a voluntary winding-up being resolved on by the company.¹ The cases cited by the respondents dealt with a totally different question from the present, viz., whether there should be a winding-up at all.

Argued for the respondents;—The negotiations with the underwriters had not been concluded, but assuming that the company must be wound up, it was for the shareholders to determine whether the winding-up should be voluntary. That was clearly contemplated by the Act* in circumstances like the present when the object of the company's incorporation no longer existed. But the shareholders had had no time or opportunity hitherto for doing so. Then it was not suggested that the company was insolvent, and where all the shareholders except one were opposed to a compulsory winding-up the Court would not act on the "just and equitable" section† unless there were very strong grounds for doing so,² and no relevant ground whatever had been stated by the petitioner. His interests would be just as well protected in a voluntary as in a compulsory winding-up, and there was no question of imprudence or impropriety on the part of the managers.

LORD PRESIDENT.—It appears that this ship, called the "Gosford," was the subject of a casualty of fire at some point off the Pacific Coast of North America so lately as November 1893. Prima facie there seems strong reason to think that the ship is a total loss; but it is not unnatural, considering the recentness of the event, that the matter has not been brought to a final and admitted conclusion as between the owners of the ship and the underwriters.

From the terms of the memorandum and articles of association it is clear that if the ship is a total loss and cannot be made the subject of further trading, then the work of the company has come to an end, and it must be wound up. But, in the meantime, it cannot be affirmed positively and definitely that the rights of the shareholders have been resolved into claims for their shares of the money payable by the underwriters. It seems to me that the petitioner has been quite premature, if not precipitate, in his action. The negotiations are not yet completed between the executive of the company and the underwriters; but assuming that they had been, it will then be for the shareholders to consider whether they should proceed to a voluntary winding-up of the company. The question arising on sec. 129, subsec. 1, will naturally come on as soon as the chapter of winding-up is opened, and the shareholders will say whether or not the natural course, viz., for the company to be wound up by voluntary

Sale—Pactum Illicitum—Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 49), secs. 14, 19.—Held that a bargain to deliver 600 stones of hay each stone to weigh 24 imperial pounds was not void under the provisions of the Weights and Measures Act, the transaction being a sale by an imperial weight, namely, the pound. Jan. 10, 1894. Lang v. Cameron.

THIS was an action at the instance of Major Hugh Graham Lang, 1ST DIVISION. adjutant of volunteers in the county of Sutherland, against Alexander Sheriff of Ross, Cameron, farmer there, to have the defender ordained to deliver to him Cromarty, and Sutherland. "600 stones of hay, each stone to consist of 24 imperial standard pounds avoirdupois," or otherwise to pay £32, 10s.

The pursuer averred that on the 18th October 1892 the defender sold and agreed to deliver to him 600 stones of hay, each stone to consist of 24 imperial standard pounds, and 2½ quarters of oats, that in exchange the pursuer sold and delivered to the defender a pony, and that the defender had delivered the oats but refused to deliver the hay.

The defender stated that he was prepared to deliver 600 stones of hay, imperial standard weight.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(2) The defender being ready and willing to deliver to pursuer 600 stones of hay, imperial standard weight, this action ought to be dismissed, with expenses. (4) The bargain, as stated by the pursuer, being contrary to law, could not, even if admitted by defender, be enforced, and this action ought to be dismissed as irrelevant, with expenses.*

On 21st March 1893, the Sheriff-substitute (Mackenzie), repelled the fourth plea in law for the defender and allowed a proof.†

* The Weights and Measures Act, 1878 (41 and 42 Vict. c. 49), enacts, sec. 14,—". . . a stone shall consist of fourteen imperial standard pounds. . . ."

† The pursuer deponed,—"The bargain as to the hay in question was made between me and the defender within the office in Dornoch of the Town and County Bank. While we were bargaining about the quantity of hay I was to get, Mr Mackintosh remarked,—'Gentlemen, you know the Lang v.

Cameron.

On 9th May the Sheriff-substitute found that the pursuer had failed to instruct that each stone of said hay was "to consist of 24 imperial standard pounds avoirdupois," or (2) that the defender ever undertook to deliver 600 stones of hay of any other than the imperial standard weight, and that the offer of the defender to deliver 600 stones of imperial weight was in due implement of his bargain, and ordained him to give, and the pursuer to take, delivery of that amount.

The pursuer appealed, and on 5th June 1893 the Sheriff (Johnston) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that, on 18th October 1892, the pursuer and defender entered into a verbal bargain of exchange or barter, whereby the pursuer undertook to give his horse, and the defender undertook to deliver in exchange $2\frac{1}{2}$ quarters of oats, and 600 stones, each stone to weigh 24 imperial lbs. of hay from a stack on his farm of Drummie, Golspie: Finds that the defender thereby undertook to deliver 600 times 24 imperial lbs., or 14,400 imperial lbs. of hay, and that said bargain quoad the defender's part was therefore for a multiple of an imperial weight as ascertained by the Weights and Measures Act, 1878: Finds that the pursuer has implemented his part of the bargain by delivery of his horse, but that the defender has failed to implement his part of the bargain by delivering said quantity of hay: Therefore repels the second and fourth pleas in law for the defender; ordains him to deliver to the pursuer, within fourteen days from intimation hereof, 600 times 24 or 14,400 imperial lbs. of hay from his stack situated . . . and in the event of his failure to do so within the period stated, remits to the Sheriff-substitute to decern in favour of the pursuer for the sum of £30 sterling, as the value of said hay, with interest at five per cent from the date of citation," &c.

The defender appealed, and argued;—The sale was by the stone, not by the pound, but the Sheriff was wrong in holding that the pursuer had proved that the "stone" was to be one of 24 lbs. If, however, that were held to be established, then the contract was void under the Weights and Measures Act, for it was a sale by the "Sutherland" stone, which was a local, and not an imperial weight or measure.¹ number of pounds to the stone for which you are dealing?' My reply was,— 'Of course I do, 24 pounds to the stone.' The defender made no objection, so I understood him to acquiesce. . . . I addressed myself to the defender in reference to Mackintosh's remark, 'Gentlemen, you know the number of pounds to the stone for which you are dealing?' I answered, 'Of course I do, 24 pounds to the stone.' This was the mode in which I pointed out to the defender my understanding of the bargain."

Mr Mackintosh deponed,— "Before the parties fixed upon the number of stones of hay to be given, I intervened and said, 'I suppose, gentlemen, you know what a stone of hay in Sutherland implies,—24 lbs. go to the stone of hay.' The pursuer then remarked, 'Certainly, 24 lbs.' . . . Cross-examined.— When the pursuer used the expression, 'Certainly, 24 lbs.' he addressed himself to the defender and me, but for the defender's benefit, as I thought, so that there might be no misunderstanding. I am not aware that the defender said anything to this."

The defender deponed,— "Cross-examined.—When Mackintosh intervened with his remark, 'You know, gentlemen, what sort of bargain you are making?' I don't think he mentioned the Sutherland stones of 24 lbs., but he did mention Caithness, Ross, and Inverness stones, and their weight in lbs. Mackintosh never mentioned the Sutherland stone as of 24 lbs. during the bargaining, though he mentioned those of the other counties. The pursuer's remark, '24 lbs. to the stone,' must have referred to the bargain for the hay between us. I made no remark in reply to this statement of the pursuer."

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think the Sheriff is right. He proceeds on findings in fact which give rise to no difficulty as regards the Weights and Measures Act, 1878. He holds that the bargain was that the defender should deliver 600 stones of hay, each stone to weigh 24 imperial lbs. In my opinion, that view is well founded in the evidence. The defender himself says that in the course of the negotiations the witness John Mackintosh said,—“You know, gentlemen, what sort of bargain you are making?” to which the pursuer replied,—“Decidedly I do, 24 lbs. to the stone.” It is true those words were uttered not by the parties, but by an intermediary; but it is shewn conclusively that the statement was assented to by both the parties, and formed not only an integral part of the bargain, but the bargain itself. Was the bargain illegal? Nothing was said at all about a local stone forming the basis or standard of the transaction, and, in my opinion, it was nothing but a sale by an imperial measure, namely the pound.

Welding.

Lease—Partnership—Power of one partner to bind firm.—On 11th September 1891 Zeigler and Welding, who had on that day been introduced to each other, went to Aberdeen, where they met Sellar, the manager of the Royal Circus there, and with him visited the circus. Zeigler entered into negotiations with Sellar for a lease of the circus, to be used as a music hall. Welding, who had been introduced to Sellar as Zeigler's partner, took no part in these negotiations. Zeigler and Welding then left Aberdeen, without concluding any agreement for a lease. Next day they entered into a contract of joint adventure as music hall proprietors, one of the places at which the business was to be carried on being the Royal Circus at Aberdeen.

On 13th October Zeigler returned to Aberdeen, and there entered into a lease as for the firm of the circus for three successive winter seasons. This lease was signed by Zeigler as an individual, and with the firm's name, but was not signed by Welding. Music performances were thereafter carried on in the circus for about three months, the bills announcing that Zeigler and Welding were proprietors of the circus. The partnership between Zeigler and Welding then terminated, after which there were no performances. The rent of the circus had been paid up to that date—in part by cheques granted by Welding in favour of Sellar, and he also paid the cost of certain alterations in the circus.

In an action by the Circus Company against Welding for payment of the remainder of the rent for the first winter season, Welding pleaded that he was not a party to the lease and so was not liable. It was proved that such premises as the circus were not usually let for less than an entire winter season. Held, in the circumstances, that Welding was liable in the sum sued for. Question, whether he was liable as tenant under the lease.

IN January 1892 Cooke's Circus Buildings Company, Limited, having their registered office in Aberdeen, brought an action in the Sheriff Court there, against "Baron Zeigler and Company, Theatrical Entrepreneurs, carrying on business at Aberdeen and elsewhere in the United Kingdom," and against Burlington Brumell, otherwise Baron Zeigler, and Edward Welding, the individual partners of the said firm, as such partners and as individuals, praying the Court to sequester, and grant warrant to sell, the furniture and other effects subject to the pursuer's hypothec, within the premises in Aberdeen known as Cooke's Royal Circus, occupied by the said firm as tenants under the pursuers since 23d November 1891, in security and for payment of certain specified sums, amounting in all to £188, 6s. 8d., as being the rent due and to become due by the defenders for the period from 23d December 1891 to 12th April 1892; and for decree against the defenders for payment of any balance of the said rent remaining due after the sequestration and sale.

The pursuers averred,—(Cond. 2) "By lease dated 13th October 1891, entered into between the pursuers and defenders, the pursuers let to the defenders the said premises mentioned in the foregoing article for the space of three years for the following periods in each year—viz., from the 23d day of November 1891 to the second Saturday in May 1892; from the first Monday in September 1892 to the first Saturday in May 1893; and from the first Monday in September 1893 to the first Saturday in May 1894, and that at a rent of £50 per calendar month, payable weekly in advance on Tuesday in each week, except the rent for the first fortnight of the defenders' tenancy, which was declared to be payable in advance on the 24th day of November 1891. . . . The defenders are, by the terms of the said lease, entitled to sit rent free for the last month of the said first period of their tenancy. . . . The defender Welding's averments in answer, except in so far as coinciding herewith, are denied. . . . The said defender was not ignorant of the existence or terms of the said lease. . . . The defender Welding took part in the negotiations for the said lease, and, along with his partner, the said Burlington Brumell, visited and inspected the premises in question prior to the conclusion of the said negotiations, and authorised and empowered the said Burlington Brumell to sign the said lease on behalf of their said firm of Zeigler & Company, so as to bind the said firm and the partners thereof."

Welding alone lodged defences, but stated no objection to the sequestration and sale being proceeded with. He averred,—(Ans. 2) that he or his firm of "Baron Zeigler & Welding" were not parties to any lease of the said premises. "The lease produced does not bear to be signed by him or by his said firm, nor was he ever communicated with regarding it, and did not know of its existence until he received the service copy summons herein. . . . Explained and averred that the defender Welding understood that the tenancy of the said premises by his said firm of Baron Zeigler & Welding was weekly."

He pleaded;—(4) The said lease being invalid so far as the said Edward Welding is concerned, he is not bound by its terms, and should be assolized, with expenses.

A proof was allowed. Welding, who was a retired military officer, became acquainted with Brumell or Zeigler in September 1891, in consequence of having answered an advertisement by Zeigler for someone to join him in purchasing a music hall. They met for the first time on 11th September in Glasgow, where they went to the office of Mr Alexander Wright Grant, writer, by whom a draft contract of joint adventure between Welding and Zeigler was prepared, its terms being the same as those of the contract ultimately executed (see *infra). Welding deponed that he understood the business was to be that of music hall proprietors in Bradford, and that when he came to the reference to the circus in Aberdeen he said he would have nothing to do with that, and read no further. Grant deponed that the clause bearing that Welding was not to be responsible for any loss in Aberdeen was that inserted to meet Welding's objection. Zeigler and Grant arranged to go to Aberdeen the same day, and Welding agreed to accompany them, but (as he deponed) "it was purely as a pleasure visit."

In Aberdeen they met Mr W. M. Sellar, the secretary of the pursuers' company. Welding gave this evidence;—"In Aberdeen I was in Cooke's Circus. . . . I did not go to Cooke's Circus on purpose. I had missed Grant and Baron Zeigler, and after spending some time at my hotel, I walked up as far as Bridge Street. When there, Baron Zeigler, who was at Cooke's Circus, waved his hand to me. Mr Sellar was with him. He said he wanted to introduce me to him. I went and was introduced to Mr Sellar, and we all went together into the circus. . . . Zeigler and Mr Sellar were in deep conversation at the time. I don't know what went on between them." Sellar deponed,—“Zeigler introduced Major Welding as ‘my partner.’ He took no exception. He heard the introduction. After some general conversation Welding said that he was only a sleeping partner, that the Baron was the managing partner, and that he did everything, as he, Welding, did not understand business himself.” Witness then deponed that he and Zeigler entered into negotiations for a lease of the circus. “During the time I was conversing with Zeigler the defender Welding was moving about the circus and not taking any serious part in the conversation.” Zeigler was not examined as a witness.

No lease was agreed to on the occasion of this visit to Aberdeen, and Welding, Zeigler, and Grant returned to Glasgow, where next day the agreement quoted below * was entered into between Zeigler and Welding.

* “This contract of copartnery entered into between Burlington Brumell, professionally known as Baron Zeigler, theatrical, concert hall, and general manager, late lessee and manager Zeigler's Royal Circus of Varieties and Equestrian Hippodrome, Dundee, hereinafter called the first party, and Edward Welding, gentleman, residing at Chester Lodge, 55 Haverstock Hill, London, N.W., hereinafter called the second party.

“Witnesseth that the parties hereto have agreed and do hereby agree as follows:—

“First, That said parties, in consideration of the second party paying to the first party the sum of £500 on the signing of this agreement, do hereby contract to be copartners in carrying on a business or joint adventure as concert hall and circus proprietors and managers under the firm or style of Baron Zeigler & Welding, the business at present to include the Royal Circus in Canal Street, Bradford, and the Royal Circus in Aberdeen, and afterwards such other place or places as may hereafter be acquired and mutually agreed upon by both parties.

“Second, The partnership shall be held to have commenced at this date, and shall subsist till mutually dissolved, declaring that said partnership may be dissolved by either party giving to his copartner three months' notice in writing of his intention to terminate same.

“Third, The first party shall act as the managing partner of the firm and their respective duties consistently therewith shall be mutually arranged as the

No. 66. On 13th October Zeigler returned to Aberdeen, accompanied by Grant, but not by Welding, and entered into a lease of the circus. The provisions of the lease sufficiently appear from the pursuers' averments quoted above. It bore to be "between Cooke's Circus Buildings Company, Limited, incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1886, having their registered office in Aberdeen, of the first part; and Burlington Brumell, otherwise Baron Zeigler, at present residing at Garrick House, 44 St Alban Street, Leeds, and Major Edward Welding, residing at Chester Lodge, 55 Haverstock Hill, London, trading under the firm of Baron Zeigler & Company, theatrical entrepreneurs, Aberdeen and Bradford, of the second part." It was signed (on behalf of the second parties) "Baron Zeigler" and "Baron Zeigler & Company" (both signatures being written by Zeigler), but not by Welding, and Welding deponed that he knew nothing of its terms until after the commencement of the present proceedings.*

Welding.

The joint adventure between Zeigler and Welding was terminated on 15th December 1891. The Gazette notice of dissolution bore that they carried on business "at the Royal Circus in Canal Street, Bradford, in the county of York, and at the Royal Circus in Aberdeen, as concert hall and circus proprietors and managers, under the firm or style of Baron Zeigler & Welding."

All the rents for the Aberdeen circus due prior to the dissolution were paid—partly by cheques granted at Bradford by Welding in favour of the pursuers' secretary. Welding deponed that these cheques were written by his clerk to Zeigler's dictation, and were handed to Zeigler. The pursuers incurred a sum of about £96 in alterations on the circus, and Welding in addition paid £9 to the contractor for extras. The circus posters announced Welding as proprietor of the circus along with Zeigler, and he admitted that when this came to his knowledge he did nothing to repudiate it.

Music hall proprietors were adduced, who deponed that it would be absurd to take a circus by the week for the purpose of using it as a music hall, as the better class of music hall performers required to be engaged at least six months before their appearance; and it appeared requirements of the business may necessitate. No bills, notes, or cautionary obligations of any kind relating to the firm's business shall be binding on the firm unless the signatures of both parties in addition to the firm's are adhibited.

"Fourth, Each partner shall draw ten pounds sterling weekly as salary, and the net profits remaining shall be equally divided after the working expenses shall have been provided for, it being understood that each partner shall contribute equally towards these expenses, and that the first party shall relieve the second party of all loss and responsibility that may result from the management of the Royal Circus, Aberdeen. . . ."

* With reference to the absence of Welding's signature, Grant deponed,—“It was the subject of a very stormy debate. Mr Sellar insisted upon getting it. Zeigler refused to take the lease if Mr Sellar insisted on Mr Welding's signature as a necessity. He did not explain to me his reason. . . . He only wanted my legal advice, if need be. . . . Mr Sellar asked me would I give him a letter. . . . I thought for a moment, and not having the deed with me, my recollection was not quite distinct, and from what I remembered of the deed I felt that I could honestly and justly give him the letter he wanted.”

The letter which Grant gave to Sellar was in the following terms:—“With reference to the lease of Cooke's Circus executed to-day between The Cooke's Circus Buildings Company, Limited, and Baron Zeigler & Company, it is within my knowledge that Baron Zeigler has power on behalf of his firm to enter into said lease and bind his firm.”

that a year—i.e. a season, from November till May—was the minimum period for which such premises would be let.* No. 66.

On 18th March 1893 the Sheriff-substitute (Brown) pronounced this interlocutor (after findings in fact):—"Finds in law that Baron Zeigler had no implied authority, either at common law or under said contract, to enter into said lease on behalf of the said Edward Welding; and that he not having authorised the same, it is not binding on him: Finds, further, that the pursuers have failed to prove facts and circumstances shewing that the said Edward Welding adopted, or homologated, or acquiesced in said lease: Therefore assoilzies the said Edward Welding from the conclusions of the action."

Welding.

On appeal the Sheriff (Guthrie Smith), on 12th July, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the said interlocutor: Finds it proved that the defender was in partnership with Burlington Brumell alias Baron Zeigler as concert hall and circus proprietors, under the firm or style of Baron Zeigler & Welding, and for some time carried on business as such at the Royal Circus, Aberdeen, until the 15th December 1891, when said firm was dissolved by mutual consent: Finds that by lease dated 13th October 1891 the pursuer let to the said firm the premises mentioned on record at the rents specified, and that the said lease was signed by the said Brumell, as managing partner of the firm, for and on behalf of the firm, but not by the defender: Finds that said lease was entered into by the pursuer in the belief, induced by the defender, that the said Brumell had authority to take the premises on behalf of the firm, and that the same is binding on the defender: Therefore repels the defences: Finds the defender liable in payment of the rents due and unpaid, namely, from 23d December 1891 to 3d January 1892, £19, 7s. 2d.; from 5th January 1892 to 12th April 1892, £168, 19s. 6d., making in all £188, 6s. 8d., under deduction of the sums paid or recovered to account thereof: Remits to the Sheriff-substitute to fix the sum due after hearing parties."†

* Welding deponed,—“The Baron and I attended to the business in Bradford for the first two weeks, and then I attended to it afterwards. . . . The business in Bradford was somewhat similar to what the Baron was carrying on in Aberdeen. If you require artistes of any extraordinary talent for a business of that kind you require to engage them beforehand. Ordinary talent you get in hundreds.”

† “NOTE.— . . . I do not think it necessary to decide whether a lease, to be binding on a firm, should be signed by both partners; probably the prudent course is to have it so executed; and I am not surprised that Mr Sellar, the pursuers' adviser, should have taken this view. Nor am I surprised that, when on his insisting on Welding's signature as well as Zeigler's, and this was refused, he asked and obtained an assurance from Mr Grant, the Glasgow solicitor whom Zeigler had brought with him to assist in the adjustment of the lease, that the latter had authority to bind the firm in that particular matter. The defender is obliged to repudiate that act, also on the ground that Grant was Zeigler's agent, not his. But Mr Sellar evidently dealt with him as representing the firm. Grant himself says he saw he was under this impression and did nothing to remove it, and I think it is hardly open to the defender to dispute that a managing partner, whatever may be his powers in other respects, has, at least, authority to employ a solicitor to attend to the interests of the firm in the negotiation of a lease. In this view the case comes within a well-settled principle of partnership law. Whatever may be a partner's authority in a particular matter, by force of law it is always open to the other members of the firm to limit or enlarge his powers, and just as an innocent partner may defend himself by proving that the third party claiming fulfilment of the obligation had notice of the limitation, he may be barred from impeaching an act outwith the usual scope of administration by leading the stranger to believe that

The defender appealed, and argued;—(1) The lease founded on by the pursuers was signed neither by the defender nor by his firm of Zeigler & Welding; it was signed by Zeigler and by a firm of "Zeigler & Company," of which the defender knew nothing. He therefore was not bound. But (2) assuming that the signature "Zeigler & Company" might be sufficient to bind the defender, that would only be where the deed to which the signature was adhibited was an act of ordinary administration, or was one specially authorised by the defender. A lease of heritage was an act of extraordinary administration, by which only those partners who had signed the lease would be bound, even where the subjects let were the premises in which the business of the firm was to be carried on, if there was no special authority to bind the remaining partners.¹ At least it was an act of extraordinary administration, where the period of the lease might, and, as here, in the event did, extend beyond the period of the partnership. Then this contract of joint adventure did not give Zeigler special authority to bind the defender under this lease; and the defender had done nothing from which the pursuers were entitled to infer that Zeigler had such authority. Sellar, the pursuers' secretary, plainly thought so when he insisted on having the defender's signature, and if, in face of Zeigler's intimation that he would not go on with the lease if the defender's signature was required, Sellar chose to be satisfied with Grant's letter, the pursuers must take the risk of that. Nor (3) had the defender done anything to adopt or homologate the lease. He had granted cheques in favour of the pursuers' secretary, but they were granted at Bradford, where, undoubtedly, he and Zeigler had business relations, and if the defender owed Zeigler money, and Zeigler wished the money to be paid to the pursuers instead of himself, that was his act, not the defender's. Nor could payment to the con-his copartner had his authority for acting on behalf of the firm. The belief, of course, that the partner was endowed with the requisite authority must be a reasonable belief, for if he is mistaken he cannot fall back on the other partner and say he is bound merely because of his belief, unless (in the words of Lord Blackburn) 'he can shew that the other party has so conducted himself as to authorise that belief'—(Kendal v. Wood, L. R., 6 Ex. 243). Reviewing all the facts in the case, I think the pursuers have shewn enough to satisfy this principle. The inspection of the premises by both partners on the 11th September, when Zeigler introduced Welding as 'his partner,' and when it was arranged that Zeigler should come back and arrange the terms of the lease, and Zeigler's return a month later, with that object, accompanied by a Glasgow writer, who being appealed to as agent of the firm, gave the explicit written assurance contained in No. 14, are facts of themselves sufficient. If the defender was, as he says, ignorant of the terms of the lease, his ignorance was inexcusable, for, on the 21st October, the firm took possession of the building, and he was bound to inquire as to the nature of their title. Instead, however, of doing anything to repudiate the transaction, it appears that with his knowledge the walls were placarded with posters announcing that Welding was associated with Zeigler in the proprietorship of this place of amusement; that payments of rent were made by cheques bearing Welding's own signature; that the pursuers were permitted to incur a considerable expenditure on the building to make it suitable for the firm's occupation; and that Welding himself paid for the alterations executed on behalf of the firm. Nor can the Gazette notice of 15th December 1891, publishing the dissolution of the partnership, be thrown out of view. . . . These facts constitute a ratification of the lease on the part of the defender, from which there is no escape. The result is that, differing from the Sheriff-substitute, I must hold the defender liable in the rents sued for."

tractor for the Aberdeen alterations for extras be regarded as adoption of the lease. It was a payment of a trifling sum to avoid an action, not a voluntary payment. But (4) it was now said that the defender, even if he were not liable as tenant under the lease, was at all events liable for the rent during the period for which he must be held to have been in occupation of the circus, as his contract with Zeigler and his conduct shewed that he must have known that his firm were in occupation of it. That argument came to no more than this, that the defender was liable for the rent falling due while the joint adventure lasted. It was true that the contract of joint adventure bore that the business was to be carried on in the Aberdeen circus, but the business of a partnership might be carried on in premises of which one of the partners only was tenant, and there was nothing in the defender's conduct inconsistent with the view that Zeigler was sole tenant of the circus. As, therefore, the whole rent falling due up to the dissolution of the partnership had admittedly been paid, the defender ought to be assolvied.

Argued for the pursuers;—Each partner of a firm had implied authority to bind his copartners to every act done by him in the firm name, provided that the act was done to carry on in the usual way the business of the firm. Whether a given act was or was not done for the purpose of carrying on the business of the firm in the usual way depended on the nature of the business.¹ Here taking a lease of the circus in Aberdeen was necessary for carrying on the business of the defender's firm, since it was constituted for the purpose of carrying on business in that circus. A lease could be validly granted to a partnership, socio nomine.² Zeigler's signature, therefore, and that of the firm, bound Welding. It might be that a lease for three years was ultra vires of Zeigler, but that question was not raised in this action. The pursuers sued merely for the balance of the first year or season's rent. And taking a lease for that period was certainly within Zeigler's implied authority, the evidence being to the effect that no one would think of taking a circus for the purpose of using it as a music hall for a shorter term. In any case Welding was bound as having held himself out as Zeigler's partner. He had gone with him to Aberdeen, and had been introduced as his sleeping partner to the pursuers' secretary. The pursuers therefore were entitled to conclude that Zeigler had authority to bind Welding. Welding's subsequent conduct confirmed this. He had granted cheques in favour of the pursuers; he had paid for part of the alterations on the circus; and had allowed his name to appear along with Zeigler's as a proprietor of the circus. It was not necessary, however, to the pursuers' case to maintain that Welding was liable as tenant under the lease. On the evidence he must certainly be held to have known that his firm had the right to occupy, and were occupying, the circus in Aberdeen, down at anyrate to the dissolution of the firm; he knew the nature of the business, for that at Bradford of which he was the manager was similar; he could not therefore reasonably have supposed that his firm held the Aberdeen circus upon a weekly tenancy, but must have known that their right of occupation was at least for the minimum period for which a music hall would be let.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—In 1891 the defender, Welding, and a person calling himself Baron Zeigler or Brumell, entered into an engagement to carry on a theatrical business in certain places, one of which was Aberdeen. It appears

They had a meeting with the secretary of the company, and then and there Welding was introduced as a partner, and he announced to the secretary, Mr Sellar, that he was the sleeping partner in the firm, and that Baron Zeigler was the managing partner. There is nothing more certain than this, that the contract provides that one of the places in which the business of the copartnery was to be carried on was a circus building in Aberdeen, and I think it proved that Welding knew that it was to be taken for the business in which he was a coadventurer.

Jan. 11, 1894.
Cooke's Circus
Buildings Co.,
Limited, v.
Welding.

It is possible, as was suggested in the course of the discussion, that in such a contract as this it might be intended that one of the partners should have the lease of one of the places of amusement at one place and the other at the other, but there is nothing of that sort in this case, as I think it is clearly proved that Welding knew that the building was taken for the business of the copartnery.

The lease was made out in the name of Baron Zeigler & Company, and Zeigler signed it as Baron Zeigler & Company, and then added his own name, if it may be so called, "Baron Zeigler," and it was contended that Welding was not a member of any such copartnery, and that he was not bound by the lease in any way.

I have come to the same conclusion as the Sheriff, although not upon quite the same grounds. I think that these premises were occupied by the parties to the copartnery for carrying on the business of the copartnery, that the business was carried on there on that footing as long as it lasted, and that although the copartnery was dissolved when it became unsuccessful, I hold that the partners are liable for the rent of the term for which they had begun to use them. The occupation was the occupation of Welding as well as Zeigler. It is not contended that what is asked is an unreasonable sum to pay for the occupation. I therefore do not think it necessary to decide any question as to the written lease. In my opinion Welding is liable for the occupation, which was his as well as Zeigler's, and I think that the judgment of the Sheriff gives the right decision of the case, although I cannot agree with the grounds given in his note.

LORD YOUNG.—There have been raised here some questions of law which are of more importance than I should have wished them to be in such a case. The case arises out of an agreement between two gentlemen, one of whom calls himself "theatrical, concert hall, and general manager," and the other describes himself as "gentleman, residing at Chester Lodge, Haverstock Hill, London," and the purpose of the agreement is to carry on "a business or joint adventure as concert hall and circus proprietors and managers" at Bradford and Aberdeen. Now, I am not surprised, I must confess, that a gentleman from Haverstock Hill, who gave £500 to Baron Zeigler, "theatrical, concert hall, and general manager," in order to carry on such a business, should come to grief. He lost his £500 apparently, and he has further become involved in the questions which are raised in the present action, and relate to his liability for the rent of a circus in Aberdeen belonging to the pursuers, of which Zeigler obtained a lease for three years.

If the question had been whether the defender was liable for the rent as tenant under this lease, I think that the case of the pursuers would have been attended with very considerable difficulty. It appears to me to be doubtful whether the defender, by the terms of his association with Zeigler, authorised him to enter into a lease of this circus for three years, or indeed for any period, binding him, the defender, as tenant. But the case of the pursuers, as it was presented to us, is limited to this,—that the defender should be found liable for the rent, not as a tenant under the lease, but only as an occupier of the premises for the period of occupation during the subsistence of the joint adventure, and for such a period beyond that as it may be shewn to be customary and reasonable to let such premises for the uses to which the joint adventurers intended to put them. Accordingly, the action is limited to asking for decree for the first year's rent. The pursuers' position is this,—“We do not say that you are tenant for three years, but as you have occupied the premises for a period of three months you must pay rent for that occupation, and that at the rate specified in the lease, there being no allegation that it is an unfair rent; and you must also pay rent for the remainder of the year, it being according to the evidence that no owner of such premises would have given leave to occupy them for any shorter period.”

No. 66.

Cooke's Circus
Buildings Co.,
Limited, v.
Welding.

I think that that position, assuming it to be well founded, is a sufficient ground for our judgment. No doubt it avoids the question, and I am desirous to avoid deciding the question, whether one of several joint adventurers has implied authority to enter into a lease of heritable subjects for three years, or for any period, so as to bind his coadventurers. I am inclined to think that he has not. I rather incline to the view that persons who let property to joint adventurers, if they wish all the joint adventurers to be bound as tenants, should get the signatures of all to the lease, if it is for a period for which by our law writing is necessary, or get their verbal consent, if verbal consent is all that is required. In this case there was no communication whatever between the pursuers and Welding in regard to the terms of the lease, and apart altogether from the question of right, I think that the proper course for a proprietor to take in letting heritable subjects is to communicate with the persons whom he desires to have bound as tenants under a contract of lease. I confess, however, that when the pursuers sue not upon the contract of lease, but on the ground of occupation, there is a good deal to be said for them, and I do not quite see the answer to their demand. That being so, the question is reduced to this, whether the defender's liability for rent on the ground of occupation may not be extended to the two or three months beyond the period of actual occupation, so as to complete the shortest period for which, according to the evidence, such buildings as these are in use to be let. If that is the question, I think that we may take into consideration the whole circumstances of the case; and looking to the fact that Welding went to Aberdeen with Zeigler—that he told Sellar, the secretary of the circus company, that he was the sleeping partner of the firm—that his name was used in the advertisements of the business, and so on, I am not prepared to dissent from the judgment proposed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I do not think that this case raises any general question. For my part I decide it entirely upon the special circumstances of the case. It is proved satisfactorily to my mind that the parties to the contract of copartnery intended that a lease of these premises should be taken,

No. 66. and that the appellant Welding knew that the lease was taken for the use of the firm and for carrying on its business. The firm entered into possession, and I think that the rent of the premises for the term during which the firm were in possession must be paid by Welding as one of the partners.

Cooke's Circus
Buildings Co.,
Limited, v.
Welding.

LORD TRAYNER.—The defender Welding entered into a contract with a person calling himself Zeigler to carry on a business or joint adventure as concert hall and circus proprietors and managers in Aberdeen. It was necessary that premises should be taken in which to carry on the joint adventure, and either of the joint adventurers taking a lease of such premises, in prosecution and in the interests of the joint adventure, would, in my opinion (in the general case), be acting within his implied mandate, and would bind the whole of the joint adventurers for the tenant's obligation. I have said in the general case, because a question might be raised whether what had been done by the one joint adventurer was a thing which was in the prosecution of the coadventure or appropriate to it.

It is not necessary, however, for the decision of this case to determine any general question as to the power of one joint adventurer to bind his coadventurers, because I am of opinion, with Lord Rutherford Clark, that the case may be decided on its special circumstances. In my opinion Welding knew and approved of the premises in question being taken for the purposes of the joint adventure, and entered into possession of the premises. He must therefore pay the rent which is now demanded.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law of the interlocutor of the Sheriff dated 12th July 1893; dismiss the appeal, and affirm the interlocutor appealed against"; and of new decerned against the defender for the rents in question in so far as unpaid.

Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees.

GRAHAM MACFARLANE AND OTHERS (Dunlop's Trustees), Defenders (Respondents).—D.-F. Pearson—Johnston—Pitman.

Revenue—Legacy-duty—Moveable estate directed to be invested in purchase of land—Lands purchased before vested right acquired by beneficiary—Act 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, sec. 19.—Sec. 19 of 36 Geo. III. cap. 52, enacts,—"That any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate, unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued, but no duty shall accrue in respect thereof after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate for so much thereof as shall have been so applied."

A testator directed his trustees, during the period of six years next after his death, to realise the whole residue of his moveable estate, and therewith to purchase land to be entailed at the expiry of the six years upon D and a series of heirs. The residue amounted to £350,000, and during the six years the trustees invested £21,000 in the purchase of land. At the expiry of the six years D presented a petition for disentail under the Entail Acts, and obtained a decree ordinating the trustees to convey to him in fee-simple the residuary estate. Thereafter a claim by the Crown for legacy-duty on this estate was sustained, and the trustees were ordained to lodge an account of that estate. In the account lodged by them they deducted the sum of £21,000. The Crown objected to the deduction. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Wellwood) that the sum was exempt from legacy-duty, in respect that when it was applied in the purchase of land it was subject to a trust for the benefit of a series of heirs in succession, and because it had been so laid out before any duty accrued, and therefore fell within exception and subexception in sec. 19.

Revenue—Legacy-duty—Money directed to be applied in erection of mansion-house—Stamp-Duties, &c., Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict. cap. 76), sec. 4.—By sec. 4 of the Stamp-Duties, &c., Act, 1845, it is enacted that “every gift by any will . . . of any person, which by virtue of any such will . . . shall be payable . . . or be satisfied out of the personal or moveable estate . . . of such person . . . shall be deemed a legacy,” and shall be liable to legacy-duties accordingly. Held that a sum of money directed to be expended on the erection of a mansion-house is a legacy within the meaning of the statute.

(ANTE, vol. 19, 461.)

Alexander Dunlop, of Carnduff and Doonside, died on 30th September 1883, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 28th July 1875.

By the 5th purpose Mr Dunlop directed his trustees to retain and accumulate for six years after his death the whole rents, interests, and profits of the residue of his estate, and out of the accumulations or capital, if necessary, to apply a sum not exceeding £12,000 in the erection of a mansion-house at Doonside, and to pay an annuity of £800 a-year during the said period of six years to W. H. Dunlop, the institute of the entails thereafter mentioned, whom failing, to the heir of entail for the time being, who should be entitled to succeed under the destination thereafter expressed to the lands and others to be entailed as directed.

The 6th purpose was as follows:—“During the said period of six years my said trustees shall sell and realise the whole of the residue and reversion of my moveable estate of every kind, and of the whole of my heritable bonds, feu-duties, and ground-annuals, and my house and other heritable property in Glasgow and out of the United Kingdom” (with certain specified exceptions), “and my said trustees shall look out for and purchase with the proceeds of said residue and reversion such lands or landed estate or estates in Scotland as they may consider proper, and shall entail the same and my other landed estates as after mentioned. . . . Declaring, however, that although it is my wish and desire that my said trustees should realise the residue and reversion of my said estates, and purchase the said lands or estates during the said period of six years, I hereby declare that they shall be entitled to use their own discretion as to this, and if they consider it necessary they shall be entitled . . . to delay the said realisation, and also the said purchase or purchases till such time or times as may seem to them most convenient and suitable for such realisation and purchases: Declaring, however, that after the said period of six years have expired, the institute or the heir of entail in possession, or entitled at the time to possess the lands and estates to be purchased as aforesaid under the destination hereinafter written, shall be entitled to demand and receive the interest and proceeds of the entire residue and reversion of my said estates, heritable and moveable, hereby conveyed, but under deduction always of such expenses and charges as may be incurred by my said trustees in the management and execution of the trust until the said lands or estates are purchased and entailed, and the whole purposes of the trust fulfilled.”

 Lord Advocate v. Dunlop's Trustees.

By the 7th purpose the trustees were directed, as soon as convenient after the said period, to execute a deed or deeds of strict entail of the lands and estates to be purchased in terms of the 6th purpose, and of any other properties which might belong to the truster at his death, to and in favour of William Hamilton Dunlop and the heirs-male of his body, whom failing, to other substitutes in succession.

At the truster's death he was possessed of heritable property in Scotland and abroad, and also of personal property of the value of about £350,000.
